It is a very great honor to represent an American constituency, and naturally our desires to continue to do so. But, after all, I hope the gentleman who made that suggestion does not ordinarily view his duties here wholly from the standpoint of just how this particular problem or that particular vote may affect his political fortunes.

I think it is true that a very large number of people in the Mississippi Valley, in the day when the question was wholly one of whether or no we should endeavor by public aid to build up a merchant marine by aid of a subsidy, were opposed to that policy. I think there was, in the absence of strong persuasive voices raised in behalf of that policy, a time when practically everybody was going with the tide and running with the hounds against it. I think there was a very general sentiment against a ship subsidy as the matter was then presented. But I have a very high regard for the people of those States. I know they are clear-headed, right-thinking folks, and I do not believe they want us to dodge any question fairly presented to us, and I do not believe that even those folks would, if the question as now presented to us were clearly and definitely and earnestly presented to them, would be found against it. I can not believe these people would say, "We believe in Government aid in rectifying the banks of our great interior rivers. We favor Government aid in the reclamation of arid lands. We approve large appropriations for flood protection. We want the Government to expend large sums on rivers and harbors. We believe the Federal Government may very properly appropriate great sums of money for aid in the building of roads. We think the Federal Government may properly aid the raiser of hogs and the grower of cotton and the producer of a wide variety of agricultural products by helping him to meet his problems and overcoming the difficulties that confront him. We believe in all these things, calling in the aggregate for many millions of dollars annually, but we can not agree that the Nation should ever expend a penny to keep the flag on the high seas to help transport our products, most of which come from the farms, to foreign markets, to establish and maintain great merchant leviathans which are as essential to us in time of war as are the great warships themselves."

I do not believe that the proposal now before us properly presented would meet with an adverse verdict anywhere in the Mississippi Valley, north or south.

Our Democratic friends in debating this problem take a great deal of pride and pleasure in enveloping themselves in the cloak of political sanctity and in declaring that they stand for "equal opportunity for all and special privileges to none." That is a very lovely figure of speech, and we all believe in it as a matter of political ethics. But, speaking practically, where is the man who can say that any man who has sat in this Chamber within the recollection of any of us has not voted for and has not favored special aid, special assistance. We began to afford special benefits the day we abandoned the idea that the only function of government is to maintain order. We do grant special favors to every locality whose bayous and waterways you clear of snags and water hyacinth; to every community whose rivers and harbors we make available for the use of local as well as general commerce. Who can say that there is no special privilege in calling upon the taxpayer of one section of the country to aid in the building of highways for the benefit of the people who live in other parts of the country? We make these expenditures on the theory that they serve the general interest, but the expenditure is, nevertheless, helpful and beneficial to localities and individuals. In the recent campaign in my State I took some pride in reciting the benefits that we received annually from Federal appropriations, and I was surprised myself when I had summed it all up and found how large an amount flowed regularly from the Federal Treasury into my Commonwealth and into all that section.

Mr. J. M. NELSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. In just a moment. The day is gone when gentlemen who want to be honest and fair discuss these matters on the theory that these benefits convey some special privilege contrary to the spirit of our policy and our institutions. Now I am glad to yield to the gentleman.

Mr. J. M. NELSON. Can the gentleman name a parallel case, where the special privilege has gone so directly to a group, where the money goes directly to them? The gentleman knows who owns the highways that he speaks of.

Mr. MONDELL. It happens in this particular case that by reason of the nature of the business the payment proposed for services rendered—and it ought not to be made unless there is a service rendered—must be to an individual. That does not change the nature of the case or of the character of the payment.

Mr. J. M. NELSON. Can the gentleman name a parallel case in his own recollection as a Congressman?

Mr. MONDELL. Every expenditure I have mentioned parallels what we are proposing. In this case it is proposed not to aid without any direct return whatever, as in some of the cases that have been mentioned, but to make payment for a service to be performed. The flag must be carried on the high seas. American commerce must be transported to the ends of the earth. A real service must be performed. Ships must be maintained that in time of war will be as useful and serviceable to us as are the great battleships of the fleet, and it is for that service that we propose a small payment shall be made.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield for a moment?

Mr. MONDELL. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. FESS. In the light of the question of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. J. M. NELSON], to whom was the money paid when we built the transcontinental railroads in the west?

Mr. MONDELL. The lands were granted to the railroads, and the loans were made directly to the railroads. In those cases the payments were as directly to individuals as they are in this case.

Mr. J. M. NELSON. Does not the gentleman think that was rather unfortunate? Were there not all kinds of scandals and all kinds of protests against that procedure?

Mr. SNYDER. But we got the railroads, did we not?

Mr. MONDELL. Take it all in all, every man who has lived in that western country, who knows what was done and what has been accomplished, admits that the policy was a sound and a helpful one. If there were excesses in the application of that policy, that is quite another matter. If the gentleman thinks the subsidy too high, let him suggest a reduction. If the gentleman believes there are provisions in this bill that ought not to be in it, let him suggest an alternative. But in my opinion no man can fairly represent an American constituency, in voting against this legislation, unless he shall propose some other concrete proposition which will solve the great problem we have before us. Gentlemen may not dodge this issue. It is here. It is clear. It is definite, and from the standpoint of the party having responsibility here, what shall we say to the American people if, having been called into authority for the purpose of enacting constructive legislation, we halt and hesitate in the face of one of the most urgent problems pressing upon us.

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MONDELL. Briefly.

Mr. GARNER. Why is it that American capital does not seek investment in the merchant marine?

Mr. MONDELL. I have asked that question repeatedly, and the answer, sometimes garbed in one phraseology and sometimes in another, has always been, in substance, that it does not pay, that it has not paid, and that it will not pay without some aid from the Federal Government. Let me answer the gentleman's question in another way. The proof of the fact that it has not paid is to be found in the fact that we have not had a merchant marine. Here is a nation, the richest in the world, with more capital seeking investment than anywhere else on earth. We have in America the highest quality of constructive, engineering, and business ability in the world. Yet since the Civil War we have had no considerable merchant marine. The gentleman says that if we allow our people to buy foreign ships we may have a merchant marine. Well, possibly so, though I doubt it, but at a cost that the great majority of the American people are not willing to pay—by closing American shipyards.

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MONDELL. Just a brief question.

Mr. GARNER. Does the gentleman agree to the premise that if all restrictions were removed American ingenuity and capital are capable of competing with any other ingenuity or capital in the world?

Mr. SNYDER. It might be, except in the raising of Angora goats. [Laughter.]

Mr. GARNER. The gentleman from Wyoming just paid a great tribute to American ingenuity and American resources. I want to know if he agrees to the proposition that American ingenuity and American capital are equal to those of any other nation on the earth and on the high seas; and if so, why do we not remove whatever impediment keeps us from investing in that enterprise?

Mr. MONDELL. We can only remove the principal impediment by reducing American wages and the standard of American living, and we are not prepared to do that.

Mr. GARNER. Yet this subsidy does not go to American wages at all. It goes to capital entirely.

Mr. MONDELL. In order to enable American capital to pay American wages on American ships carrying the American flag. [Applause.]

After all is said and done, every man who has ever studied the question knows—and there can be no reasonable difference of opinion on that subject—that the only real reason why we have not had a great merchant marine in modern times, that a merchant marine has not been built up, is because we pay in America higher wages, we provide more men for the same service, we feed American seamen better, we give them more space, we have better laws for their comfort and their protection. Our costs of building are higher, our costs of maintenance are higher—every cost from the time the keel of the ship is laid down until the voyage is ended is greater primarily because American wages are higher and American standards of living are higher. It is to overcome that handicap, a handicap which we do not want to have removed, a handicap that we would not wipe out if we could, that we are proposing to pay for the shipping service that shall be performed a small sum, measuring, as near as we can determine, the difference in cost growing out of American wages and American standards of living.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Does the gentleman dispute the fact stated in the report of the marine architects that the wages paid in Norway and Sweden are equally as high as the wages paid in this country?

Mr. MONDELL. I dispute any statement made by anybody that wages anywhere on earth are permanently, ordinarily, or regularly as high as American wages.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Then the gentleman refuses to take that testimony?

Mr. MONDELL. I do not know of any such statement made by reliable authority.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. The gentleman will find it in the hearings, and it is in the article that I read a little while ago.

Mr. MONDELL. Some one may have put such a statement in the hearings. I have not seen it; but the man who attempts to tell me that wages on foreign ships are as high as they are on American ships I would listen to in the same frame and attitude of mind that I would to the man trying to make me believe that the wages in Germany at this time are as high as in the United States.

If there is any one thing that is settled and established beyond peradventure, it is the fact that American wages are higher than the wages anywhere else on earth and that American standards of living are higher than the standards of living existing anywhere in the world. I am proud of the fact and I would not change it.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Does the gentleman mean—

Mr. MONDELL. Now, the gentleman from Texas had two or three hours in which to make his speech. I have only a few moments.

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman allow me to ask just one question and then I will quit?

Mr. MONDELL. Very briefly.

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman explain how it is that labor, so far as this record goes, appears to be opposed to this bill? If it is in the interest of labor, are the laboring men so ignorant that they do not know what is for their own interest?

Mr. MONDELL. I differentiate between labor and labor leaders. Sometimes labor is unwisely led by unwise leaders. That occurred to a considerable extent in the recent election. That is something time will adjust. I have great confidence in American labor and in the American laboring men, but unfortunately I can not have equal confidence in some American labor leaders, and the gentleman from Texas will not disagree with me on that proposition. [Applause.]

In conclusion let me say that the fact we have had no considerable merchant marine for over half a century, notwithstanding American capacity and aptitude for the sea, is conclusive evidence that there is a handicap, a differential which American genius and business ability can not unaided overcome. Perhaps it was not wise to attempt to overcome it by Government aid in the building of a merchant fleet. But we have the fleet. What shall we do with it? That is the question.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wyoming has expired.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT].

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, in the very nature of things those who are members of the committee and before whom hearings have been had upon proposed legislation, are best informed on the subject, and are best equipped, in a serious argument such as this has been, to present the real facts and the proper reasoning based upon those facts to the House of Representatives for its information. I think the members of the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries have certainly been true to that rule. It has been a long while since I have heard in the House, taking it as a whole, as high-class discussion as there has been on this measure by the members of the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries.

The gentlemen from that committee who are opposing this bill have presented to those who have heard their speeches and to those who have read their arguments, substantially, it seems to me, all that can be said on the subject; possibly not all that can be said, but at least they have laid before us the facts and every principle that is involved. I shall not attempt to paint the lily which they have developed.

It does seem to me, however, that there are certain superficial arguments that have been made by the proponents of this legislation to which some attention should be given. The President of the United States began that argument and I referred to it in discussing the rule. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BEGG] a few moments ago, with perhaps more force than anyone who preceded him, elaborated upon those matters, and the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL], who followed, reiterated what he had said. I refer to the allegation that certain appropriations for certain public purposes are on all fours with this proposition for a ship subsidy. Gentlemen referred to the appropriations for agriculture. Now, let us see about that a moment.

Appropriations for the extermination of boll weevil have been specifically mentioned; also appropriations for the improvement of growing live stock, and a clear intimation has been given that they are solely for the benefit of the farmer or a subsidy to the farmer. I have never understood that to be the theory upon which those appropriations were made.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Certainly.

Mr. MONDELL. Who made any such suggestion that these were appropriations in the nature of a subsidy, and particularly for the benefit of the farmer?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I understood the gentleman from Wyoming to say specifically in answer to a question by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. NELSON], when the latter asked him to name any parallel cases, that all he [Mr. MONDELL] had named were parallel to this proposed in the bill before us.

Mr. MONDELL. Oh, I did not say that those appropriations or these appropriations we are proposing in this bill were either primarily or wholly for the benefit of those who receive them or of those on whose behalf they were directly made. They were all made upon the theory that they worked for the public good and the public welfare.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I propose to undertake to distinguish between those appropriations and the policy that is provided in this bill. The appropriations for agriculture, of course, are made because there is a demand that a full amount of cotton shall be grown in the world in order to clothe the world, and there is a demand that a full amount of meat and a full amount of wheat and other food products shall be grown in order to feed the world.

I refer now to the reference that has been made to irrigation as a subsidy, or as something on all fours with this proposition. I have not so understood that. I have very cheerfully supported irrigation legislation here ever since I have been a Member of Congress, and I never dreamed of the fact that in so doing I was voting a subsidy. I do not think so now. I have understood this to be the situation: That the Government entered upon these irrigation projects for the purpose of improving its own property, that in the end, when this property was disposed of to the citizens of this country, it was required that there should be paid back into the Treasury of the United States for the property an amount sufficient to cover every cent expended by the Government in making it habitable and fit for cultivation, together with interest thereon. If I am in error about that, if it has been a subsidy, then these gentlemen from the West have put one over on me that I was not aware was being put over.

Mr. J. M. NELSON. Did not the Government require a certain amount of pay for the waters that were used, and did the money go to private parties in the way of a gift?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I have never understood that anything in the way of a gift was ever requested. As I say, when the Government sold its own lands, which it improved, it charged the purchaser sufficient to cover the Government cost, and whenever the private landowner has used the water from the irrigation ditches he has been charged enough to cover the cost of the service.

Mr. CARTER. The cost of production and the water, both.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS] referred to the land grants to the railroads. Those grants were made a good while ago. Some gentleman suggested many scandals had grown out of that. I have no criticism of that policy, but what was the situation? Across a thousand miles or more the Government of the United States owned millions, unnumbered millions, of acres of land that were absolutely worthless until they could be opened up to settlement and cultivation.

The best method to open them up to settlement and cultivation was to have highways of transportation through that territory, and every acre that was given to the railroad companies in order to enable them to construct those lines of railway and open them up to settlement enhanced the value by tenfold of the lands which the Government retained, and which could never have been enhanced in any other way. The Government, the Treasury of the United States, the people of the United States, had nothing taken from their pockets by those land grants, wherever the laws were honestly administered, but on the contrary the wealth of the whole people was increased by unnumbered billions of dollars by those advances to the construction of railways.

Mr. Chairman, it remained for the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BEGG] to raise a sectional question in this matter, a question that I did not know existed relative to it, and I yet do not see how it can exist. He referred to appropriations that certain Southern States had obtained for certain purposes, and certain Western States. I do not know, but I sometimes wonder how long it is going to be before the Republican politicians in Ohio learn that the Civil War is over. I think the story lately told along that line must have originated somewhere in Ohio; of course, not amongst the old soldiers, because they would know better, but it must come from certain politicians up there. It must have been one of them who suggested that they better shoot the mail carriers, because they wore gray suits. The poor fellow thought they were Confederate soldiers. [Laughter.]

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BEGG] dealt with emphasis on the amount that has been paid out for the construction of Federal highways. I remember the gentleman opposed that last session, and made very much the same argument that I made when it was originally instituted. I opposed it, but I never opposed it upon the theory that it was a subsidy. The gentleman wholly misconstrues when he attempts to put the matter proposed in this bill on a parallel with an appropriation for highway purposes.

Mr. BEGG. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. BEGG. The burden of the argument on the Democratic side against the bill has been upon the question of taxation. I merely showed that it would not cost the gentleman's State anything, or if it did cost it anything it would be 9 cents a head. If that is sectional, well and good.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I am very glad the gentleman has made that statement, because I probably would have forgotten to refer to it if he had not interrupted me. The gentleman has heretofore spoken of the payment of Federal taxes by States. Of course, from the people of some States there come more Federal taxes than come from the people of other States. Why? Because they have more to pay with. And why do they have more to pay with? Because, following the lines that have been followed throughout all the history of the world, there are great centers of population, great centers of finance, centers of industry, where men build up fortunes, but they are making those fortunes out of the people of the other States as well as out of the sections in which they happen to reside. [Applause.] It is no reflection upon my State that its citizens do not happen to have the income upon which to pay as much tax as do the citizens of the State of Ohio.

Mr. BEGG. Will the gentleman yield to a further question?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Certainly.

Mr. BEGG. Does not the gentleman think that he is making a mountain out of a molehill in opposing a proposition that is wanted by the States that are going to pay for it, when he concedes that it is not going to cost him anything?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I hope the gentleman will get my idea. I am opposed to taking out of the Treasury, no matter by whom it is paid in, if it be paid in under any just system of taxation, any sum of money and using it for the benefit of a particular class or of a particular individual. [Applause.] That is a principle of government by which I stand.

Mr. BEGG. Then if certain sections want to tax themselves for something, granting that it is going to benefit them more than some other section, the gentleman believes this system of government gives him the right to say to the people of Ohio, to the people of Pennsylvania, and of New York, that they shall not do it.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Oh, no. If the shipowners want to raise the fund and run these ships, I do not object to it.

Mr. BEGG. Let us stay right on the proposition. The gentleman surely does not wish to duck it. Is the gentleman in favor of having his State most vigorously opposed to something that he admits will not cost him anything, but that will cost the other States something? Is it any reason why you should say we shall not have it, just because you do not pay the tax?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Oh, well, the gentleman's argument would lead us to this situation—

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I extend the gentleman's time for 10 minutes.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee (continuing). That so far as Government activities are concerned, there ought to be some sort of severance or separation. The logic of the gentleman would lead absolutely to that end.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. If the gentleman will yield right there, is it not true, Tennessee and Texas having been especially alluded to, that they pay as much in proportion to their wealth as Ohio?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Undoubtedly, if the tax laws are being fairly administered, and I presume they are. The gentleman from Ohio referred particularly to roads, and many gentlemen referred to roads, and the President referred to highways being constructed.

Now these highways are being constructed for the benefit of all the people. They are open to every individual. If the gentleman from Ohio, as I hope he shall some time, chooses to drive over the splendid roads of his State down through Kentucky and Tennessee, over the roads when we get them completed there, as I hope we shall before long, those roads will be free to him, but we are not going to pay his chauffeur for driving the car over them.

Mr. BEGG. Will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. If the gentleman from Ohio should hire a car and the Government pay part of the charge, that would be on all fours with this bill.

Mr. BEGG. Right there. The gentleman certainly would not have the gall to charge me to go over those roads when every dollar raised from Kentucky and Tennessee was matched by $2 from Ohio to build those roads?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. The gentleman would be welcome in there.

Mr. BEGG. I hope so.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Without charge. He would not expect to pay a subsidy for the car that he happened to hire to drive over there, or expect the Federal Government and the State of Ohio to put up two for one for hire of his car.

Mr. BEGG. If I had the choice of riding in my car or a British car or a Jap car, I would ride in mine and subsidize it; yes.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Well, of course, the gentleman realizes he has laid down a most preposterous proposition. [Laughter.] The gentleman surely does realize that there is a difference between furnishing avenues of transportation and furnishing vehicles of transportation.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I will yield.

Mr. MONDELL. Assuming the avenue of transportation is available by nature and that avenue can not be utilized for the benefit of the American people, what about it then? Would the gentleman say the Federal Government, which was justified in one case in providing the necessary avenue, would not in another case be justified in providing the means of utilizing the avenue that nature provided? What is the difference?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. The difference is very great. All the nations have access to the seas of the world.

Mr. MONDELL. That makes our problem the greater.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. We, so far as the "avenue" is concerned, stand on an equal footing with all the rest of the world.

Mr. MONDELL. Yes; but we wear better clothes, eat better food, receive higher compensation for our efforts, thank God. [Applause.]

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Oh, well, of course the fact remains that the last act of this Congress before it adjourned was to undertake—it has always been my understanding, I do not know much about the shipping business, but it has always been my understanding that a ship to be successful must have a cargo both ways—as I say, the last act of this Republican Congress immediately before adjournment was designed to prevent any American ship, or any other ship, from bringing a return cargo from abroad [applause] by the passage of the protective tariff law by which they undertook to prohibit importations as far as they dared.

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman who ran against me in the late campaign voted for that proposition.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. So I have understood. [Laughter.] It was a choice in his State, I presume, between two excellent gentlemen, one of whom had offended the political proprieties in one respect, while the other had offended them in a number of respects. [Laughter and applause.]

Of course, Mr. Chairman, we need not deceive ourselves about what this bill means. It is the institution of a new policy in this country. It is the institution of the subsidy system which has been always rejected when squarely presented to the people.

It is objectionable in many respects; not alone because of the principle involved in it, but because of other things which have already been pointed out by gentlemen who have preceded me, and which will probably be further elaborated upon under the five-minute rule. It is undemocratic. It is a violation of other fundamental things of government. If we subsidize this class, where shall we end? If this class can come to us and appeal, what will be the next class to arise and appeal successfully?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I will.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. It think already we have some evidence of the extension of the subsidy system to the Muscle Shoals proposition. For instance, did the gentleman favor a general subsidy to the fertilizer business?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Well, I understand these shipowners desire us practically to give them the ships and then pay them for taking them. Mr. Ford asks us to sell—

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. And to give $5,000,000 for the $106,000,000 we have put in and then put $50,000,000 more in, that is all.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. The percentage he offered is about as high as the percentage offered for these ships, but he does not ask us that he be subsidized.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. One hundred years, and, of course, we shall all live to see the truth or falsity of the comparison by that time.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Well, that is the difference between those two propositions. Mr. Ford is not asking that the Government Treasury be opened to him.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Only to the extent of $50,000,000 to start with.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. No, indeed. The gentleman is very much mistaken. Mr. Ford is only asking that the Government complete the property.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Yes.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. That is what is to be done with these ships that are to be sold at 7 per cent of their cost.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. It depends upon what name you call the jimmy that you break into the Treasury with; but the fact remains that you lose that money out of the Treasury.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Of course, he is not going to give what it cost, nor do the purchasers of the ships propose to give what the ships cost. But Mr. Ford proposes to pay back every dollar of what the Government puts in.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. He does not propose to pay it back. He proposes to pay back a sum which, if amortized by our Government, might in time equal that sum. Mr. Ford only proposes to pay back about $9,000,000.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Well, we hope—and I will express the hope now—that soon we may have an opportunity to fight that question out on the floor of the House. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. TINCER].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. TINCER. Mr. Chairman, I ask to have read in my time the resolution adopted by the National Grange, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the resolution referred to will be read.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolution adopted November 24, 1922, by the National Grange in national session at Wichita, Kans.:

"Resolved, That the National Grange in the fifty-sixth annual session, assembled at Wichita, Kans., November 24, 1922, and representing nearly 1,000,000 organized farmers of America, hereby declare its unalterable opposition to all ship subsidy legislation and to every form of direct subsidies to private enterprises; and

"It hereby pledges the full strength of the organization toward the defeat of whatever form of ship subsidy legislation has been or hereafter may be introduced in Congress.

"If upon investigation it is found that the American merchant marine is handicapped in its operation by present conditions and laws, then the grange favors a revision of the navigation laws rather than Government aid through a ship subsidy."

C. M. FREEMAN, Secretary.

[Applause.]

Mr. TINCER. Mr. Chairman, it has not been my purpose even to take any time in the discussion of this matter. But I was requested at noon to-day by the head of the Farmers' Union from my State, which organization, I will state, is also opposed to this subsidy, to present this matter in this way. When I came on the floor to secure permission to present it I was permitted to hear the old stock argument that "We pay the taxes and you do not pay any taxes, and therefore let us do this thing unto you."

I am tired of that argument. And then, to add insult to injury, my friend from Ohio [Mr. BEGG] says Illinois pays so much taxes, while the West pays none. I am trying to get some legislation through the Congress whereby some time in the future maybe the man who produces a bushel of wheat may be able to pay a little income tax, the same as the fellow that profiteers in wheat.

I believe this has been an instructive debate, and I hope seriously that between now and the time this debate closes some of those in control of this bill will answer the charge made here this morning, in which the question was asked, Who will be the beneficiaries of this subsidy? I want to know whether it is true or not that the great corporation that we speak of as the Standard Oil Co., through the subsidiary company, operates these ships and that they simply want a subsidy so that they can keep on paying the big dividends they have heretofore been paying to the company proper; and I want to know whether they will be the first to borrow from the Shipping Board Corporation money at 2 per cent interest. And I want to know whether the United States Steel Corporation will be the second beneficiary, and whether the United Fruit Co. will be the third.

I have spoken of this to-day with all the men that I could that are informed about this matter, and if that is not true it should be denied. If it is true, the Standard Oil will not be the first beneficiary of the bill; if that statement is true and can not be successfully denied, then the Democratic Party will be the principal beneficiary by the enactment of any such legislation as this. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kansas has expired.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. BLAND], a member of the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia is recognized for 15 minutes.

Mr. BLAND of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BLAND of Virginia. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I do not claim any particular ability to enlighten the committee after the elaborate debates which have been conducted for the last three days. I believe that the Republican members of the committee, the proponents of the bill, have ably presented all of the reasons that could be urged for its adoption, and, on the other hand, the opponents of the bill have presented the case fully and fairly. Further debate could only be repetition of arguments and facts already forcefully presented.

I was struck with one significant statement in the argument of the distinguished leader of this House, the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL]. The gentleman from Wyoming said that he was satisfied that if this question were fairly and fully and clearly presented to the people of the country they would strongly indorse the Republican position. I have considerable confidence in the ability of the Republican Members of this House. I believe that they measure up in intelligence with the average of the country; in fact, I believe that they are a little better. I have considerable confidence in the intelligence of the gentleman from Wyoming, the leader of the Republican majority, and it is indeed surprising to me, if the gentleman from Wyoming and the Republicans felt that the people of the country indorsed this legislation, that they should have postponed consideration of this bill to an extra session called after the election in November, when they had from June until November in which to put the legislation across. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

There was evidently considerable fear on the part of the distinguished leader that they might not be able fairly and honestly and clearly to present this legislation so satisfactorily to the people of the country as to receive their indorsement at the November election.

I was also struck in the course of the debate with another significant fact. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BEGG], for whom I have considerable respect, took to task one of the witnesses who appeared before the committee for certain language used, and I do not blame him for doing so, for I think that the language was untimely and unseemly, and I do not believe in unnecessary criticisms or in criticisms of that character upon the President of the United States, even when he does not belong to my own party. But, oh, gentlemen, I thought at that time how much better it would have been if the distinguished gentleman from Ohio could have been in this House in the Sixty-sixth Congress and in the closing days of the Sixty-fifth Congress, when the animadversions and attacks that were made upon the then President of the United States came not from irresponsible witnesses before a committee but from responsible Members upon the floor of the House. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

I earnestly hope that the sentiment which the distinguished gentleman from Ohio has urged here to-day may be the sentiment that will actuate and impel not only our side of the House while your President has charge of the country's affairs but that it will also actuate those of you who shall be here after 1924, when a Democratic President will very probably have charge of the affairs of the country. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Gentlemen, it is perfectly useless for me to attempt to go into the minute details of this bill. Like the distinguished gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] I am opposed to subsidies, and in the extension of my remarks I hope to present, if permitted to do so under the rules, an excerpt from an opinion rendered by no less distinguished a jurist than Judge Cooley, of Michigan, in which he explained as clearly as it was possible to explain why subsidies were dangerous either in State or National Governments.

But in the brief time allotted to me there is just one thing to which I wish to call your attention. You have been shown something about the vast powers that are vested in the Shipping Board; and though I do not possess the ability of the proverbial Philadelphia lawyer, to go through this bill and take up all the powers vested in the Shipping Board, yet I want to call your attention to a summary of some of the remarkable powers vested in them.

1. To sell privately ships of the American people without advertisement and without competition and on any terms it pleases.

Of course it is given permission to advertise, but it is given power to sell without advertisement.

2. To destroy any port within certain geographical divisions by selling ships from that port. For, notwithstanding by the provisions of section 2 the board shall not for the period of two years after the passage of the act sell vessels engaged in serving such ports to persons other than those who have the support, financial and otherwise, of the domestic communities primarily interested in such lines, yet the act defines domestic communities primarily interested in such lines to mean the geographical divisions of coast lines of the United States known as North Atlantic, South Atlantic, Gulf, and Pacific coasts; and as a result, since New York and Hampton Roads are in the North Atlantic group, vessels engaged in service from Hampton Roads may be bought by lines from New York, to the destruction of Hampton Roads, and the same applies as between the ports of Galveston and Mobile and New Orleans.

Mr. J. M. NELSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLAND of Virginia. I hate not to yield, but I have only 15 minutes.

Mr. J. M. NELSON. I want to know what "financial or otherwise" means? What does that word "otherwise" mean?

Mr. BLAND of Virginia. I can not explain that.

3. The board also have the power to play favorites in lending for construction and equipment, inasmuch as they may select whomsoever they choose to be the beneficiaries of the loan fund.

To give or refuse subsidies as they please, and without any right of review or appeal. You come in, inexperienced, in the opinion of the Shipping Board, and yet running your line for a number of years. I come in, the favorite of the Shipping Board, and we ask for our subsidies, and under the powers of this bill the Shipping Board has the right to say to you, "I will not give you $1 of subsidy, but I will give to the other fellow twice as much as he asks for."

4. The board also has the power to give subsidies to feeders, though they never come to American ports.

5. To pay subsidies for three years to companies on their American-owned ships, though a large part of their tonnage is not under the American flag, and though at the end of that three years such company decides to keep its foreign-owned ships under a foreign flag. This would operate for the benefit of the International Mercantile Marine, only 10 per cent of whose fleet is under the American flag, and 90 per cent sailing under other flags.

6. To double compensation, and after a contract is made, which may be for 10 years, the Shipping Board may, with the consent of the other party, decrease the subsidies that are granted or, without his consent, increase his subsidies.

Do you suppose anybody is going to object to an increase in his subsidy?

The Shipping Board is given the right to say, "We have contracted with this fellow on a basis of so much, but it is not enough; he is not asking for any more, but we want him to get some more profit; we will give him double the basic subsidy." That is the power that is vested in the Shipping Board. Then, another thing—and why this is put in I do not know—that any person receiving a subsidy who has contracted with the Shipping Board may cancel his contract at any time without the consent of the Shipping Board, except that the cancellation shall not affect his obligation to repay subsidies or maintain routes.

Just there, gentlemen, I want to say something about that obligation to repay. We have heard a great deal about this 10 per cent; that just as soon as they earn 10 per cent the balance is coming back into the Treasury—that is, one-half of the excess—until the subsidy is returned. For what period, gentlemen? For the taxable year when the subsidy is received. In other words, the plain effect of this bill is that if the contract is made for double subsidies and payments are made through five lean years, five years when they are making only 9 per cent, five years when they do not pay back anything, and if suddenly there should come a turn in business, if suddenly business conditions throughout the world should be stabilized, if suddenly there should be rich profits to these shipowners, what do they do? Do they pay back the subsidies that they have received during the lean years? Not on your tintype. They do not pay back anything except the subsidy received that year, when they did not need to receive any subsidy.

I should like to know, then, what benefit there is under this provision that we are going to recoup to the Treasury the subsidies that are paid. It creates the impression in the public mind that if there should be an upturn in business the subsidies that have been paid may be recovered into the Treasury, when the plain reading of this bill shows that that is not the case. That is not the report of the gentlemen presenting the bill. The whole truth about the business is that they say if they earn more than 10 per cent one-half of the excess will be repaid, but they do not give the explanation that that is only for the taxable year.

Mr. EDMONDS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLAND of Virginia. My time is up.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Virginia has expired.

Mr. BLAND of Virginia. Under leave to extend my remarks, I wish to continue further my summary of the extraordinary powers vested in the Shipping Board:

7. The board may make any regulations it deems necessary.

8. The determination of the board as to the amount of compensation to which any person is entitled shall not be subject to review by the General Accounting Office. I submit that such extraordinary power can not be found in any other bureau of the Government.

9. The Shipping Board is given the power to disapprove, cancel, or modify agreements made by carriers, although previously approved by the board. Ordinarily the law seeks to hold parties to their agreements, but this law expressly authorizes them to be made mere scraps of paper if the Shipping Board desires.

10. Pursuant to the policy above outlined, it is made unlawful to carry out any agreement or part thereof disapproved by the board.

11. The board is given power to approve agreements which shall be excepted from the operations of the antitrust act.

I respectfully submit that never before in peace time and seldom, if ever, in time of war have such vast, absolute, and extraordinary powers been vested in any board, bureau, or agency of the Government. Imperative need exists that we shall get away from bureaucratic government. Our opponents promised this, and yet this bill presents a case of bureaucracy run mad.

Though vesting such extraordinary and unusual powers in the Shipping Board, though making the board the distributors of vast funds for the merchant marine without right of review or appeal, without review even by the General Accounting Office as to the distributions made for compensation, though empowering the board to select the beneficiaries of the fund and enabling it to make or break whom it pleases, yet these unusual powers are not enough and the bill proceeds also to permanently appropriate the moneys in the merchant marine fund. This is probably intended to safeguard the beneficiaries of this legislation from any question as to its unconstitutionality and to bring the fund within the operation of United States v. Realty Co. and United States v. Gay (163 U. S. 427), wherein it was held that the question of the unconstitutionality of the sugar bounty act was immaterial to the decision for the reason that when the parties manufactured sugar under the provisions of the act they did not know it to be unconstitutional, that equitable considerations can attach to a claim which, among other grounds, is based upon an act that was supposed by all the officers of the Government to be valid and that Congress could legally recognize and pay the claim founded on such act though the act was unconstitutional.

In my remarks about subsidies I referred to a statement by Judge Cooley. The same is to be found in People v. Township (20 Mich. 452) and is as follows:

But it is not in the power of the State, in my opinion, under the name of a bounty or under any other cover or subterfuge to furnish the capital to set private parties up in any kind of business or to subsidize their business after they have entered upon it. A bounty law of which this is the real nature is void whatever may be the pretense on which it may be enacted. The right to hold out pecuniary inducements to the faithful performance of public duty in dangerous or responsible positions stands upon a different footing altogether. Nor have I any occasion to question the right to pay rewards for the destruction of wild beasts and other public pests, a provision of this character being a mere police regulation. But the discrimination by the State between different classes of occupations and the favoring of one at the expense of the rest, whether that one be farming or banking, merchandising or milling, printing or railroading, is not legitimate legislation and is an invasion of that equality of right and privilege which is a maxim in State government. When the door is once opened to it, there is no line at which we can stop and say with confidence that thus far we may go with safety and propriety but no farther. Every honest employment is honorable; it is beneficial to the public; it deserves encouragement. The more successful we can make it, the more does it generally subserve the public good. But it is not the business of the State to make discriminations in favor of one class against another or in favor of one employment against another. The State can have no favorites. Its business is to protect the industry of all and to give all the benefit of equal laws. It can not compel an unwilling minority to submit to taxation in order that it may keep upon its feet any business that can not stand alone. Moreover, it is not a weak interest only that can give plausible reasons for public aid. When the State once enters upon the business of subsidies, we shall not fail to discover that the strong and powerful interests are those most likely to control legislation, and that the weaker will be taxed to enhance the profits of the stronger.

The aids contemplated by the bill comprehend so-called indirect and direct aids, the last of which may be more appropriately denominated subsidies.

The so-called indirect aids are—

1. The sale of ships on easy terms with 15 years as maximum time within which to make payment and interest to be at 4 per cent.

2. The creation of a loan fund of $125,000,000 on interest at 2 per cent, and all interest from same to go back into the fund to be used in building or reconditioning ships, one-third of cost to be borne by the owner, the selection of beneficiaries and types of ships to be constructed to be in Shipping Board.

3. Income tax of owner of vessels of 1,500 gross tons and over engaged in coastwise or foreign trade to receive as a deduction from net income an amount which bears the same ratio to his net income during the taxable year attributable to the operations of such vessels as his gross income attributable to the foreign operations of such vessel, provided a like amount be contributed by the owner for building purposes, and within a reasonable time which is not defined such fund may be used in building in private shipyards of United States of new vessels of a type and kind approved by the board, to be used in either foreign or coastwise trade.

4. Exemption of gains on vessels launched prior to January 1, 1914, if set aside in a trust fund to build in private American yards new ships of type and kind approved by board for use in either foreign or coastwise trade.

5. A liberal deduction is allowed from income taxes for depreciation on vessels, for vessels of 1,000 gross tons or more, acquired after August 1, 1914, and prior to January 1, 1921, that is during period of high prices, for taxable year 1922, and each of four succeeding years; the deduction is allowed for the exceptional decrease in value of such vessels since the date of acquisition. This permits writing off high cost as depreciation.

6. Persons shipping either exports or imports are allowed 5 per cent of freights on shipments in American bottoms as a credit on income tax. The only limitation is against persons transporting their own goods in their own vessels or in vessels in which they are affiliated to the extent of ownership of 50 per cent of the stock.

This is a credit on income and not merely a reduction.

As illustrating the operation of this provision, it is to be remembered that Morris & Co. ship a trainload of provisions out of Chicago every two weeks, so that to that firm alone this provision would be highly beneficial.

Great importing and exporting houses would likewise receive material credit.

Mr. Marvin, vice president and general manager of American Steamship Owners' Association, and Mr. Lasker say this is more beneficial than section 34 of the merchant marine act of 1920 would have been, yet shipowners, shipbuilders, and all interested hailed section 34 as salvation of American merchant marine.

The estimated cost of this provision to the Treasury is $10,000,000.

7. The immigration provisions of the bill, whereby 50 per cent of immigrants are required to be carried in American bottoms, and it is said that this would mean $8,000,000 to merchant marine. Mr. Rossbottom says the immigrant business would give occupation to not less than 25 good-sized passenger ships in the North Atlantic where the competition is the strongest.

8. The Army and Navy transport services are to be discontinued, and contracts made with private parties, at a cost to the Treasury of something like $5,000,000, according to some, although this is denied by others. The minority sought to have witnesses produced by the War Department to establish the facts, but the majority of the committee would not summon them and the War Department would not order them to come.

9. Railroads are permitted to own steamship lines, and preferential rates are permitted.

10. Government officials and supplies required to be transported under American flag where practicable.

11. Tonnage duties are to be doubled and this is increased to about $4,000,000.

12. American ships to carry mail to cost about $5,000,000, but this is said to be no increase over present charge.

Even if it be assumed that some of these indirect aids are desirable, that some aid could be furnished upon the principle of postal subventions, or that some form of admiralty or naval subvention could be worked out, if needed for national defense, yet the proponents of this bill gave no opportunity to secure facts from which such a policy might be formulated. The purpose seemed to be subsidy as proposed or nothing. I believe this bill to be uneconomical, undemocratic, and fundamentally wrong. I believe that if such a thing could be possible it is more vicious than the monopolistic tariff system provided in the existing Fordney-McCumber bill. It is said that it is not contemplated that this subsidy system shall be more than experimental. It is well known that it was claimed originally that the protective-tariff system would not be fastened permanently upon the country, and yet there has been enacted recently into law a bill which is more iniquitous than any of its predecessors. The efforts now to collect enormous sums from the pockets of the people, to be turned over to shipowners, are caused largely by conditions which it is, or ought to be, known will be brought about by an iniquitous tariff which will compel our ships to return from many ports empty. It has been said very truly that a ship subsidy would be worse than futile if the present tariff system is to be pursued. Such a course would be a cumulative imposition of a needless burden upon American enterprises and industry.

It is especially significant that witnesses appearing for the Shipping Board were reluctant to discuss the effect of the high-tariff policy on the merchant marine. Mr. Lasker, chairman of the board, said that one of the main advantages for the lack of which we suffer with an American merchant marine is that while we have full outgoing cargoes we have not full incoming cargoes or anything like it. He asks, "Is it due to a high protective tariff?" He then says expressly that it is not his purpose to get into that.

Mr. Love, who is in charge of operations for the Shipping Board, says that if our ships come home in ballast, then our outward voyage must approximately pay the cost of the voyage, and that means our outward freights are so high as to overhead as to curb the export trade of this country. While many of the advocates of this bill attempt to justify their claims upon the ground that this bill is necessary for naval defense, yet Mr. Love, speaking for the Shipping Board, says that this bill is a subsidy for the development of foreign trade.

In my opinion, the policy of direct subsidies entered upon will not stop either with the payments provided in the pending bill or with the merchant marine. Several witnesses appearing before the committee testified to the inadequacy, in their opinion, of the subsidies provided, notwithstanding that under the bill they may be increased to double the amounts specified. Many of the beneficiary shipowners claimed that the period of 10 years was too short. One witness claimed that the subsidy, once commenced, would continue certainly 50 years, while another was of opinion that it would be in perpetuity. The hearings and history of subsidies in other countries lead irresistibly to the conclusion that subsidies, once commenced, will continue indefinitely and will increase in amount. It is said that Great Britain pays subsidies. This is not true if we use subsidies in the sense of navigation bounties, as the direct aids in the bill may be more accurately called. Mr. Lissner, one of the commissioners of the Shipping Board, said that Great Britain had never given anything, so far as he knew, purely as a subsidy to build up her merchant marine. Mr. Burns, American merchant marine officer, graduate of the Massachusetts Training School, and during the war an officer in the American Navy, in articles contributed by him to the Baltimore Evening Sun, said that it might be generally stated that the British had not subsidized shipping, except that subsidy given for services rendered in conveying mail, and that it was generally admitted that subsidy had not been important in building up British shipping and trade.

It has not been shown that subsidies have anywhere increased the commerce of the country paying the same, but the world's experience is to the contrary.

France is the best illustration of a country which has undertaken to build up her merchant marine by subsidies, both in the shape of navigation and construction bounties. She has even gone so far as to pay sums so large that her ships sailed the seas in ballast to secure the navigation bounties. Yet, notwithstanding the large sums paid by France in navigation bounties, in mail pay, and in shipbuilding bounties, her merchant marine increased in 24 years vastly less, proportionately, than the increase during the same period of the shipping of Great Britain and Germany. France found when her first subsidy measure expired that she was faced with requests for increase, and she has found that, once started, the policy is unending.

The experience of Italy has been similar to that of France.

In Japan, under a policy of subsidies, its shipping only increased from 301,101 tons in 1895 to 1,705,386 in 1914, an increase of 1,407,285 tons during a period of 19 years. In a report on "Marine and dock industrial relations," prepared for the Shipping Board, it is said:

For a commercially rapidly progressive country like Japan this is far from extraordinary; it could hardly have been less if it had not paid a cent in subsidies. This increase is about 70,000 tons a year, or less than 10 moderate-sized cargo ships.

In a "Report on the history of shipping discriminations and on various forms of Government aid to shipping," compiled by the United States Shipping Board, the following conclusion is reached:

A study of the authorities on subsidies, taking into account the policies adopted by various countries, would seem to indicate that, with the exception of Japan, the policy has not been important in the building up of a merchant marine.

In the same report it is said that the best discussion of the subject is to be found in Dr. Royal Meeker's History of Shipping Subsidies, printed in the third series, volume 6, No. 3, of the publications of the American Economic Association. That author, after discussing the growth of the Japanese merchant marine, says that a closer scrutiny of history compels an impartial mind to recognize that the testimony of the facts is not at all in favor of the subsidies.

The majority report concludes:

A permanent and healthy merchant marine can never be established merely by paying subsidies.

Mr. Hurley, once chairman of the Shipping Board, has said:

This insistence upon a Government subsidy is one of the characteristics that the modernization of the steamship business along American lines and the infusion of new blood infected by the traditions of other days must chance.

Again:

No progress can be made by people who continually wail that they can not compete.

SUBSIDIES ONCE COMMENCED, OTHERS WILL FOLLOW.

It is almost certain that if this policy of subsidies is once commenced other interests will quickly seek similar aids. The proponents of ship subsidy may seek to distinguish this industry on the ground of national preparedness. Other interests will find equally plausible grounds on which to base their claims, and if a sufficiently strong organization of financial interests can be secured, they will stand a reasonable chance of securing the legislation they desire. Let the limit under the protective-tariff system be reached, as seems to have been the case, and the next recourse will be to subsidies. The dye manufacturers will quickly fall in line. Not many years past the sugar producers secured a bounty, but the law was soon repealed. The woolgrowers have already sought a subsidy. Potash producers have very recently sought to secure a subsidy, and there has been introduced in this Congress a bill to provide for a bounty to growers of long-staple cotton.

There are many other serious objections to the operation of the direct-subsidy provisions. In my opinion, they operate only affiliated concerns without regard to the taxpayers. Already we have a vast tonnage to be disposed of which can be gotten at world prices or less. The fleet contemplated by experts of the Shipping Board comprises 3,600,000 tons of slow cargo ships, and we have already available 10,000,000 tons, one-half of which is said to be in first-class condition. Then, 1,250,000 tons of fast cargo ships, of which we have available 400,000 tons of fast cargo ships and 925,000 tons of passenger and construction vessels.

It is said that a balanced fleet would only require 1,400,000 gross tons of tankers, and yet there are available now privately owned tankers of 1,600,000 gross tons and Government-owned tanker tonnage of 550,000 tons. These privately owned tankers are owned by Standard Oil, Texas Co., and Texas Steamship Co., Tidewater and Sinclair Oil companies, and like concerns. According to Mr. Merrill, as of November 1, 1921, this privately owned tonnage would receive in direct subsidy $4,644,000. These tankers are owned by companies whose dividends show no need for a subsidy from the people, and the money is to be paid notwithstanding the present ownership under American flag of a larger tonnage than the so-called balanced fleet requires.

According to this bill, small combination vessels such as run to the Caribbean, possessing an average gross tonnage of 5,500 tons, with speed probably under 13 or 14 knot rate, and mileage possibly 45,000 miles per year, would receive subsidy which would be $20,000 to $25,000 per year. These are vessels owned by concerns like Atlantic, Gulf & West Indies Co., which made a net profit greater than its capital in 1915-1920, and during 1921, the worst time in the history of shipping, made an income of $1,781,337, after deducting all expenses, taxes, interest, and losses on sale of Liberty bonds.

BURDEN UPON PEOPLE.

According to Mr. Merrill, when the Shipping Board program gets into full effect the direct subsidy alone will cost $32,000,000, or $2,000,000 more than Mr. Lasker's statement, but Mr. Merrill very frankly admits that he does not think that there is any accuracy in either his or Mr. Lasker's statement, and in answer to a question from Mr. BANKHEAD as to how Congress is going to be guided then in its deliberations, says that it is the "best guess" that can be made. He says that this estimate does not include double aids; as to them no one can speak, since under the bill the power to give or refuse them will rest with the Shipping Board, which may make or break any line it pleases.

The above figures leave out of consideration additional burdens upon the people in the shape of tax exemptions, approximately $10,000,000, tax reductions for new tonnage not estimated, mail pay about $5,000,000, loss of interest on loan fund about $3,000,000, and unestimated burden on taxpayers because of increased freight rates on domestic shipments necessary to offset lowered rates on ocean shipments.

It is manifest that it is impossible to estimate the cost of this bill to the public even though the basic subsidies alone are given, and the award of basic subsidies only can not be expected in the face of (1) the insistence of representatives of the Steamship Owners' Association that subsidies are too low and the period too short, (2) statements that subsidies must be continued 20 years, 50 years, and in perpetuity, and (3) the experience of other countries which have tried subsidies where almost uniformly increases have followed.

Already notice has been given that increases will be necessary. Mr. Marvin, speaking for American Steamship Owners' Association, says that cargo ships should get increases to amount to about $4,000,000 more and that the subsidy period should be extended from 10 to 20 years.

Mr. Munson, of the Munson Line, advocates a subsidy twice as large as that provided, but says that even now he is operating at a small profit. Further, he advocates mail payments, as at present, in addition to subsidies. He wishes the subsidies for passenger lines increased. And Mr. Marvin, Mr. Raymond, and others, speaking for the American Steamship Association, say the cargo lines must be increased.

Yet as to the passenger lines, Mr. Rosbottom, who operated the Panama line successfully and who has been loaned to the Shipping Board to operate the United States lines, says that if some old ships are taken off his line and others which are more modern are given to him, with some changes to accommodate trade, he will not take his hat off to anybody. This evidence of Mr. Rosbottom relates to the Atlantic trade, and as to the Pacific, Mr. Lasker says the situation is more favorable there. When hearings were had on the bill which proposed to eliminate the transport service in the Pacific and contract with private shipowners for that service, it was argued that with the adoption of such a measure and with the application of coastwise laws to the Philippines the American flag could be maintained upon the Pacific. Yet it is now proposed to give subsidies in addition.

Mr. Pendleton testifying for the bill said the subsidy was not sufficient, though Mr. O'Donnell, chairman of maritime committee of Maritime Association, said that it was his impression that this bill contained all known forms of aids, and it was further said that it might be true that if this bill becomes a law, aside from the indirect aids, it would involve a heavier charge upon the Government Treasury than all the Government aids of every character and description paid by all the other nations on earth combined.

Mr. Raymond, director in Atlantic, Gulf & West Indies Co., president of Clyde Steamship Co., president of Mallory Steamship Co., vice president of Southern Steamship Co., and appearing before the committee for American Steamship Owners' Association, testified that the present rate of subsidy for cargo vessels below 13 knots in speed must be advanced, stating that for all but the largest ships the subsidy provided was manifestly insufficient and would fall short of achieving its purposes. This claim is made in the face of the power in the board to double the subsidies, and in this connection it must be remembered that the owners of the larger lines are making similar claims for their lines.

Already the process of increasing the subsidies has commenced, for in the bill now under consideration and introduced only a few days ago the suggestion of Mr. Munson has been adopted and mail pay is excluded from the merchant marine fund, so as to be paid to ships carrying the mail in addition to the subsidies provided.

Some conception of the maximum burdens possible under this bill may be had when it is remembered that in the case of the Leviathan the basic subsidy would be around $900,000 per year and the board could allow $1,800,000 per year.

At the present time business conditions throughout the world are in a state of paralysis. The worst depression in the world's history exists in shipping. It was shown in the hearings that approximately one-sixth of British tonnage is tied up; that France with her liberal subsidies has one-third tied up; that very large percentages of Italian, Belgian, Danish, Swedish, Spanish, and Greek are tied up, and yet in this time of extreme depression it is proposed to fix subsidies and impose burdens which will continue through many years.

Upon what theory is it proposed to pay sailing vessels of over 1,000 gross tons a subsidy, and wherein is the justice of paying a vessel of 1,500 gross tons upon the basis of 5,000 gross tons?

TEN PER CENT LIMITATION ON PROFITS.

But it is said that the provision for a limitation on profits of 10 per cent will serve as a check and recover the subsidies into the Treasury should they prove excessive. I have already shown that this provision only applies to the year in which this profit is made, so that if the company shall have received subsidies during five lean years and thereafter a period of prosperity should follow, the only subsidy to be repaid would be that received during the years of prosperity. The subsidies paid during the lean years would be gone beyond recovery, however great the profits might be. Here, too, the question of overcapitalization and high salaries paid would become very important.

As to overcapitalization and high salaries, Lissner, commissioner of United States Shipping Board, said:

For the purpose of the record I will state, Judge Davis, that our best information is that the active managers of some of these large shipping companies do receive salaries in a number of instances running up to $75,000 and $100,000 a year. A number of the officials in these companies receive salaries ranging from $20,000 to $100,000.

Mr. Hurley, former chairman of United States Shipping Board, calls attention to this in his new work on "The new merchant marine," where he said:

Another incongruity is the insistence of shipowners upon lower prices for ships, while in their dealings with the public they have systematically increased the inventory or book value of old ships as fast as they got possession of them. This practice, together with a failure to write off adequate depreciation from year to year, has made possible a degree of overcapitalization that renders the average steamship company more vulnerable in competition than is commonly realized. Like the practice of subsidizing ships, overcapitalization is an entanglement very easy to get into but very difficult to shake off.

Mr. Hurley, in his final report made July 31, 1919, called attention to overcapitalization, and said that a recent statement of one American company frankly admitted that its capitalization of $11,000,000 consisted of $5,000,000 in tangible assets and $6,000,000 in good will.

American steamship companies engaged in 1919 in offshore trade refused to furnish to Statistician J. F. Lane, who was employed by and making investigations for United States Shipping Board, certain specified financial statements which would enable Mr. Lane to ascertain the cost of operating vessels under the American flag, as the board was directed to ascertain under section 12 of the shipping act.

Witnesses called upon at the hearing to give information as to the salaries paid to their officials refused to do so. With one or two exceptions these companies advised that for various reasons they were unable to comply with the request. Manifestly, they did not care to have the public informed, and the same criticism applies to the failure of the steamship companies at these hearings to give that full and frank disclosure which would have enabled the committee to say if, in fact, they were entitled to receive money from the pockets of the public.

This course of conduct and these circumstances may well cause one to regard with suspicion the activities of these companies to secure this bill, and the minority members were justified in desiring the fullest information before imposing upon the American people the burdens imposed by the direct subsidy features of this bill.

Information, deemed important by one member of the committee at least, was called for, and, so far as I can find, the same has never been furnished. On April 14 the following information was called for:

1. Present American shipowners, exclusive of Shipping Board, engaged in foreign trade, fleets owned by them, and under what flags they operate at present time.
2. Estimate, if bill passes, as to the subsidies these companies would receive, first, with their fleets as at present owned, and, second, with their fleets brought under the American flag.
3. What dividends have been paid in the last 10 years by the present American shipowners operating ships in foreign trade under American and foreign flags, or both.
4. What shipbuilding companies in the United States, or shipyards, are owned by American shipowners?

Mr. EDMONDS suggested that Mr. Merrill and Mr. Lissner get a record of the shipyards and the connection between those shipyards and the steamship companies, stating that the Sun Oil Co. operates ships and that it, or a heavy ownership, owns the Sun Shipbuilding Co.; the International Mercantile Marine is held in some kind of a bond with the New York Shipbuilding Co., and said that they were all public documents, both he and Judge HARDY suggesting that they be put in the record.

On May 16, 1922, page 2178 of hearings, the information was again called for, and there was no misunderstanding, for Mr. Merrill said:

Mr. BLAND asked on one of the first days, Mr. Chairman, for a list of all shipowners and their affiliations, the tonnage they had under American and under foreign flags, their connections with shipyards and other industries, their capitalization and the amount of subsidy each would receive under this bill, and where they were running. We can get all of it pretty easily except the affiliations, which require a good deal of digging.

After 33 days of hearing the only answer made to these inquiries was a statement showing vessels owned and vessels controlled through affiliated companies. The first inquiry was partly answered, but it does not appear that any attempt was made to answer the other inquiries, the pertinency of which must be apparent.

I will not undertake to discuss further the opportunity now afforded to shipowners to procure the available Shipping Board tonnage at world prices or less or the fact that the proposed sale of ships would constitute in effect a gift of them to shipowners, since the bounties throughout the contemplated period would far exceed the purchase price; or the considerable evidence to show that the differentials in operating expenses and subsistence charges are being eliminated; or the differential in our favor on oil-burning ships, of which the Shipping Board owns 70 per cent, while other countries own a much smaller percentage; or the large subsidies which would accrue to the Standard Oil Co., the United States Steel Corporation, United Fruit Co., and other large concerns which own their own ships and operate them in transportation of their own products, without any provision in the bill requiring these companies to operate their ships, in whole or in part, as common carriers; or the enormous rates—sometimes as high as 1,250 per cent on pre-war rates—charged and profits made by the shipping interests who are so strongly urging the passage of the bill; or the opportunity afforded for the creation of shipping monopolies.

WILL PASSAGE OF BILL AFFECT SALE OF SHIPS?

Lack of present market is due to depressed shipping, which is worst in the history of the world. Lasker, Love, and other representatives testified that all feasible routes are being served. All that Mr. Marvin would venture to predict was that passage of bill would insure within a reasonably short time some hundreds of thousands of tons, which is nothing when there is taken into consideration the millions of tons which the Government has to sell.

J. B. Smull, one of the Shipping Board's $35,000 experts, testified before the Appropriations Committee of the House:

There is no possibility of selling boats to-day at any price.

W. J. Love, another $35,000 expert of the Shipping Board, said:

The foreign lines have been hit just as well as we have, and while they have not abandoned a single essential route or service that they covered prior to 1914, they are reducing their tonnage in keeping with reduced revenue and volume of cargo moving.

The study prepared by the Shipping Board and distributed under its direction on behalf of this bill says:

One of the most difficult problems confronting the Shipping Board is the sale and transfer of Government-owned ships to private owners. The task has been made especially difficult by the present world-wide depression in industry and by the large overproduction of ships. These two important factors have delayed the sale of Government-owned tonnage to such a degree that only a few ships have been sold in the 18 months that have elapsed since the passage of the Jones Act.

The present depression in shipping will doubtless continue for several years. Ships can not, therefore, be sold except at very low prices, as is evidenced by the low prices at which privately owned British tonnage and a few Shipping Board ships have been sold in recent months.

Mr. Farrell, president of the United States Steel Corporation, an authority on shipping and business, said in an address last year:

It is questionable whether under present conditions any considerable tonnage could be sold except at a sacrifice which is not warranted, pending a revival of business in foreign markets, and considering the nominal cost of maintenance laid up.

Even if a sale could be effected, it would be at enormous cost, since at present world prices we would get about $200,000,000 and pay out more than that sum in subsidies in three years.

WILL THE PASSAGE OF THE BILL ELIMINATE THE PRESENT CHARGE ON THE TREASURY?

Manifestly, this will not be done if the entire fleet is sold and the balanced fleet contemplated by the board is secured, for, as shown above, the charge annually upon the American people will be greater.

But the ships can not be sold for a long time to come according to the testimony of the proponents of the bill, and if not sold then the overhead and other charges must continue. The present charge of $50,000,000 annually includes a comparatively small part as loss-on-voyage operations. Taking the months of April and May, 1922, the net voyage losses were respectively $667,751.61 and $376,445.84. The Shipping Board Emergency Fleet Corporation only operated directly 13 ships, yet on April 30, 1922, there were 1,582 employees in the operating department of the Shipping Board Emergency Fleet Corporation. The remaining vessels operated were a small number under bare-boat charter and the remainder under managing-agent agreements by which these agents operate the vessels on a commission on gross revenue. There are only about 46 companies and individuals operating Shipping Board vessels. When the appropriation of $50,000,000 was last obtained, the estimate therefor showed only $5,497,561 for voyage losses, while the residue went to other expenses, such as repairs, betterments, insurance, lay-up expenses, advertising, and $15,000,000 to administration expenses.

Mr. Lasker said:

It will be a good many years before we do not have any stuff left with most favorable legislation. I want to make it plain here that I do not think the proposed legislation is going to, by the wave of a magic wand, give us a merchant marine.

Again, he said:

We believe that of the 700 good freight ships we have, the Shipping Board would feel very happy if, within 30 months from the time of the passage of this bill, it could dispose of sufficient ships to take care of the routes it is now operating and put the Emergency Fleet Corporation out of business as an operating company.

He says nothing of the rest of the fleet. The expenditure of $50,000,000 should be reduced by economies in the Shipping Board itself, and otherwise little hope is seen for many years to come.

Chairman Lasker, W. J. Love, and other representatives of the board testified that Shipping Board vessels in competition with privately owned American vessels had been taken off, and that Shipping Board vessels were not operating in competition with privately owned American vessels.

The Shipping Board has never tried out fairly the provisions of the Jones Act. The board seems bent on subsidy and nothing else. By section 7 of the Jones Act the board was directed to establish routes, and if no citizen can be found to supply satisfactory service the board should operate vessels on such lines until the business is developed so that such vessels may be sold on satisfactory terms and the service maintained, or unless it shall appear within a reasonable time that such lines can not be made self-sustaining; existing lines were authorized to be maintained until, in the opinion of the board, the maintenance is unbusinesslike and against public interests, and the Postmaster General was authorized, notwithstanding the terms of the ocean mail pay act of March 3, 1891, to contract for carrying the mails over such lines and at such prices as might be agreed upon by the board and the Postmaster General.

Instead of making energetic efforts to carry out the provisions of the section, every effort seems to be to discredit the operation of these lines. One thing that might be done would be to get rid of a board which constantly wails it can do nothing and get one that will at least try to do something else than belittle the fleet, advertise its own incompetency, and bend all its efforts to impose heavy burdens on the American people.

Complaint is made that the minority offer no solution. One material factor in the solution would be the abandonment by the majority party of a tariff policy which will stop the exchange of goods. The merchant marine act of 1920 was hailed as a boon to shipowners, but it is said that the inability to put into effect section 34 of that act destroyed its vitality, and yet Chairman Lasker and Mr. Marvin, vice president of the American Steamship Owners' Association, both claimed that the proposed deduction from net Federal income taxes of 5 per cent of the freight paid on goods imported or exported in American-flag vessels, which was provided as a substitute for said section 34, would prove more valuable and effective. It is unreasonable to ask the minority to offer a substitute for the pending bill when the right to summon witnesses was denied and information called for was not produced. Secretary Denby, after testifying in chief, promised to return for cross-examination, but later advised that he would be unable to do so. With as much force it might be urged that the defendant in court should establish an affirmative defense when the right and opportunity to do so had not been afforded. The minority are as anxious as anyone else to terminate Government ownership and to place an American merchant marine on the seas, but it desires to do so with due regard to the taxpayers of America, and it refuses to play the rôle of a rubber stamp for the United States Shipping Board.

The idea seems to exist that unless this bill is passed nothing can be done. That is untrue unless the party in power is false to its trust and recreant to the rights of the people. The committee may assume its proper responsibility and refuse to serve as a mere conduit between the Shipping Board offices and legislative halls, undertake to investigate conditions, and to find remedies, with due regard to the rights of all, rather than to serve as a forum in which the Shipping Board shall register its will.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. EDMONDS].

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Chairman, I am not a Philadelphia lawyer, and not having the eloquence of the gentleman from Georgia I am probably not able to explain the bill as well as he is. However, I think the gentleman will agree with me that I did the best I could in the hour and a half that I was explaining the bill.

Mr. BRAND. I want to say that the gentleman certainly did.

Mr. EDMONDS. I did the best I could in the time I had. I made no attempt to deceive and say the subsidy did run over a year, because it does not. The subsidy stands on its own basis each year. Of course, if they made only 9 per cent in three or four years it is not possible that they are going to earn 30 or more per cent in one year so as to even return the whole of that year's compensation. We studied the matter very carefully in subcommittee, the committee of Republicans that framed the bill.

Now, I want to answer the gentleman from Kansas. Yes; we pay the Standard Oil Co. a subsidy for their oil tankers. I told you that the other day, and I tell you so now. The gentleman spoke about the United Fruit Co. Nobody knows better than the members of the committee that the greater proportion of the service for this country in the Caribbean Sea is carried in the boats of the United Fruit Co.; they carry passengers and freight the same as any Atlantic liner.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EDMONDS. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. What would be the maximum rate paid to the Standard Oil Co. and the United Fruit Co.?

Mr. EDMONDS. A great many oil boats will receive the subsidy. We did not want to pay it; we spent several days on it; but gentlemen should not forget that if this country goes to war the first thing you will be looking for will be oil tankers, and you will need them badly. We decided that when it came to the 5 per cent deduction on the income tax they were not entitled to it where they hauled their own freight. But we decided that in all probability for war purposes we had better pay the subsidy to the Standard Oil ships. However, we put a provision in the bill—

Mr. BOX. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EDMONDS. I will yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. BOX. Does the gentleman contend that the Standard Oil Co. is not furnishing all the ships that are necessary to do their business?

Mr. EDMONDS. I have not any idea about it; I presume they do.

Mr. BOX. Does the gentleman think they will build more under this provision?

Mr. EDMONDS. I understand they have built 13 since the war was over. I do not know whether they will build any more or not.

Mr. LARSEN of Georgia. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EDMONDS. Yes; briefly.

Mr. LARSEN of Georgia. In the opinion of the gentleman, does he think the Standard Oil Co., in order to carry their products, needs this subsidy?

Mr. EDMONDS. I do not think they do.

Mr. LARSEN of Georgia. Then, why do you give it to them?

Mr. EDMONDS. To keep their ships under the American flag so that in case of war we could take them.

Mr. LARSEN of Georgia. Does the United Fruit Co. need it?

Mr. EDMONDS. Only 20 per cent of their invested capital is in ships. Gentlemen get up on the floor and speak about the enormous profits of the United Fruit Co. If there is 20 per cent of capital invested in ships and they earn over 10 per cent, we get the subsidy back.

Mr. LARSEN of Georgia. Do they need it in order to conduct their business?

Mr. EDMONDS. No; they do not, but they make the most of their profits out of side issues. They run sugar plantations; they run coconut plantations; they run banana plantations; they run all kinds of institutions through Central and South America.

Mr. LARSEN of Georgia. You propose to give them a subsidy, but you do not know how much?

Mr. EDMONDS. We do not want to make fish of one and fowl of another.

Mr. LARSEN of Georgia. Speaking of discrimination, does not the gentleman think that the agricultural interests are discriminated against?

Mr. EDMONDS. The gentleman is speaking of the subsidies that go to the agricultural interests?

Mr. LARSEN of Georgia. No.

Mr. EDMONDS. Did the gentleman ever find anyone objecting to any money that was given to the farmers?

Mr. LARSEN of Georgia. I have never found any money given to the farmers. Why do you give it to all these other interests and not give it to the farmer?

Mr. EDMONDS. Why does not the gentleman put in a bill to attain that end?

Mr. LARSEN of Georgia. You Republicans probably would not favor it.

Mr. EDMONDS. The gentleman does not know whether we would or not.

Mr. LARSEN of Georgia. Why does not the gentleman put it over? Why does he not give it to the Steel Corporation?

Mr. EDMONDS. I never owned a dollar of stock in the Steel Corporation in my life. I am trying to explain why we did this, and if the gentleman does not like it he can vote to take it out. You say you have got the votes on your side.

Mr. LARSEN of Georgia. You gentlemen are in charge of the bill, but if you left it to me I would take it out.

Mr. EDMONDS. Well, the gentleman is taking up all my time. I want to say another thing. The United States Steel Co. is operating in a commercial business. They carry other people's products around throughout the world, and just because they happen to be owned by the United States Steel Co., you are going to hit at them, but we have inserted a precautionary paragraph in which we say that only a portion of their capital that is invested in these lines can be considered in connection with the 10 per cent profit margin, so far as the subsidy is concerned.

Mr. J. M. NELSON. Do they get anything of the 5 per cent income-tax provision?

Mr. EDMONDS. They do not. A statement was made here by the new recruit of the Democratic Party [Mr. GAHN] that they get 5 per cent income-tax reduction. Of course, after we got through with the bill in June, which the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GAHN] helped to prepare and was very conversant with, he came to me and said, "Please give me something that I can get on the floor and argue about." I said, "Very well," and I told him to take a certain section and to study it. He took it away with him, went home, and after being defeated came back and joined the Democratic Party, and then decided that he did not like the shipping bill which he had helped construct. He got up on the floor after being in all of the Republican conferences and made the statement that the 5 per cent income-tax proposition was granted to the corporations. We were very careful about that. We fought for two days over the fact of paying the subsidy to these corporations and we did the best we could, using every precaution, so that they would not get anything more than we thought best to give them to protect ourselves in case of war.

Mr. J. M. NELSON. What section does that appear in?

Mr. EDMONDS. About the 5 per cent clause?

Mr. J. M. NELSON. Yes.

Mr. EDMONDS. Clause (b), page 20. Some gentlemen referred to the Atlantic, Gulf & West Indies Line. I think it has 70 or 80 vessels, but only 6 of them are engaged in the foreign trade. Enormous profits are made by that line in the coastwise trade, it is said, and then it is charged that we are going to give them a subsidy. They can only get a subsidy on their vessels engaged in the foreign trade. The word "subsidy" has been killed in this country in connection with the merchant marine by playing favorites, and the first thing we did in this bill was to make up our minds that we would not play favorites; that we would be square with each and every one of the people connected with the shipping industry, and we limited the subsidy given, and when they made 10 per cent profit half of all above that was to be returned to repay the subsidy.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Would it not be very easy for the United Fruit Co., if they made a profit on their shipping of more than 10 per cent, to juggle their books in such a way that their profit would inure to the other activities of that company?

Mr. EDMONDS. There is an arrangement made in the bill whereby they had to separate their business, and, further than that, the arrangement made for deductions and capital are to come through the Internal Revenue Department of the Treasury.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. I have seen that division of earnings and losses made in other businesses. The United Fruit Co. have banana fields and sugar fields and every kind of property under the sun. It would be very easy for them to make all of their profits inure to those other lines and never get above 10 per cent profit in shipping.

Mr. EDMONDS. What the gentleman says may be perfectly true. I do not want to say they would or would not. If they are honest, they would not do such a thing.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman five minutes more.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EDMONDS. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. Concerning the disclosure made by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. BLAND], I want to ask the gentleman a question concerning the President's understanding of this bill. I quote from what the President said in his address on Tuesday last:

It provides that shipping lines receiving Government aid must have their actual investment and their operating expenses audited by the Government; that Government aid will only be paid until the shipping enterprise earns 10 per cent on actual capital employed, and immediately that when more than 10 per cent earning is reached half of the excess earnings must be applied to the repayment of the Government aid which has been previously advanced.

A fair construction of the President's language is that all of the Government aid that has been advanced through any term of years will be returned whenever the excess of 10 per cent amounts to the subsidy grant.

Mr. EDMONDS. I do not know what the President's idea was. He may have thought that he was putting it into good language, and he meant it. We have it written in the bill that each year stands on its own bottom.

Mr. BLANTON. The statement of the gentleman from Virginia was a revelation to me.

Mr. EDMONDS. If the gentleman had asked me that question when I was on my feet the other day, I would have told him, because I do not want to misstate anything.

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, I know the gentleman would not misstate anything and would have told if he had been asked.

Mr. EDMONDS. We have drawn up the bill as best we could. First, we have done what we think will put an American merchant marine on the seas. You gentlemen object to it, and you have a right to your own views, but I am trying to say to you that this is our opinion.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. In that particular I think the President has misconstrued the bill.

Mr. EDMONDS. He may have. His language is a little equivocal there, and he may have thought that he was expressing what he wanted to express.

Mr. RAKER. Was all of the American tonnage during the last two years in operation?

Mr. EDMONDS. I will answer that question with figures that have come to me to-day, and this will answer the question asked me the other day by the gentleman from New York [Mr. LONDON]. This table which I have received I shall put into the RECORD at this point:

Total American tonnage in the overseas trade, approximately 662 vessels, total dead-weight tonnage 5,976,594.

Percentage Shipping Board vessels.....	55.7
Percentage Shipping Board tonnage (dead-weight tons).....	61.9
Privately owned American tonnage, outside of the Shipping Board, exclusive of tankers, as of July 1, 1922, approximately 294 vessels (dead-weight tons).....	1,931,038
Shipping Board vessels in overseas trade, exclusive of tankers, as of Nov. 1, 1922, approximately 368 vessels (dead-weight tons).....	3,145,556
Total number Shipping Board vessels, exclusive of tankers, 1,290 vessels (dead-weight tons).....	9,059,388
Total number of lake-type vessels, 362 (dead-weight tons).....	1,268,965
Lake type, percentage.....	28.05
Lake type, percentage (dead-weight tons).....	14.07

The reason that is made as of the 1st of November in one particular and as of the 1st of July in the other, is because the Shipping Board has theirs up to date, and the last report of the other lines is as of July 1.

Mr. RAKER. Take the amount of American tonnage privately owned during the last two years. What has been the condition financially? Have they made money or lost it?

Mr. EDMONDS. I believe some of the coastwise ships have made money, and in the foreign trade some of the boats made money and some did not. The man who ran a large number of cargo boats did not make much money, probably lost money. I think the Atlantic, Gulf & West Indies Line report shows that they lost $1,500,000 last year. That takes in all of their operations.

During the debate on the shipping bill a number of questions were asked of me which I am now going to try and answer.

One gentleman asked me the present status of subsidies paid by different countries. I have been furnished by Mr. E. T. Chamberlain, of the Department of Commerce, with the following data, which, while in one or two particulars covers amounts which are explained in the summary, shows that there has been a considerable advance in the amounts paid for subsidies recently. I am printing this as received from the department for the information of the Members:

The Spanish cabinet in March, 1922, decided to increase subsidies to an amount not to exceed 50,000,000 pesetas ($7,650,000), and as Spanish subsidies are revised every two years, it is assumed that the revision is under consideration and will take effect in 1923.

Belgium.

The Belgian Government, by the act of July 16, 1916, is authorized to guarantee interest and amortization on 100,000,000 francs of bonds issued by the Lloyd Royal Belge Steamship Co. and to take over 75,000,000 of these bonds issued in 1920 and 25,000,000 francs issued in 1921.

Germany.

[Mark: Par value, 23.8 cents; current exchange fluctuation at between one and two hundredths of a cent.]

The German Government appropriated in February, 1921, 12,000,000,000 marks to German shipowners to pay for their ships surrendered, on the basis of the subsidy law of November, 1917. At the time it was believed this amount would rebuild in German yards 2,500,000 gross tons. Since then the Government has printed paper marks so fast that shipowners and shipbuilders, through the bank which distributes the fund, demanded, in September, 1922, an additional 24,000,000,000 marks, and the arbitration court has decided the Government must add 18,000,000,000 marks to the shipowners' subsidy between September, 1922, and March, 1923. This additional amount, however, has not yet been voted by the Reichstag and printed by the presses. The Berliner Tageblatt says German shipowners insist on freight rates and passenger fares being paid in foreign exchange, while they pay wages and general costs of operation, where possible, in paper marks.

Summary.

In the following summary of the above item it should be noted:

1. That the amount for Australia is very large, because a main item is a statement of the difference between the first cost of the Commonwealth fleet and the amount of net earnings from 1916 to July, 1922, used by Premier Hughes to show the fleet could probably be sold for the amount of the difference. The actual loss or subsidy could be determined only by selling the fleet.
2. The largest Canadian amount is for losses on the Government fleet for several years, carried to the account for the past year.
3. British naval reserve appropriations are included in naval estimates.

Another gentleman made inquiry for a report of the comptroller of the Shipping Board. Herewith follows a report from the comptroller with a letter of explanation of same:

UNITED STATES SHIPPING BOARD
EMERGENCY FLEET CORPORATION, DIVISION OF OPERATIONS,
Washington, November 24, 1922.

HON. GEORGE W. EDMONDS,

House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Pursuant to your telephone request, I herein beg to inclose statement of estimated operating results of the United States Shipping Board Emergency Fleet Corporation for the four months from July to October, 1922, inclusive.

The word "estimated" is used only because certain portions of certain voyages which have been terminated have not, as to their expenses, yet been confirmed by vouchers which must be received from abroad. That amounts to a very small percentage of the total, and our experience is such that we can very closely gauge what it should be, but for purposes of accuracy we term the statements as "estimated." In fact, they are actual.

You will note that the total loss (without, of course, taking into account anything for capital charges, to wit, interest, insurance, or depreciation) amounts to $13,058,593.37. Out of this, however, there is a general and administrative expense not directly applicable to operation of vessels, of $2,197,513.24 for the period. This general and administrative expense is in connection with the liquidation of the assets that remained over in plant and material from the previous board, as well as expense in connection with settlement of tens of millions of dollars of construction claims.

You will note from the summary that this total loss is divided as follows:

	Loss on operations.	Total loss.
July.....	$2,242,714.14	$2,783,096.13
August.....	2,662,728.62	3,268,507.76
September.....	3,140,860.53	3,652,769.81
October.....	2,814,776.84	3,354,219.67
Total.....	10,861,080.13	13,058,593.37

For purposes of round figuring, we will say that the loss for the period of four months has been $11,000,000. As this is one-third of the year, should the loss keep on on this basis it would be $33,000,000 for the year; but anyone who estimates that the loss of the Shipping Board for the year will be $33,000,000 deceives himself. In the first place, the four months covered are the most favorable months in the year as to passenger earnings. I estimate within that period almost half of the passenger earnings of the whole 12 months accrue. It must be remembered that the summer is the great ocean passenger traveling period. The result is that while in so far as cash outlay goes the operations of passenger ships have shown very little loss in the period covered, for most of the ensuing eight months of the fiscal year the loss will be, we estimate, $1,800,000 more than it was for the first four months.

Our total loss of the Shipping Board has been $13,058,593.37 for the first four months. During that period we not only had the peak of passenger earnings but we spent practically no moneys in extraordinary repair of ships. We now find that there are absolutely necessary structural changes which must be made in our twenty-three 535-foot passenger ships within the next four months, which will amount to $3,000,000. These extraordinary structural changes are imperative. There were no sums expended for extraordinary changes in any of our ships in the first four months; thus this constitutes an additional loss.

Because of adverse operating conditions during the next six months our monthly operating loss will increase by $500,000 for that period. The months of May, June, July, August, September, and October are favorable to operation. From November 1 to May 1 are the months of storms on the seas, when the operating expenses increase. So that for the six months' period to come if we operate on the same economical basis as the last four months, the normal increase for the six months in loss for this item will be $3,000,000.

Our fuel-oil contract on the eastern coast expired November 11. We advertised for bids, and had all companies in America bid for renewal of the contract for a year. Beginning with November 12, we had to make a new contract at the lowest price we got as a result of advertised bids, wherein our cost for oil was increased 50 cents per barrel. We are using 1,000,000 barrels of oil per month, so you see that even with the same economical operations as the last four months the increased cost at the increase of 50 cents per barrel will amount to a total of $4,000,000.

Thus we come to the following totals:

Our loss for the first four months, including $2,197,513.24 for expenses not directly applicable to operation was—	$13,058,000
The immediate expenditures for structural changes to be made within the next four months on the twenty-three 535-foot passenger ships will be—	3,000,000
Additional losses due to adverse operating conditions for the six months, at $500,000 per month—	3,000,000
Increased cost of oil, based upon increase of 50 cents per barrel and the use of 1,000,000 barrels monthly for eight months—	4,000,000
Decrease in passenger earnings for winter months, six months, at $300,000 per month—	1,800,000
Estimated losses for eight months, November to June, inclusive, on the basis of the loss for the past four months but not including the four added items immediately given above—	26,116,000

Total estimated losses for the fiscal year 1923— 50,974,000

Of course, in this loss is included the general and administrative expense not directly applicable to operation of vessels. As this was $2,197,513.24 for the first four months, if it kept on at the same rate it would be approximately $6,600,000 for the year. So, taking this off of the total estimate of $50,974,000, the total loss for the year would give us an operating loss of approximately $44,000,000. However, the loss for the current fiscal year will come nearer to $50,000,000, for the reason that freight rates are constantly dropping. Our total estimated loss of $44,000,000 for operating alone is based on the experience now of recorded results to such an extent that as comptroller I do not hesitate to aver that it can not be less, and that the estimate constitutes the only proper and correct forecast obtainable for the Shipping Board's operations for this year. I do not allow myself any appreciable latitude to be wrong.

However, what the decrease in freight rates will be is not within the purview of a comptroller. The figures I am about to give come from our operating officials, who, after we arrived at the forecast of losses given above, brought to my attention the constant drop in freight rates and insisted that we must allow an additional $6,000,000 to $10,000,000 for decrease in this direction.

To give you some actual figures, let me state that in July of this fiscal year the Shipping Board ships carried 794,447 tons of freight, for which they received $5,693,912.86, or $7.18 average revenue per ton.

In August we carried 976,236 tons, for which we received $6,524,620.57, or $6.68 average per ton. In September—the last figures available—we carried 1,029,185 tons, for which we received only $5,614,665.58, or merely $5.45 per ton.

The most interesting part of this is that in the months of August and September of this year we carried the same number of tons, practically, as last year. We received almost $22,000,000 for the tonnage carried for the two months last year, as against a little over $12,000,000 for the same tonnage this year.

You can thus see that with the constant monthly drop in freight rates the loss for the next eight months, even with increased efficiencies in management, must be larger than for the four months actually given here.

The Shipping Board is not cutting rates. Most of the rates are the same on all lines. The decrease in freight rates is due to decrease in general cargoes offered, though the Shipping Board, fortunately, has been able, in face of these hard times, to maintain its volume of business carried.

To sum up, the four months just passed were extremely favorable to the best possible showing, for passenger earnings were at their peak, the season of the year was favorable from weather conditions for ship operations, oil was being purchased at two-thirds of the price on the east coast that will be paid for the balance of the year, and there were no extraordinary expenditures for structural repairs. Further, fortunately, in those four months we had not felt the full effect of declining freight rates. So that, based on the actual losses during the four months just closed, a conservative estimate of the losses for the fiscal year still remains at $50,000,000, in spite of every effort in efficiency that may be made or retained to hold same low.

That the board is making every effort to make the losses as small as possible is evidenced by the fact that the losses from April to September of this year—the last figures available—are something over $30,000,000 less than the losses for the same six months of last year. Of the six months covered last year, three months were under the present board and the major share of the losses occurred under the prior board. Thus the board's record of successful endeavor to curtail losses is attested in the actual audited figures of results. But even with this aggressive curtailment the present fiscal year will show a loss of at least $50,000,000.

It might be of interest for me to call to your attention that the losses in the last fiscal year, November to June, inclusive (during which period the present Shipping Board had gotten operations pretty well in hand), were approximately $30,000,000. The loss for the same period this year must be greater, because of the unbelievably unfavorable freight market now operating, the lowest possibly ever known in modern ship operations. It is obvious to see that no economies, no matter how great, can overcome the more than 40 per cent decline in freight rates this year as against last year. When rates will harden is not to be estimated; the disjuncting of world trade, the excess of tonnage existing through the war, Germany's present building program, and the extensive Government operations by the United States are all given by expert shipping men as contributing to the unfortunate situation.

Of course, even if freight rates should improve some time within the next 24 months, the losses of the Shipping Board would not be comparably reduced, for it must be remembered that the fleet is constantly getting older and that the Shipping Board has not spent nearly enough in upkeep and repairs. Upkeep and repairs have been neglected, because the board had to operate within its appropriations, and the entire appropriation it received from the Congress has been used in operations. As soon as freight rates get at all better the board must spend large sums in keeping up its ships if the deterioration is not to be ridiculously fast. Thus, for some period to come, if the assets under the board are to be properly cared for, there is no relief in sight from the losses now being recorded.

If there is any further illumination or explanation needed by you or any Members of the House, it will be my pleasure to promptly furnish same.

Very truly yours,

P. SINCLAIR, Comptroller.

United States Shipping Board Emergency Fleet Corporation.

Numerous statements have been made from time to time as to the tremendous profits made by certain steamship lines. I have reports of the investigation of the principal steamship lines mentioned as made by William Craemer, special assistant to president in charge of finance of the Shipping Board. This report was submitted to Commissioner Lissner and furnished by him to me:

OPERATIONS AND FINANCES OF LEADING AMERICAN STEAMSHIP OWNERS.
AUGUST 2, 1922.

To Commissioner MEYER LISSNER:

In reply to your request that I develop the facts with reference to the contention of some opponents of ship subsidy legislation that American shipowners made such large profits during the war years as to enable them to distribute enormous amounts to their stockholders, and in addition build up such substantial surpluses as to put them in unusually strong financial condition and thus make entirely unnecessary any governmental aid at this time, I wish to say that the examination I have made of the financial reports of some of the larger American shipowning companies demonstrates this theory to be clearly misleading and based only on a most superficial and incomplete analysis of the facts.

At the outset I would like to point out that this contention of the opponents of the ship subsidy, even in its widest application, can apply only to those few companies organized prior to the war and whose tonnage was acquired at "pre-war" prices. It entirely ignores that much larger group of shipowners and operators whose investment was made during the period of high prices and who have either been wiped out by the reduction in ship values, or who are entirely dependent on some form of governmental aid to save the remainder of their fast disappearing investment.

The profits earned by the American shipowner during the war were restricted by governmental action, so that the return on his investment was very materially less than that earned by his foreign competitors. In this way any possible advantage along these lines was more than offset by the larger earnings accruing to foreign owners whose profits were not similarly restricted by the action of their governments.

This is clearly illustrated by the fact that during the period of the highest freights all American ocean-going tonnage was under requisition to the Government, and the owners' return limited thereunder to the comparatively moderate charter rates established by the Shipping Board, whereas at the same time this Government was paying for foreign tonnage rates more than double those established for American owners.

Then, too, Government taxation reduced the earnings of the American owner to a point far below that of his foreign competitors. Japanese and neutral owners were not burdened with the excessive taxes levied in this and other allied countries, and Great Britain by pursuing a more liberal policy with reference to deductions for depreciation very greatly reduced the proportion of war earnings returned to the Government. As a result of these conditions, it is evident the foreign competitors of American shipowners were benefited to a much greater extent by war activities and were enabled at the same time to write off their investment in ships to a value approximating much closer the present world market price for ships.

This makes it evident, I believe, that the period of large earnings which commenced in 1915 or 1916, and terminated so abruptly in 1920, instead of assisting him has made it more difficult for the American shipowner to compete with his foreign rivals because of the much larger advantages accruing to the foreigner during the same period.

An analysis of the financial reports of the larger American steamship companies which are available discloses that their earnings during the war period were not nearly so large as has been suggested by opponents of the ship subsidy, and also that these earnings have been calculated without deducting the depreciation necessary to write down their investment in ships to a normal value. These earnings are also probably much less than the earnings in other industries during the same period.

The Atlantic, Gulf & West Indies Steamship Co. may be taken as an excellent example as, together with its subsidiaries, it owned more American registry tonnage than any other owner (excepting the large tanker fleets owned by some of the oil companies). The net earnings of this company for the six years ending December 31, 1921, after surplus adjustments, averaged but 8½ per cent of its invested capital (total capital and surplus not including bonded indebtedness). These earnings are calculated without writing down the book value of its ships to anything like their present value. The statement of its earnings for the last six years follows:

	Net income after surplus adjustment.	Invested capital.	Per cent of earnings to invested capital.

The Pacific Mail Steamship Co. in 1915 reduced the par value of its capital stock from $20,000,000 to $1,000,000. This action was made necessary by the large accumulated deficit from operations which up to that time amounted to more than $11,000,000. The earnings since that date are but a fraction of the loss written off at that time against the capital account. As compared with the reduced capital, the earnings for the five years and eight months ended December 31, 1921, have been at the annual rate of about 18½ per cent.

The detailed earnings for eight months of 1916 and the five calendar years since then are as follows:

	Net income.	Invested capital.	Percentage of net income to invested capital.
1916 (8 months).....	$528,889	$4,290,577	12.33
1917.....	1,554,632	4,812,429	32.30
1918.....	886,249	4,627,780	19.15
1919.....	1,776,761	5,241,760	33.88
1920.....	1,277,470	6,428,478	19.87
1921 <sup>1</sup> .....	495,591	5,911,388	8.38
Annual average for 5 years and 8 months.....	975,602	5,273,862	18.50

The earnings of the International Mercantile Marine Co. for the four years ending December 31, 1920, averaged slightly over 8 per cent on its investment. I was not able to secure a copy of its report for 1921, but was assured by its officers that the operation of its American flag ships showed a net loss for last year. The annual earnings for the four years ended December 31, 1920, are as follows:

	Net income.	Invested capital.	Percentage of earnings to invested capital.
1917.....	$11,753,509	$128,209,079	9.17
1918.....	9,639,026	132,158,299	7.29
1919.....	13,166,114	131,875,785	9.98
1920.....	7,435,802	132,183,316	5.63
Average for 4 years.....	8,398,890	104,885,296	8.01

The United Fruit Co. is primarily a mercantile company and only secondarily a steamship company. Its earnings from its shipping activities constitute, therefore, a relatively small proportion of its total earnings. Unfortunately, the earnings of its steamships are not segregated in its annual reports. It is interesting to note, however, that its earnings from tropical properties and ships for the seven years and three months ended December 31, 1921, have been at the annual rate of less than 16½ per cent of its invested capital. The detailed earnings by years are as follows:

	Net earnings.	Invested capital.	Percentage of earnings to invested capital.
Year ended Sept. 30, 1915.....	$5,900,522	$63,107,087	9.36

These figures demonstrate very clearly that the American shipowner did not make excessive profits during the war period, and I believe it can be said, without fear of contradiction, that the American investor in shipping securities has received a lower return on his investment than the investor in any other industry. This is borne out by the dividend record of the more important American companies.

The common stockholders of the International Mercantile Marine have never received a dividend. The preferred stockholders, although entitled to 6 per cent dividends, have received dividends only since 1917 and there is an accumulation of 42 per cent arrears on account of dividends not paid.

The common stockholders of Atlantic, Gulf & West Indies Steamship Co. have received dividends in but four years since its inception in 1908 and for these four years the rate was 10 per cent. The average annual return on their stock has been less than 3½ per cent. The preferred stockholders received dividends of 5 per cent for less than five years or an average annual return of less than 2 per cent.

The Luckenbach Steamship Co. has never declared a dividend. The large dividends declared by the American-Hawaiian Steamship Co. were, in no small measure, the result of the sale of its ships at war prices and not exclusively of operating earnings.

The Pacific Mail Steamship Co. has declared dividends in but 9 out of the last 49 years, which represent in all a return of less than one-half of 1 per cent on the capital investment.

The American steamship owner would not be in such poor financial straits to-day if the balance of his war earnings not distributed as dividends had been invested in liquid assets. Unfortunately, however, and largely at the solicitation of his Government, these earnings of the good years have been invested in capital assets, such as ships, at prices far in excess of normal or present market. He has been unable to write these assets down to their present value, as to do so would mean, in most cases, changing a surplus account into a deficit on the books.

The vessels of the Atlantic, Gulf & West Indies Steamship Co. are carried on its books at approximately $174 per gross ton. To write them down to $100 a gross ton would involve a loss of over $26,000,000 and would result in a deficit of more than $4,000,000. To write them down to $50 a gross ton (which value is probably much nearer their forced-sale price) would reflect a loss of over $44,000,000 and leave a deficit on the books in excess of $22,000,000.

The Luckenbach Steamship Co. carries its vessels on its books December 31, 1921, at a value of $108 per dead-weight ton. To write these ships down to a normal value of approximately $50 per dead-weight ton would require a loss of about $9,000,000, while to write them down to the world market price of $30 per dead-weight ton would reflect a loss in excess of $12,000,000.

The passenger and cargo vessels of the Pacific Mail Steamship Co. represent a book value of about $140 per gross ton. To write these vessels down to a value of $100 a gross ton would reflect a loss of about $1,800,000, while to write them down to $50 a gross ton would show a loss of $4,100,000, which would turn the surplus of about $3,000,000 into a substantial deficit.

In conclusion I believe it is true to say that, in spite of rather substantial profits during the exceptional years from 1915 to 1920, the American shipowner is worse off to-day than at the beginning of this period, because of his heavy investments in new and old tonnage at such high prices as to make prohibitive the writing off of these investments to meet present world conditions. It is reflected in the great shrinkage in the market value of the stock of shipping companies whose stock is in the hands of the public, and in the financial statements of the smaller privately owned companies who are unable to pay the remaining balance on their purchase from the United States Shipping Board.

Considerable debate upon the floor as to the situation of the immigration section of the bill and its value are contained in the two letters, one from Consul Leslie E. Reed, and approved by Robert P. Skinner, American consul general at London, and one from Mr. T. H. Rossbottom:

APRIL 26, 1922.

In connection with the strong disfavor with which the President's proposals for a shipping subsidy have been greeted in Great Britain, it is of interest to note that the chairman of one of the largest British armor-plate manufacturers and shipbuilders has made a strong argument in favor of a Government subsidy for armament manufacturers during the period of the naval holiday instituted by the Washington Conference on the Limitation of Armament.

At the annual meeting of Messrs. Cammell Laird & Co., Mr. Hinchins, the chairman, pointed out that armor-making shops can be used for no other purpose than to make armor, and that they can not be maintained in idleness for 10 years or longer. He stated that this country can not abandon its armor-making plants in the hope of permanent peace. He is reported to have declared that such action would be the height of folly and that it would be a still greater folly to dissipate the fine staff of experts which the armament firms have gathered together and whose services the country may yet require.

Lloyd's List of April 8, 1922, gives prominence in its editorial column to this situation, saying that "in the exceptional circumstances which these firms have to face for 10 years to come the plea is not without cogency." Further, the editorial says "a subsidy to these armament firms to induce them to hold on to their plant and their expert staffs would not be a costly business to the country compared with the saving which the reduction in the naval program will effect, and it may well be argued that it is better to face a certain annual outlay for subsidizing our armament firms than at the end of 10 years to find ourselves without the means of providing the necessary defenses. After all, such a subsidy would be in the nature only of national insurance against future possible war."

UNITED STATES LINES,
New York, May 17, 1922.

HON. A. D. LASKER,
United States Shipping Board, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: During the past few days we have noticed press reports to the effect that consideration is being given to the elimination of that provision in the shipping bill which requires that not more than 50 per cent of the aliens emigrating to the United States shall be carried in vessels of foreign registry.

We had looked forward to this provision as being the most constructive feature in the shipping bill that tends to accomplish the upbuilding and permanence of an American merchant marine in the North Atlantic, operating between Europe and the United States, and we consequently look upon the elimination of this "alien clause" with grave apprehension. Hence our request to you and the other members of the Shipping Board to meet with us and discuss the prospects for the future in the event this important feature of the bill is eliminated.

We have made a careful estimate of the annual earnings of the United States lines that would result from the carriage of first and second class mails, based on actual voyages performed, and have compared same with the earnings that would accrue by reason of the direct aid provided for in the shipping bill.

You will note from that estimate, the details of which you will find in the attached statement, that the United States lines are receiving for the carriage of such mail matter $1,084,725.80, and that the direct aid provided for in the shipping bill in lieu of earnings for the carriage of first and second class mails which are to be carried without charge is $1,019,400.

In the inclosed statement we have not made any calculations covering the postal earnings on the three old ex-German vessels, namely, the Princess Matoika, Hudson, and Susquehanna, which are obsolete and will be withdrawn from the trans-Atlantic trade as soon as proper vessels can be secured to take their place.

It is not possible for any steamship line of American registry to operate in the North Atlantic passenger trade unless it is able to secure a reasonable share of the third-class or steerage immigrant traffic. This traffic is the one upon which steamship lines engaged in that trade depend for their successful operation, and it is now controlled almost entirely by the foreign steamship lines with the cooperation of their respective Governments. These steamers of American registry can not compete for this alien traffic without the cooperation of this Government, as expressed by the 50 per cent provision or some equivalent.

It must be borne in mind that the results of the present operations of the United States lines would show a loss if items of insurance, depreciation, and interest were charged against operating income. This situation would be aggravated if the anticipated reduction in passenger rates takes place.

We can not impress upon you too forcibly the necessity for the enactment of the "alien" provision in the shipping bill in order to accomplish the purpose of the Shipping Board to have a privately owned, permanent merchant marine established and in successful operation upon the North Atlantic.

Unless that or some equivalent method is adopted, the steamers at present being operated by the United States lines must continue to be run by the Shipping Board, with a probable drain on the Treasury until the vessels become obsolete, when the United States lines will automatically retire from the North Atlantic passenger trade, leaving that service to be maintained by steamships of foreign registry.

Respectfully submitted,

In view of the present newspaper agitation regarding the British propaganda, I have made a digest of some of the comments in their newspapers which I desire to submit in this extension of remarks.

Take, for example, the well-known British maritime newspaper, the Syren and Shipping, of March 8, 1922, which editorially exclaims that—

There is cold comfort for British shipowners in President Harding's message to Congress supporting the proposals of the United States Shipping Board. Whether the desired subsidy will be forthcoming remains to be seen. It has been demanded before and not granted. But the present campaign for State aid is far more potent than its predecessors.

And this alarmed British editor adds that—

The assistance which the State is asked to furnish is all the more dangerous because indirect, as well as direct, methods are resorted to for fostering a mercantile marine.

And this British maritime journal goes on into a long argument against the American shipping bill, which reads for all the world like a paraphrase of the arguments of the opposing members of the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries.

There are a great many more of these illuminating quotations. Let us read a few. Syren and Shipping, in its issue of March 22, 1922, resumes its editorial discussion of the painful theme of an American merchant marine, exclaiming that—

An examination of the text of this "Merchant marine bill, 1922," does not lead us to alter our views either as to the earnestness of its sponsors in their efforts to establish an effective mercantile marine or the seriousness of the competition which would follow the inauguration of such a wide-reaching plan as is suggested. But the doleful British editor hunts for comfort in the thought that "to many Americans the sea is not a factor of their everyday life. They lack the long experience—and, we might add, the hereditary temperament."

As if there had not been American shipowners and American sailors ever since Plymouth Rock, who sailed the packet ships and clipper ships of the past century; and who manned and fought Old Ironsides in 1812, and the Kearsarge, when she sent the British-built Alabama reeling to the bottom of the English Channel. Manifestly, this British editor of Syren and Shipping is whistling mightily to keep his courage up as he sees the Stars and Stripes rising again above the western horizon.

He looks for comfort, as so many of his countrymen have before, to the "western farmers," hoping that they will prove "either apathetic or hostile to the scheme," and thus help Britain out, or to "the Democratic Party."

Indeed, these invocations to the farmers and the Democratic Party to kill this shipping bill and the American merchant marine in the interest of British monopoly of the high seas are frequently nowadays in the British newspapers, industrious reading of which might well give our friends on the other side much food for sober thought. The London correspondent of the Liverpool Journal of Commerce, on the basis of telegrams from British "listening stations" in America, gleefully predicts that—

It is not likely that the farmer party will willingly consent to subsidize the United States merchant marine, and if it continues the opposition stand that it at present threatens the proposed subsidy plan is as good as dead, for the farmer vote in combination with the Democrats, who have always been against subsidies, is sufficient to kill the proposition.

"The farmer vote, in combination with the Democrats," is going to save John Bull—is not this a delightful prophecy! How it must swell with pride the souls of those to whom this expectant champion of British sea mastery is referring. He finds "strong-siding champions" of the British cause in the House of Representatives. Whom does he mean? Whom is he aiming at? What mysterious telepathic communications are passing to and fro over the Atlantic between those who want to beat this bill in England and those who are mustering their forces to defeat it in the United States?

Another famous British maritime organ, Fairplay, fairly shouts—

What are we to do in order to hold our own against one of the greatest menaces that the whole country ever had to meet?

But Fairplay is forced to acknowledge that the subsidy itself—would not entitle any country to make an attack on the United States, for she is in common with every other nation is entitled to do what she likes with her own.

Of course, Fairplay is conscious that it was Great Britain herself that set the example for subsidy in the payments that created the Cunard Line of trans-Atlantic steamers in 1839. Fairplay adds impressively that—though it seems to be expected that for the first year only $15,000,000 will be drawn from the merchant marine fund for subsidies, it is anticipated that their cost will eventually reach $30,000,000.

Which, after all, is only a small fraction of the subsidies which the British Government in 80 years has bestowed on the Cunard Line alone.

Then Fairplay goes on to quote a lot of British shipowners who to a man declare the American shipping bill to be "most prejudicial" to British interests. One of these Britons despairingly gives up the ship with the acknowledgment that—

I fear there is no logical remedy from our point of view that is likely to have any effect with the Americans, as they, I think, have a perfect right to give subsidies as they are at present placed.

Well, they have—the same right exactly that Great Britain has. This gentleman, it is clear, has no illusions at all that even "the farmer vote" or "the Democratic Party" can save him.

Then there is our old truculent friend Lloyd's List, as British as they make them. It fairly foams at the mouth in contemplation of the Jones Act and its provisions for American control of the American trade between this country and the Philippines. And it proclaims that—

Great Britain could at once retaliate by including in our coasting trade the trade between England, Canada, South Africa, India, and Australia.

A terrible threat, surely—to bar from us a trade in which American ships seldom or ever run. If a Yankee skipper ever gets a cargo from one to another British port, it is only when John Bull is not looking. Speaking of trade to Australia, our British kin adroitly managed some time ago to ban American shipping even in the trade between Australia and the United States. As ex-Senator George E. Chamberlain, commissioner of the United States Shipping Board, pointed out in his address before the convention of the National Merchant Marine Association in Washington March 4 last:

If two shipments of the same material are made, say, from Chicago, both consigned to Australia, but one goes by rail through the United States to San Francisco and thence to destination, and the other goes through Canada to Vancouver and thence to destination, they are treated differently by the Australian customs officials, when assessing value for the customs tax, as follows:

The shipment from San Francisco has the United States rail freight charge added to the ad valorem value before duty is fixed; the shipment from Vancouver does not. In other words, for using our railroad and our port our citizen is taxed by Australia on the cost of the rail haul, but if he uses Canadian railroad and Canadian port he is not. The form of discrimination affects not only our steamships but also our railroads, for they lose the land haul.

As ex-Senator Chamberlain added:

This is a discrimination that under existing conditions can be made only against the United States.

That is to say, John Bull has already shut us out of his traffic so far as he dares, and his threat to retaliate against us by closing his whole colonial trade is only so much tin thunder.

It was formally announced in the Liverpool Journal of Commerce soon after the President sent his message to Congress that—

A deputation representing shipowning interests, and including the president and vice president of the Chamber of Shipping of the United Kingdom, has waited on the board of trade for the purpose of discussing the United States shipping legislation. And it is added, "The interview was for the purpose of exchanging views, etc., so that the board of trade should be put in possession of the opinions of the shipping interest on the matter. There was, therefore, no decisive outcome of the conference."

Probably the real outcome was that the honorable gentleman discovered that they had already in anticipation made so many reprisals against us that there was nothing else that could be done.

However, Sir Owen Phillips, the distinguished head of the Royal Mail Steam Packet Co., which was created in 1841 by a subsidy of $1,240,000 and has been subsidized ever since, rose up at the annual meeting of his company, as quoted in the Liverpool Journal of Commerce of June 2, 1922, and impassively declared—that a fine actor the honorable gentleman would make—that "while British shipping has to fight unaided for its existence"—unaided, mind you—"foreign ships are in many cases supported and assisted in various ways by their respective governments." Then Sir Owen referred to a mysterious "act of Parliament of 1853, which has been on the statute books for 70 years, giving the British Government at any moment power to take immediate measures to protect her mercantile marine against unfair discrimination." Having made this cryptic remark, the president of the Royal Mail Steam Packet Co. sat down, having vindicated his reputation as an unconscious humorist.

It is noteworthy that the "Thunderer" is leveling its heaviest guns against the presumptuous American shipping bill. In the London Times of May 18 Sir Norman Hill, the secretary and counsel of the Liverpool Shipowners' Association, sounds the alarm to his fellow countrymen that the purpose of this measure is "to confer on American ships a monopoly in the world's carrying trade with the United States." This is truly interesting. Our own American impression is that the purpose of this bill is to secure for the American flag our rightful share of from 50 to 60 per cent of the world's carrying trade with the United States, which for 60 years has been chiefly monopolized by foreign shipowners. Presumably Sir Norman Hill had not seen the American shipping bill when he wrote his protest, for the whole proposition contemplates an American overseas shipping fleet of 7,500,000 gross tons, as compared with Great Britain's present 20,000,000 tons.

Sir Norman Hill solemnly proclaims that when the American ships have secured their monopoly "the national ships will become the masters and cease to be the servants of commerce with the country by which the monopoly has been conferred."

Applying Sir Norman's own logic, have British ships, which for years monopolized 98 per cent of the commerce passing between Great Britain and the United States, been all those years the "masters" of that commerce? Why, then, does he object to the proposal of President Harding to secure for our own ships the carrying of 50 per cent of the immigrants into this country and at least 50 per cent of our imports and exports?

Here is another Briton violently whistling to keep his courage up—Sir William Seager, described as the chairman of the Ropner Shipbuilding & Repair Co. (Ltd.), who, at the annual meeting of his concern in Winchester House, Old Broad Street, London, E. C., as admirably quoted by the Liverpool Journal of Commerce of October 21, 1921, proclaimed to his stockholders that though "the amount of tonnage built by the Americans was terrific, they could never manage ships to compete with this country. They did not know how to do it, and they could not do it." [Hear, hear.]

This sapient remark recalls the famous dictum of earlier British business men that the Yankees "did not know how to make iron and steel and never would know—their climate would forbid it." This gem of prophecy has outlived many years and is to be commended to the serious attention of Sir W. Seager, M. P., D. L.

Under the graphic heading "American Ship Subsidy Makes J. B. Apoplectic—'Underhand Plot, B'Jove,'" our American newspapers on January 26 last published a dispatch from London in which another eminent British shipbuilder, Sir Edward Mackay Edgar, director of Workman & Clark, in comment on the Washington report of President Harding's plan for the merchant marine, proclaimed that "It is an affront to the heart of England and an indirect, underhand plot against British shipping. President Harding tries to stab Britain—of all countries—in the back!" This because the American Government proposes to take over as its own some of the 98 per cent of commerce between Britain and the United States which British steamship companies long monopolized—this is an effort to "stab Britain in the back." Sir Edward seems to have no hope of help from either "the farmer vote" or "the Democratic Party" in this crisis of Britain's fate.

We come now to a gentleman of even higher station—no less a personage than the British ambassador, Sir Auckland Geddes, who lately departed from our shores for a vacation in England after certain utterances of his on American domestic questions had been brought to the attention of Congress and the country in the other Chamber by the senior Senator from Indiana. The ambassador had been talking about American tariffs and American shipping with a frankness which Senator Watson described as "going entirely outside the bounds of propriety in attempting to dictate the policy of this mightiest of nations in the recorded history of time."

Sir Auckland had gone to Chicago to deliver a speech in which he was quoted as suggesting that "American business use British service, such as insurance and the use of English ships, as a means of solving the problem of diminishing exports." In other words, the smaller our exports shrank, the more we should depend upon English ships for the carrying of them—a somewhat strange philosophy.

Moreover, the British ambassador had gone to Minneapolis to talk about ships on November 4, 1920, in an address to the Civic and Commerce Association—that is, he had gone to a point about as far distant from the ocean as he could possibly reach to discuss maritime problems with his Minneapolis audience. To them he avowed that the statement that the British Government subsidizes British shipping is incorrect and conveys a false impression.

It may seem inconsiderate to Sir Auckland, but it is a hard fact that in discussing this very question of British subsidies the Royal Tariff Commission of his country years ago said: "In effect the Admiralty contracts constitute a rigid system of protection," particularly "to the British engineering and shipbuilding industry." "Engineering and shipbuilding derive other considerable advantages from Government subsidies and Government mail transport and other contracts given to various British shipping lines. During the past 10 years the Government money which has passed into the hands of British steamship companies in respect of these and similar services has amounted to nearly £2,000,000 per annum." Apparently there is some disagreement between the Royal Tariff Commission and the genial British ambassador to the United States which we Americans must perforce leave to these two eminent British authorities for adjustment.

There was another remark on the shipping question which Sir Auckland Geddes delivered at Annapolis. It was to the effect that any statement that "American ships have been placed at a disadvantage with British ships by British Government action" is not true. And he added, "Our policy is based on the principle of 'fair trade and equal opportunity.'"

A few months before Sir Auckland so eloquently described the British policy as one of "fair trade and equal opportunity" an American shipowner sought at the port of Alexandria, Egypt, a part cargo of Egyptian cotton destined for the United States, the property of American cotton mills. This American shipowner was told that the carrying of Egyptian cotton to America was a well-established prerogative of British ships alone, and not a pound of that cotton could be given to an American vessel.

Thereupon the American ship departed without any freight, but her captain reported the circumstances to his employers, who passed it on to the Government in Washington. When the next bids for the transportation of Egyptian cotton were made 40 shillings a ton to America was the demand of the Liverpool liners' conference. But, to the consternation of the British monopolists, American ships bid 25 shillings a ton.

Nevertheless, so close working was the British monopoly of shipowners, merchants, planters, and others at Alexandria that the high British bid was accepted, the lower American bid refused—and Egyptian cotton continued to go to the mills of New England in British ships exclusively.

Then the United States Government, through the Shipping Board, decided that it was time to take a hand. It sent word across the seas that American ships would carry that cotton at 15 shillings a ton if necessary, and that American ships must have a fair share of American-owned cargoes. After some blustering the British line "came down" and the supplies of Egyptian cotton for American mills are now being conveyed one-half in American ships, one-half in British ships, at a rate of 25 shillings a ton to New York and Boston. This episode, that may be repeated at any time in any distant ports of the world where American ships seek freights that British shipowners want, is a good shining example of the "fair trade and equal opportunity" which Sir Auckland Geddes expounded to his Minneapolis audience.

I have been asked the question as to a comparison of present ocean freight rates with those of pre-war periods. I have been furnished by Mr. Love, of the Shipping Board, with a schedule of the rates on flour, grain, and provisions for 1922 as compared with those of 1913, which I desire to present to the membership of the House.

The following ocean freight rates prevailed in the early part of 1913 from New York to London, Liverpool, and Hamburg:

	1913
	Flour.	Grain.	Provisions.
London.....	22 cents per 100 pounds.	16 cents per 100 pounds.	20 per cent plus 5 per cent—23 cents per 100 pounds.
Liverpool.....	20 cents per 100 pounds.	15 cents per 100 pounds.	Do.
Hamburg.....	27 cents per 100 pounds.	42 pfenning per bushel = 164 cents per 100 pounds.	32 cents per 100 pounds.

Present rates between the same points and on the same commodities in November, 1922, are as follows:

	Flour.	Grain.	Provisions.
London.....	17 cents per 100 pounds.	10 cents per 100 pounds.	35 cents per 100 pounds.
Liverpool.....	do.	do.	Do.
Hamburg.....	15 cents per 100 pounds.	do.	20 cents per 100 pounds.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I would like to inquire as to the division of the time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama has consumed 8 hours and 47 minutes and the gentleman from Massachusetts 8 hours and 28 minutes, a difference of 19 minutes against the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. I will yield the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CHALMERS] 10 minutes.

Mr. CHALMERS. Mr. Chairman, I favor this bill for patriotic reasons, and I also favor the bill for business reasons. I am in favor of saving and building up the American merchant marine. As you gentlemen know, I am particularly interested in water transportation, and I want to say to you that one of the most expert transportation men of this country, Mr. Elisha Lee, of the Pennsylvania Railroad, has said that the freight load of this country practically doubles every 10 years. Mr. Lee says that in 1890 the freight load handled in this country amounted to 79,000,000,000 ton-miles. In 1900 it had increased to 141,000,000,000 ton-miles, and in 1920 it had increased to the enormous sum of 448,000,000,000 ton-miles, practically doubling every 10 years. Then he makes an inference that in 1930 the freight load in this country will be increased to 800,000,000,000 ton-miles. I make the prediction that in 1932 to 1935 the freight load of the United States will have increased to the enormous sum of 1,000,000,000,000 ton-miles.

I want to say to my friend from Kansas [Mr. TINCER] and other Members from the Middle West that if we can at this time save the American merchant marine for future use, and this bill and its provisions extend over a period of years—10, 15, or 20 years—if we can save this remnant for future use and build it up into a well-rounded freight-handling instrument, his section of the country and the granger States of the West will be the principal beneficiaries of the provisions of this bill. It will cut the freight rates of this country billions of dollars a year. Take the enormous freight load which, in 1932 to 1935, will have increased to 1,000,000,000,000 ton-miles. What does Mr. Lee say is the cost of handling freight now on the railroads? Fifteen mills per ton-mile. What is the cost of handling freight by water on the ocean? From 1 mill to 3 mills per ton-mile. What is the cost of handling freight on the Great Lakes, that most efficient freight-handling instrument in the world to-day? One mill per ton-mile.

I stood in the Toledo Harbor last month and saw the Hocking Valley derrick load into one of the lake freighters 4 carloads of coal every 3 minutes, or every 24 hours more than 100,000 tons of coal were transferred from the rails and put into lake freighters. The Great Lakes are the most efficient transportation system in the world to-day.

If you take 2 mills per ton-mile as the average cost of water transportation on the inland rivers, the Great Lakes, and the ocean, what will be the saving over the cost of shipping by rail, assuming that we can carry one-half the freight load by water? Thirteen mills per ton-mile, or a total saving when the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence waterway is completed and the freight load is increased to one trillion ton-miles—the saving will be $6,500,000,000 per year. Then it is good business judgment to hold this nucleus of ships and build up the American merchant marine into a well-rounded fleet.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Will the gentleman yield briefly?

Mr. CHALMERS. I will.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. The gentleman speaks of reduced freight rates by this bill. Is there anything in this bill to prevent a combination of our ships with foreign ships or to provide any supervision of the rates charged?

Mr. CHALMERS. The distinguished leader of the minority on this committee can answer his own question better than I can.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. I do not think there is.

Mr. EDMONDS. You might say to the gentleman from Texas that the original shipping bill, of which he was a potent factor in drafting, carried all the protection possible to the shipping interests and to the people interested in everything connected with shipping.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. I want to say that the original bill was without a substantive provision, and this bill has a substantive provision. And there was no—

Mr. EDMONDS. I say at that time it was impossible for us to regulate the rates in the foreign trade and competition, but we put every restriction in the original bill that we could to prevent abuses and hardship to the people.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Let me ask the gentleman just one question: There is nothing in this bill that gives the Shipping Board or any other public authority the right to reduce rates?

Mr. EDMONDS. Nothing other than we gave in that act, nothing in this bill.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Then there is nothing in this bill.

Mr. CHALMERS. This is very interesting, but it does not get across the proposition I want to discuss.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. How much time does the gentleman wish?

Mr. CHALMERS. I will take 10 minutes.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. I yield the gentleman 10 minutes.

Mr. CHALMERS. I want to say in good faith I believe this country must be relieved from the high freight rates or we will be bled white and smothered commercially under excessive freight rates. I am in favor of lake and river transportation of freight as well as ocean transportation. I think that history will bear me out in saying that that country is the most successful commercially that makes the ocean its first transportation unit. My opinion is that the rivers of this country, the Mississippi, the Missouri, the Ohio, the Columbia, the Delaware, the Willamette, the Tennessee, and others, should all be developed and improved to carry their portion of this freight load. But I want to put in the RECORD this prophecy—I may not be here at the time and some of you will—but by the years 1932 and 1933 the great St. Lawrence seaway will have been completed.

Mr. Chairman, I am personally against subsidies; I am opposed to all forms of special privilege; but I am not opposed to extending sufficient Government aid to save the American fleet, so that it may in future years serve that great mid-western continent lying between the Allegheny and Rocky Mountains. It is the most productive region of the world, a modern Garden of Eden. When the St. Lawrence River project is completed and the 34 miles of rapids in this river are canalized and a 30-foot channel is opened from the Great Lakes to the Atlantic Ocean, the American merchant marine will help this great continent to take its place as a world leader.

That is why I favor the bill. I favor it because I want to save it for future generations. I want to see the waters of this country developed so that in 1932 one-half of the freight load of the United States, 500,000,000,000 ton-miles, will be handled by the rivers and harbors and inland and coastal waters of the country. If you can save 13 mills per ton-mile on the freight load in 1932, you will save approximately six and one-half billions of dollars annually to the shippers and consumers of this country. [Applause.]

I desire at this time to place in the RECORD some arguments in favor of the construction of the American seaway, or the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence deep waterway.

It has been said that the region of the valley of the Great Lakes is the cream jug and bread basket of the world. I want to say to you that if we are compelled to wait to send that cream and bread by rail and then by ship the cream will turn sour and the bread will get stale before they reach the consumer. It has been said that this seaway will be closed to traffic three months of the year. Well, what of it? If I were a merchant in any Great Lakes port and had a shipment to make on the day the season closed in the fall and it was at the time of the peak load of prosperity, if this seaway were completed I would wait for the spring opening in March and would then ship direct to the foreign port, and would beat any possible shipment by rail to New York City to be transferred there to an ocean liner.

The Undersecretary of State for Sweden informed me last February that during January, 1920, he was requested, while filling a post as consul in Chicago, to arrange for a shipment of several automobiles to Sweden. The credit was arranged, the purchase was made, and the automobiles shipped in January, 1920. They were shipped by rail to New York and from New York to Stockholm by ship. They reached Stockholm after winter had set in, in the late fall of 1920. If these automobiles had been shipped from Detroit or Toledo direct by boat to Stockholm, leaving the last of March, they would have been ready for delivery to customers before the last of April.

The railroads are inadequate to handle 40 per cent of the traffic during normal times and are hopelessly behind. It would take an expenditure of $1,000,000,000 a year for the next 20 years to eliminate this delinquency and bring the railroads abreast the natural growth of business. Vice President Elisha Lee of the Pennsylvania Railroad says that the demands upon the railroads double every 10 years. You know what that means.

The railroads have not had a building program for the past eight years. There is less railroad mileage now than there was in 1914. What will be the demands in 1930? Relief from that source is hopeless. The very return of the country to normalcy will tend to choke the business life out of the Nation by a lack of proper circulation. We must have relief, and the only relief in sight that we can avail ourselves of is the development of our waterways. That country is most prosperous that makes the sea the first unit of its transportation scheme. Don't blame us for a longing for an ocean port. It has been the desire of men and nations since the dawn of civilization to have an outlet to the sea.

Let me discuss with you frankly some of the benefits to the Middle West of this American seaway. In 1890 our railroad tonnage was 79,000,000,000 ton-miles; in 1900, 141,000,000,000 ton-miles; in 1921, 448,000,000,000 ton-miles; maintained at this rate of gain, in 1930 the total would be 800,000,000,000 ton-miles, and in 1932, when the canal will be opened to the shipping of the world, about 1,000,000,000,000 ton-miles. We are carrying freight now on the Great Lakes for a little less than 1 mill per ton-mile. On the ocean it varies from 1 to 3 mills per ton-mile. The average for the railroads is about 15 mills per ton-mile. Taking the water rate as averaging 2 mills per ton-mile, there is a difference in favor of the water haul of 13 mills per ton-mile. The waterways should be developed to carry one-half of the tonnage of the country. That would show water-carrying capacity of 500,000,000,000 ton-miles, which at 13 mills would show a saving of $6,500,000,000 per year.

The most extravagant thing this country can do at this time is to neglect its waterways. The successful peoples of the earth have been masters of the deep. During all time the prosperous nations of the world have been those who have made the ocean their first transportation unit. Just now the United States is coming into its own. We have ships to make our merchant marine the greatest and most efficient on the seas. We have ships, the organization, the will, but we have not the business. If we could only clear away the barriers made by the rapids of the St. Lawrence and let those ships into the Great Lakes and the Mississippi Valley territory they would pick up more business than they could handle. The Shipping Board has property valued at three and one-half billions of dollars. Five per cent of this amount would more than pay the American part of the St. Lawrence improvement. The Shipping Board is losing millions every year. Turn the Great Lakes into the Mediterranean Sea and you will change the merchant marine of the United States from a losing proposition into a profitable business. What private business management would hesitate to spend 5 per cent of its investment to turn a fatal loss into a magnificent profit? The time is here, the necessity is crowding us to the wall. The landlocked continent lying between the Rockies and the Alleghenies, the bread basket and cream jug of the world, the land of golden opportunities, rich in raw materials, lumber, coal, minerals, agriculture, and manufacturing products, must find a water highway to the ocean or we must surrender our enviable position as a world leader.

Mr. Lee further says that to handle the traffic of 1930 the railroad expenditures must be appalling; that is, it will be impossible. Every possible avenue of transportation is going to be needed. Therefore the development of water transportation from the center of the continent to the seaboard will be of immense advantage to the railroads.

The next time our country has a real revival of business we shall in all probability be confronted with the most severe congestion of railway traffic and the greatest inadequacy of railway facilities ever experienced in this country. Nothing could more quickly check a wave of prosperity than the inability of our railroad facilities to handle the traffic.

There are some things that must be taken for granted. We will not have time in 30 minutes to prove everything in a world project of the magnitude of the American seaway. You know there are some axioms or self-evident truths that must be taken for granted, even in such an exact science as mathematics. I give you my word that every statement of fact I use to-day has been checked up by Government experts and may be relied upon, even if I do not stop to prove them all.

In a word, let us see what the trouble is. I have seen seven reasons given by the opponents why this seaway is impossible.

FIRST, CLOSED SEASON.

They say that it will be closed in the winter. The record shows that, on the average over many years, the port of Detroit closes on December 18 and opens March 18, three months. What of it? The other seven or eight or nine months of the year the Detroit River carries more freight in tonnage than any other similar stretch of water in the world, not excluding the port of New York, for 12 months in the year. There is a certain freight load to carry each year. If the waterway can do its work in eight months, let it rest for the three or four winter months.

They talk of icebergs and fog. A report just issued by the New York Institute of American Business on the fallacies of the St. Lawrence waterway scheme says that Montreal is now one of the greatest grain-exporting ports in America. They are right. In 1921 Montreal received 138,453,980 bushels of grain. They handled more grain than all the Atlantic ports combined from Maine to Florida. They handled it with a little, old, antiquated, one-horse shay, man-operated, 14-foot, dilapidated canal, with no lock large enough to take in either a lake or ocean carrier. Give us a modern, up-to-date American seaway with only seven mammoth 860-foot cement locks, 30 feet over the sills, automatic control, with electric power taking the place of man power, and the West will come into its own. Such an unrestricted seaway will accommodate all the lake and 99 per cent of the ocean carriers. The grain and commerce from the Middle West and South and West will pass Buffalo without paying toll, will pass down the middle of the great St. Lawrence, past Montreal and Quebec, without paying tribute, and land their cargoes in Boston, New York, or any other market in the wide world. A statement just issued by the Port Commission of Montreal says that not a vessel nor a pound of cargo was lost by the St. Lawrence route during the year 1921.

They say we will meet exorbitant insurance rates. The lowest insurance rates prevail on those routes most frequented by traffic. That is on the main-traveled course. Wait until we open the American seaway from the loading station of the world to the markets of all nations and we will show you low insurance rates.

They say it runs through foreign territory and that it will injure Boston and New York to the advantage of Montreal and Quebec. Is that the reason why Montreal and Quebec are fighting the project even more successfully than New York and other Atlantic ports? The Quebec members of Parliament, the whole 65 of them, are all against us. One New York Congressman and several New England Members are with us. We have discussed four objections. Now let us take up the last three more in detail.

1. They say it can not be built; it is an engineering impossibility. It is the easiest great engineering project that America has ever been asked to solve. Sometimes I ask myself why the big-visioned men of the past failed to utilize this wonderful natural resource. It means greater prosperity for the country—not for any select section, but for all our people. The completion of this waterway is a program that interests us all. No matter what section of the country we come from we must work together in this one great cause. It is too big and too important a thing to permit sectional rivalries to overshadow our sense of justice and fairness. In the final analysis prosperity can come to America only when all the people are prosperous, and the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence improvement will do much to bring about that desired end. There is no excuse for prejudice and no reason for jealousy.

The International Joint Commission and the American and Canadian engineers have definitely answered the questions of feasibility. How simple are their plans! How easy of construction!

The 182 miles of river from Montreal to Lake Ontario are divided by the commission into five divisions. The first division is from Montreal to Lake St. Louis, 25 miles, 13 miles of canal and 12 miles of river, with an elevation of 45 feet. In the canal section they make use of two locks and a guard lock. The second division is from Lake St. Louis to Lake St. Francis, 16 miles, with an elevation of 83 feet, 13½ miles of canal and 2½ miles of river. In this section they place two locks and one guard lock. The third section is from Lake St. Francis to St. Regis Island, a distance of 28 miles, all open sailing, with a change in elevation of 3 feet. The fourth division is from St. Regis Island to Chimney Point, a distance of 48 miles, 7½ miles of canal and 40½ miles of river. The elevation is 92 feet, and they use three locks in the canal. The fifth section is from Chimney Point to Lake Ontario, with wide river sailing the whole distance of 65 miles, with a change of elevation of only 1 foot. The power works are recommended to be placed in the fourth section, on the international boundary line, and provide for the development of a million and a half horsepower of hydroelectric current.

2. Even if completed, they say, it will not be used. Why, friends, it is used now, with all its handicaps. The Great Lakes, practically land bound, handle more commerce than any other waters of the world. The south shore of Lake Erie from Toledo to Buffalo, inclusive, handled more tonnage in its harbors in 1918 than both Germany and France did combined in 1914.

3. It will not pay. This objection is answered in the second. If it is used, it will pay. The St. Lawrence Canal will cost $275,000,000 for a 30-foot channel, with the permanent works built so that it can be later deepened to 35 or 40 feet. These costs were figured between July 1, 1920, and July 1, 1921, when materials and labor were 20 per cent higher than now. The added value to the grain crop will more than equal the entire cost of construction each year after its completion. The price of a commodity is fixed where the surplus of that article comes in competition with similar commodities from other parts of the world. Hence the price of grain is made in Liverpool. Whenever you can cut the cost of sending a bushel of wheat from Kansas to Liverpool or a bushel of corn from Illinois you add that saving to the wealth of the farmers of those States. This does not apply to the surplus only, but the price of the whole crop is fixed by the price of the part of it that is thrown upon the market.

Canada is rebuilding the Welland Canal. It is now about 40 per cent completed. When the Welland Canal is finished and the St. Lawrence is completed, as recommended by the International Joint Commission, the Great Lakes will be turned into a Baltic or Mediterranean Sea. With a 30-foot channel from tidewater to the Great Lakes, Buffalo, Cleveland, Toledo, Detroit, Duluth, Superior, Milwaukee, and Chicago will have the same freight rates from Liverpool and other foreign ports as those in force from the same ports to New York City. Do you business men realize what that would do to business? Do the farmers and manufacturers realize what it would do to them to have the cost of the railroad haul eliminated from Chicago, Milwaukee, Duluth, Detroit, Toledo, Cleveland, and Buffalo to New York City? It costs 22½ cents to ship a bushel of wheat from Chicago to New York by rail. Save it and give it to the farmers. It costs $40.65 to ship an automobile weighing 3,000 pounds from Toledo or Detroit to New York. Save it and divide it among those who make the automobiles. It affects equally all the territory between the Alleghenies and the Rockies. When this seaway is completed the freight rates will be revised radically downward.

You ask me what proof I can submit to substantiate the above surprising statement? It is 160 miles farther from Liverpool to Cleveland by the St. Lawrence River than it is from Liverpool to New York. It is 275 miles farther to Toledo, 325 miles farther to Detroit, 860 miles farther to Chicago, and 950 miles farther to Superior and Duluth. What difference does even 1,000 miles make on a seaway? All the Atlantic seaports now, although some of them are 1,000 miles apart, have the same Liverpool rate. Let me quote from the report of the International Joint Commission:

"The commission is inclined to agree with the statement that there is a productive interior, ships will proceed as far inland as physically practicable, and that the farther inland they can penetrate the greater will be the resulting economy and the more extensive the area benefited." Notable examples of rivers on which considerable traffic has been developed by ocean-going ships are the Amazon, the Yangtze-kang, the Rhine, the Danube, the Columbia, the Willamette, the Delaware, the lower Mississippi, and the St. Lawrence itself. It appears in evidence that the same rate of freight was paid from New York to Bombay as from New York to Calcutta, although the latter port was 2,000 miles farther and involved 90 miles of a tortuous river channel much more difficult than the St. Lawrence. It may be noted that ocean shipping has to an increasing extent made Montreal its destination, although railroads extend down both banks from Montreal to Quebec.

Two thousand miles farther and a tortuous channel of 90 miles make no difference in the rates. The total restricted channel of our seaway, including both the St. Lawrence and Welland Canal, is only 59 miles. The equal rates from the lake ports are not visionary but are a corollary of the present practice.

Forty-seven per cent of all the tonnage shipped over sea originates in the territory west of Pittsburgh, east of Denver, and north of the Arkansas and Tennessee Rivers. Ninety per cent of all produce shipped abroad is grown in this territory. The value added to the grain of this region each year would more than pay for the cost of this project.

Now, I come to a part of this project that the East is vitally interested in. I refer to the hydroelectric possibilities. The value of the hydroelectric energy derived from the power works will add to the business of Boston more than ten times the possible loss from navigation. You are interested in this project by the possibilities from its hydroelectric development. The St. Lawrence drains one-fourth of the American Continent north of the Mexican border and in its course falls 224 feet and is capable of delivering more than 5,500,000 continuous horsepower. This is equal to the energy created by the burning of 60,000,000 tons of coal in the most modern steam plant. I call your attention to Professional Paper No. 123, issued recently by the Interior Department, W. S. Murray, chief engineer, recommending a superpower circuit, including Boston, New York, Baltimore, Washington, and adjacent territory.

On the 7th of April last President Harding, Vice President Coolidge, and the entire Cabinet gave the whole session to the discussion of this great project, with Secretary Hoover explaining its advantages.

WHAT IS THIS POWER WORTH?

Senator Leonard W. H. Gibbs, chairman of the New York State Commission, opposed to the St. Lawrence Ship Canal, says 5,400,000 potential horsepower of electric energy available on the St. Lawrence at $25 a horsepower, and you may be sure it will never be sold so low, amounts to an annual income of $135,000,000.

Massachusetts last year raised 33,000 bushels of wheat. The Department of Agriculture reports that the annual consumption of wheat in Massachusetts is 5 bushels per capita. The Commonwealth's 4,000,000 population multiplied by five equals 20,000,000 bushels of wheat consumed each year by the people of the Bay State. Their wheat fields produced only 33,000 bushels of wheat last year—less than enough to last the people two-thirds of a day. So the wheat they produce is negligible. Ten million hundredweight of flour must be shipped into their State each year to supply the needs of the people. If that flour is shipped by rail from Fargo, N. Dak., it will cost 62 cents per 100, or $6,200,000. When this deep waterway is built it can be shipped from the wheat fields of the West to Boston for $4,050,000, or a saving to the bread consumers of $2,150,000 per year—enough to pay you to buy all the wheat shipped from your port and dump it into the harbor where your forefathers dumped the tea at the Boston Tea Party.

The St. Lawrence waterway will make millions each year from coastwise navigation. It will make tens of millions from its hydroelectric works. It will light homes, stores, streets, factories, and cities. It will do the work, run the street cars and railroads at less than half the cost of to-day. We are just in the morning of the electric day. The greatest progress of science and inventions in this age will be made in the electric field.

I leave that part of the discussion with you. You are fair-minded men. You will readily see that the United States is not as it was 140 years ago, a narrow strip of coast lying between the Alleghany Mountains and the Atlantic Ocean. Beyond those mountains to-day is a vast domain whose people are interested in this seaway. Its success goes much beyond merely passing interest. It means their life or death commercially.

This project is more than a mere business proposition. Its potential possibilities are limitless. It contains romance, comedy, tragedy, life, and death, not only to this generation but to countless generations yet unborn. Let us be pioneers and promoters of this the greatest and most beneficent enterprise of the age.

Over beyond the Berkshire Hills and the Adirondacks, between Buffalo and the Rockies, there are forty-two and one-half millions of people who are being commercially smothered by a lack of transportation facilities. They are gasping for breath under the weight of high freight rates. The grain is rotting in the fields. Their automobiles are reaching the world markets a year out of date. They will be bled white by high freight rates unless relief comes, and the only relief is in the development of the national seaway provided by God at the creation; obstructed by only 34 miles of rapids. Those rapids are watched over and guarded by New York as Leonidas guarded the Pass of Thermopylae. You would imagine by this opposition that if this seaway goes through, grass would grow in Broadway and cows would be herded in Fifth Avenue, and the sheep and the lambs would go unmolested, even in Wall Street.

I am appealing to the Members of this House, where right and justice has always been given first consideration. No; the West will find its way to the sea. The 34 miles shall not stop them, even though guarded by selfishness and avarice and those who would exact a toll as our commerce passes through.

It is right, and, if so, you can not kill it off by fighting it. You will remember that a certain doctor of the law gave the Sadducees some pretty sound advice many years ago in the following words:

"And now I say unto you, refrain from these men and let them alone, for if this counsel or this work be of men it will come to naught; but if it be of God, ye can not overthrow it, lest haply ye be found to fight against God."

They thought they could kill the Great Emancipator by shooting him. They did not kill Lincoln. They killed themselves. They thought they could bury Lincoln and that he would be forgotten.

And so they buried Lincoln! Strange and vain!
Has any person thought of Lincoln hid
In any vault 'neath any coffin lid
In all the years since that wild spring of pain?
'Tis false, he never in the grave has lain.
You could not bury Lincoln tho you slid
Upon his clay the Cheops pyramid
And heaped it with the Rocky Mountain chain!
They slew themselves, they but set Lincoln free,
In all the world his great heart beats as strong—
Shall beat while pulses throb to chivalry
And burn with hate of tyranny and wrong.
Whoever will may find him—anywhere
Save in the grave—not there, he is not there.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I want to ask the chairman of the committee how much longer it is the intention to run?

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. I have two more speakers who want time.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I yield to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BRIGGS], a member of the committee, 20 minutes.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. I have two men who wish to occupy 10 minutes each.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas is recognized for 20 minutes.

Mr. BRIGGS. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I want to discuss this bill dispassionately and in the light of the facts developed at the hearings. I want also to dissipate some of the myths associated with this subsidy legislation, regarding the effect it would have if the bill is passed. There are also some other matters to which I want to devote some attention. One of them is this: The disparagement of the great Government-owned fleet, a fleet of over 12,000,000 dead-weight tons, the newest and best in the world to-day.

The president of the United States Steel Corporation, Mr. James A. Farrell, stated in an address last May that with few exceptions the fleet and vessels in it were as fine as those of any other nation. The president, Mr. H. H. Raymond, and the vice president and general manager, Mr. Winthrop L. Marvin, of the American Steamship Owners' Association, confirm this statement, though these two last gentlemen claim one-half of the tonnage is not suitable for general use.

And yet the people of the United States are constantly led to believe that this great ocean fleet which belongs to them is nothing but a colossal wreck. They are also led to believe that if this subsidy bill should pass it would promptly put upon the high seas all the vessels owned by the United States which are now tied up, a thousand or more; that all the vessels which the Government owns will be promptly disposed of, and disposed of at substantially increased prices.

What are the facts, however, as disclosed at the hearings with respect to these assertions or arguments? The facts are that the chairman of the Shipping Board himself testified that only 5,000,000 tons out of the 10,000,000 could possibly be utilized under the subsidy bill; that the other 5,000,000 tons might be classified as only from fair to useless. And not a member or official of the Shipping Board could tell how much of that 5,000,000 tons is fair and how much useless.

What could be the effect of that upon the buyer? Do you think that any man with that sort of condemnation would pay anything for the vessels, however good they might be? Does any man feel that it would be an inspiration to any man to try to operate them after they have been subjected to such condemnation, except some shrewd buyer who knew their worth and could buy them for little or nothing?

But this was not all. Chairman Lasker testified that he doubted "if under the happiest conditions the American flag will need the 3,000,000 gross tons, or 5,000,000 dead-weight tons, in its entirety." So that even if the subsidy bill should be passed it is not expected that even one-half of the present Government-owned fleet will ever be used.

Chairman Lasker has suggested that it will have to be done away with somehow; part possibly sold for conversion purposes, part disposed of abroad, and probably a large part will be junked.

Therefore, you might as well take from your minds the idea that these 1,000 ships that the Government owns are going to be put back upon the sea even under this subsidy measure, unless, as Mr. Farrell, of the Steel Corporation, says, trade revives. He believes it will do so within the next two years, and predicts that many of the ships which in his own language he says the public believes are obsolete may be found wending their way to the ports of the world with paying cargoes.

When I asked one of the leading advocates of this bill, the vice president and general manager of the Steamship Owners' Association, how many more ships could be sold, in his opinion, after the subsidy bill was passed, if it should pass, than could be sold without it, he could not tell, and he would not venture a guess except to say that possibly within a year they might sell several hundred thousand tons out of the over 10,000,000 tons which the Government owns.

Not only that, but everyone who advocated the passage of this bill before the joint committees of Congress always qualified his remarks as to the success of this subsidy bill, if passed, upon the vital thing that the American people should know, and that is that unless trade revives, and until ocean trade revives, you could not put the ships back upon the high seas. When that condition obtains you will, of course, need no subsidy, as it is admitted by Chairman Lasker that only a slight upturn in trade is needed to wipe out the operating losses which the Government now sustains.

Why, when I asked the president of the American Steamship Owners' Association how many more ships they would operate upon the seas if the subsidy bill passed than are being operated now he made the startling admission and statement that he thought they would have to tie up more vessels—some of those that are now being operated.

Does that sound like bringing to the people of the United States relief from stagnant conditions and putting their ships back upon the seas? Does that sound like justification for imposing upon them from $500,000,000 to $1,000,000,000 in 10 years, at the least, and the Lord only knows how much longer if the bill passes and it shall be kept upon the statute books of the Nation?

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRIGGS. Yes.

Mr. EDMONDS. I just wanted to state to the gentleman that the percentage of tonnage tied up in this country is very much greater than that tied up in other countries.

Mr. BRIGGS. I know that is true, and that a tremendous amount of tonnage is tied up all over the world. I know that witnesses have testified that the decline in the ocean trade has been the greatest the world has ever known. Let me answer the question further. I know that they testified that, the world over, they were losing money. I know that Mr. Lasker testified to that fact before the Committee on Appropriations. It was testified to also by Mr. Love, the vice president and general manager of the Emergency Fleet Corporation.

I know it was testified to by Mr. Marvin, the vice president and general manager of the American Steamship Owners' Association. But, my colleagues, it was further testified to that the reason 75 per cent of the Shipping Board fleet, the United States owned fleet, was tied up was to enable private owners to operate, and that that had resulted in the operation of 75 per cent to-day of the privately owned fleet and only 25 per cent of the Government-owned fleet. The hearings reflect the fact that the Shipping Board, every time a private line wants to become established, has withdrawn the Government line. I am not criticizing that policy. I commend that policy, because I believe in it. I want a great American merchant marine, as I believe every true American does. I believe that the ships ought to be privately owned and privately operated; and as soon as world conditions improve in trade they will be privately owned and they will be taken by private operators if you will withdraw from those who want to acquire these ships at an unconscionable sacrifice the bait of a subsidy amounting to from $500,000,000 to $1,000,000,000 a year to pay them for taking over for an insignificant amount the world's greatest and finest fleet, which, however, they will not promise to operate until ocean trade revives.

Mr. J. M. NELSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRIGGS. I am sorry, but I have only 20 minutes. In my opinion, you would have had even greater strides toward improvement in the development of the American merchant marine if the subsidy legislation had never been proposed. In my opinion, it has been a demoralizing agency. It does not give even a promise of restoring the American fleet to the ocean.

In this connection perhaps it is just as timely as anywhere else to say that one of the favorite arguments being made here and preached to the American people is in the form of a query: What are you going to do if you do not adopt subsidy?—always assuming that subsidy is going to do what nothing else can do. The whole fallacy lies in the fact that subsidy promises no relief, but involves tremendous harm, not only to American shipping but to the people of the whole Nation. The experience of the United States in the past as depicted by Spears in his "Story of merchant marine," 1915 edition, page 274, is that in the days of the old Collins Line the subsidy destroyed private initiative upon the Atlantic and took the spirit and initiative of American genius out of American shipping.

Spears says:

In the United States the paying of subsidies to a few lines simply killed private enterprise on the North Atlantic.

The present Shipping Board in the first study (marked "Exhibit A" in the hearings) which it sent to Congress frankly admitted that, with the possible exception of Japan, subsidies have proved a failure in building up the merchant marine of any country. Even in the case of Japan, Chairman Lasker also stated in the hearings that extraneous causes were very potent in the development of the Japanese merchant marine. (P. 222, hearings.)

As disclosed recently by the Department of Commerce, war conditions, not subsidies, were most largely responsible for the rapid increase in the Japanese merchant marine.

The department stated:

Two years of submarine warfare developed Japanese shipbuilding and Japanese shipping at seven fold the rate of its increase in 20 years under a carefully devised bounty project.

In 1918 the Japanese Government terminated its shipbuilding bounties.

It was, moreover, the World War which gave the tremendous impetus to ship construction in the United States and brought forth the great fleet which it now owns.

The past experience of the United States with subsidies and subventions has been far from an encouraging one, and chiefly resulted only in bringing about increased demands for more subsidies instead of building up a merchant marine. The testimony adduced at the hearings fully establish this fact. It shows that such experiments proved so expensive and fruitless in results the payments of subsidy were abandoned and postal subventions, such as have been employed by other nations, were relied upon.

The testimony at the hearings reflected that since the passage of the ocean mail act by Congress in 1891, which is sometimes known as the postal subsidy law, the Government has expended over $29,000,000, as shown in the following table (p. 182, hearings):

NOTE.—Payments on contracts which had lapsed prior to 1921: The annual payments made under the contracts mentioned in paragraphs 1, 2, and 3 are included in the last column above, marked "Total for the year."

1. From San Francisco to Tahiti by the Oceanic Steamship Co. from 1902 to 1912, the payments aggregating $421,566 for the whole period.

2. From New York to Habana by the New York & Cuba Mail Steamship Co. from 1903 to 1913, the payments aggregating $1,423,074 for the whole period.

3. From Boston and Philadelphia to Jamaica by the American Mail Steamship Co. from 1909 to 1914, the payments aggregating $1,469,841 for the whole period.

In addition to these payments the Government has also paid out over a period of 10 years, from 1912 to 1921, more than $18,000,000 for carriage of mails in American vessels, based upon a rate authorized by the act of 1872, which allows 80 cents a pound for first-class mail, and 8 cents a pound for mail of other classes, regardless of distance, as against the international postal rate of 35 cents a pound for first-class mail, and 4 cents a pound for mail of other classes.

Under its contract with the Collins Line, the United States Government paid out from 1848 to 1858, in subsidies, $14,400,000.

The United States Government, as further shown by the hearings, has also extended in recent years additional aid.

The only difference, apparently, between the pending proposal for subsidies and those which were tried out and failed in the past, developing not only waste and extravagance and insufficiency but no fleet, is in the colossal amount of subsidy carried in the pending bill from which the American people could not hope to escape, if the bill is passed, within a period of at least 10 years. The President in his message to Congress, the early part of this week, referred to a period of 25 years, and witnesses, advocating the subsidy at the hearings, indicated its continuance as a permanent policy.

Strength is added to this probability because the pending bill expressly declares that all moneys paid into the merchant marine fund for distribution and subsidies are permanently appropriated.

The bill, moreover, makes no provision whatever for the expiration of the subsidy legislation.

It is true contracts for subsidy are limited to 10-year periods, but new contracts may be made each year as long as there is any money left in the merchant marine fund for the payment of subsidies.

PROSPECTS OF RETURN OF SUBSIDY.

Return of subsidy only applies to such years as show excess earnings over 10 per cent net, and not to years in which subsidy is paid, where return is less than 10 per cent net, even though in subsequent years unusually large profits are made. (Pages 427-428, hearings. Testimony of Mr. Beecher.) It was apparent at the hearings that it was not seriously contemplated there would ever be much, if any, subsidy returned.

On question of return of excess earnings over 10 per cent net, Mr. Beecher, counsel for the Shipping Board, testified:

(Pages 422-423, part 7, hearings.)

Mr. BRIGGS. Well, it is intended, under this bill, as I understand at least, that they shall be entitled to earn a 10 per cent net operating income, isn't it?

Mr. BEECHER. That they shall be entitled to earn that?

Mr. BRIGGS. If they can, and the subsidy would apply if they do not. I mean, the subsidy applies whether they do or not, but doesn't allow them to make more than that, because 50 per cent above that sum, until they have refunded what they have gotten back during that period, has to be returned.

Mr. BEECHER. That is right.

Mr. BRIGGS. Based upon that provision in this bill, I am asking you whether an estimate has been made as to what return section 203 would mean to the shipowner in the way of tax exemption.

Mr. BEECHER. No; I hardly see how even a guess could be made at it. Of course, it is entirely dependent upon how much shipping there is engaged in the business, and to assume that any shipowner will, in fact, make 10 per cent this year, next year, or in any given time is an assumption for which, of course, there is no foundation. We only have hopes; that is all.

Mr. BRIGGS. But isn't that the practical foundation of the bill, that it is expected he ought to be able to earn that much as operating income?

Mr. BEECHER. I don't think there is any suggestion of that in the bill.

Mr. BRIGGS. Don't you think the suggestion is very plainly made on page 24, section 703, which says, "Whenever the owner of any vessel or vessels in respect to which he has received compensation under the provisions of this act shall have derived a net operating income from the operations of such a vessel or vessels in excess of 10 per cent per annum in any fiscal year during which he has received compensation hereunder upon his actual investment in such vessel or vessels and facilities employed in connection therewith, 50 per cent of such excess shall be paid to the United States Shipping Board to be placed in the merchant-marine fund, but in no event shall such owner be required to pay to the Shipping Board a greater amount than the total amount of compensation which he has received from the Shipping Board under the provisions of this act for the same period?"

Don't you think that distinctly contemplates he shall have earnings of 10 per cent net?

Mr. BEECHER. I think it is neither the contemplation, the suggestion, promise, or guaranty. It is merely the limitation upon his earnings under the subsidy if he is so fortunate as to make them.

Mr. BRIGGS. You don't think it is at all even contemplated—I don't mean guaranteed—but you don't think it is even in contemplation?

Mr. BEECHER. If you mean that either the Shipping Board or Congress, by this expression, is holding out to shipowners that they expect that they are going to make these sums, I should say emphatically no.

Mr. BRIGGS. How did they happen to use this expression in here at all—this 10 per cent—if it was not in somebody's contemplation that they might, under this measure, if passed and put into operation, earn that much and still be able to give it back? Isn't a whole lot of the very argument in favor of this measure that a good deal of this subsidy is coming back?

Mr. BEECHER. Of course, it is coming back.

Mr. BRIGGS. It doesn't come back until after the 10 per cent is earned.

Mr. BEECHER. It is coming back, after they earn the 10 per cent.

Mr. BRIGGS. Isn't it the theory upon which it is based? Hasn't it been argued very strongly all through the hearings thus far that this money is going to be paid back eventually?

Mr. BEECHER. I didn't hear it suggested—

Mr. BRIGGS. You don't agree with that at all? You don't think they will ever get the subsidy back at all, then?

Mr. BEECHER. They will if the earnings are sufficient.

Mr. BRIGGS. But you haven't any confidence in the earnings being sufficient?

Mr. BEECHER. I am not prepared to make any prediction on the subject.

Even Chairman Lasker stated at the hearings that he did not think that the proposed legislation would give an American merchant marine by the magic wave of a wand. (Page 27):

Mr. LASKER. It will be a good many years before we do not have any stuff left, with most favorable legislation. I want to make it plain here that I do not think the proposed legislation is going to, by the wave of a magic wand, give us a merchant marine.

At the hearings on the urgent deficiency appropriation bill of 1922, Chairman Lasker, on July 27, 1921, stated:

Those boats are laid up for two reasons: First, there is no world trade at all to warrant keeping them in operation, and, second, in building up the American merchant marine we undertook a great many things, and in many cases we took our Government-owned boats off and gave preference to privately owned boats, because our only hope of getting out of this awful mess of Government ownership was to have some company to operate boats, so that when the world conditions were better we could dispose of the boats, but that will take time. (Page 8.)

The steamship owners who testified, and the Shipping Board officials as well, did not seriously contend that, even if the subsidy bill were passed, any more ships could be operated until there was a conspicuous improvement in ocean trade.

Mr. BRIGGS. But you do not think you could get anything, practically, for the fleet under existing conditions?

Mr. RAYMOND. Not to sell it all out, unless you go to work and give some benefits, some aids, and stop this stagnation.

If the subsidies, of course, were great enough, empty ships could be operated back and forth at an enormous cost to the people, but with benefit to no one. Even the Shipping Board and the steamship owners did not advocate this.

Chairman Lasker testified:

If your question means merely taking into consideration cash outlay for operation, any upturn in the world trade would end the cash loss. * * * If we do not get Government aid and we get an upturn in world trade, so far as cash outgo is concerned, that would be ended, but if we take into consideration the capital value of the ships, it will not. (Page 211, hearings, "Merchant marine bill." Page 951, hearings, "Independent offices appropriation bill, 1923.")

Mr. J. R. Howard, president of the American Farm Bureau, in his testimony stated that he would regard such a policy as unwise.

Mr. BRIGGS. Well, now, Mr. Howard, of course you appreciate the conditions that obtain to-day in world trade, do you not?

Mr. HOWARD. Certainly.

Mr. BRIGGS. In fact, there has been a tremendous depression obtaining. The Shipping Board, out of the fleet which the Government owns, is only able to operate about 421 vessels, I think, at the outside. The rest are laid up. There is lots of shipping laid up in the world; lots of our fleet, the Shipping Board fleet, is tied up. Of course, when people do not buy the products, exchange products, and you haven't something to carry in the ships, it can not be a profitable operation in which to engage to move these ships back and forth empty?

Mr. HOWARD. There wouldn't be much money in that.

Mr. BRIGGS. No matter how much you might get to carry the lines on. If you carried empty freight trains back and forth across the country and taxed the people rates on that, it would be a serious obligation on the commodities when they did begin to move?

Mr. HOWARD. I wouldn't even ride to town and back in my wagon just for fun.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. We don't have to prove all these self-evident facts, do we?

Mr. BRIGGS. Well, I am just asking some of these things as dealing with existing conditions.

Mr. LAZARO. We do have to prove some of these self-evident things sometimes in order to look after the sale of stuff that belongs to the Government.

Mr. DAVIS. When they are being denied.

Mr. BRIGGS. Of course, you appreciate that if you have a commodity in vast quantity with but very little demand, no demand practically, and you say, "Well, I want you to get rid of this," it means you have to sell at such price as you can get, doesn't it, if you sell it?

Mr. HOWARD. If I recall, the statement which I made states that you have an excess of 20,000,000 tons of ships.

Mr. BRIGGS. You mean world shipping?

Mr. HOWARD. Yes; world shipping, and of course that surplus is going to depress the price and make the market very bad.

Mr. BRIGGS. Well, I say the conditions could not be any worse. I think everybody admits that very freely.

Mr. HOWARD. And there is going to be a continuing surplus for some time to come, evidently.

Mr. BRIGGS. Particularly until there is a trade revival?

Mr. HOWARD. Yes.

Mr. BRIGGS. A revival of trade to call for the utilization of more ships. Isn't that correct?

Mr. HOWARD. Yes.

Mr. Munson in his testimony at the hearings frankly admitted that in order to utilize and keep ships in service you have got to have a trade revival. He testified as follows:

Mr. BRIGGS. You have heard of the bids that were advertised here the other day, that they were regarded by the chairman of the Shipping Board as a joke, have you not? Mr. Lasker so characterized them.

Mr. MUNSON. I saw that in the newspapers.

Mr. BRIGGS. There really is—even in spite of the fact of the sales prices of vessels as shown to-day—no market for ships, is there?

Mr. MUNSON. No; there is no market, and without some aid of this kind, Mr. Briggs, we are not going to have a good market for ships.

Mr. BRIGGS. And you have got to have a trade revival, a commercial revival, in order to utilize ships and put ships in the service anyway, have you not?

Mr. MUNSON. That is right.

Mr. BRIGGS. The trade of the world has declined to such an extent that that has been in a very large measure responsible for the tremendous disaster which has overtaken the shipping everywhere, is it not?

Mr. MUNSON. Yes, sir.

MORE SHIPS TO BE TIED UP, NOT OPERATED, EVEN WITH SUBSIDY LEGISLATION.

Mr. BRIGGS. Do you think if the Government turns over its fleet at once, as you said, that it would require more vessels to be tied up than are tied up now, or do you think it will mean any advantage in releasing some that are now tied up?

Mr. RAYMOND. I think it probably might mean tying more of them up.

Mr. BRIGGS. More of them being tied up?

Mr. RAYMOND. Yes; although I must say they are operating them with a great deal of experience and judgment. They have taken off, to my own knowledge, many, many ships that were unprofitable, and I think that they have done exceptionally well. I think those losses of $900,000 were for four hundred and odd ships, were they not?

Mr. BRIGGS. Something over 400 ships.

Mr. RAYMOND. The operating losses there for 400 ships under existing conditions for March is as good as anyone could expect.

Mr. BRIGGS. Are the private operators doing any better than that?

Mr. RAYMOND. I know some of us are not losing that much, because we haven't got the Public Treasury behind us, but we are losing money all right.

Mr. BRIGGS. Practically everybody is losing money in the shipping game right now, are they not?

Mr. RAYMOND. I could not say that. I don't know. I know some are.

So I say subsidy promises nothing. It does not promise to sell another ship, because men who are expected to buy those ships tell you they can not use any more ships than they now have; that even if you pass this bill they have got to wait until trade revives, in order to put the American fleet back upon the seas in full number.

Mr. Lasker testified before the Committee on Appropriations that with a slight upturn in ocean trade he could wipe out the operating losses sustained by the Government; not inclusive of depreciation, or of interest, but wipe out the operating deficit which the Government is paying to-day. All the advocates of subsidy, the ship owners and operators themselves, who appeal for the passage of this bill, tell you that even if the bill is passed they, too, must wait for ocean trade to revive before they can make a success of shipping and put the fleet back upon the sea.

The decline in ocean trade being the cause of the tremendous depression in shipping, and responsible for existing conditions, ocean trade must first be revived before the ships in larger numbers can be operated. The return of ocean trade will restore the fleet to the sea without a subsidy, and why therefore should the American people be taxed from $500,000,000 to $1,000,000,000 for a subsidy?

I say it is favorite procedure to ask "What plan have you, if you do not take subsidy?"

In the first place there is nothing in subsidy except an old man of the sea upon the necks of the American people in the form of the taxation which attaches to it; a taxation which has been figured out by one of the witnesses at the hearings to constitute an indirect tax of 10 cents upon every bale of cotton and a quarter of a cent upon every bushel of wheat in the United States.

Well, this question, "What are you going to do?" was asked of a very prominent official of this Government not long ago by the Committee on Appropriations, when the urgent deficiency bill of 1922 was under consideration, and when the subsidy advocates had not come before Congress urging the passage of a bill which they stated was one they had never dreamed of before.

When the chairman of the Shipping Board (for it was Mr. Lasker to whom the question was addressed by the Appropriations Committee) was asked for the plan that he then had to offer, what did he say? This, my colleagues, was his solution, and it is probably the only plan which can now be submitted. He said:

When the world shipping gets buoyant the avarice of men will make them want to increase their fleet and will sell the ships, and that day is sure to come.

They talk about the Democratic side here and others who oppose this bill on the Republican side leaning backward and favoring continued temporary Government operation. Why, the chairman of the Shipping Board himself suggested that as the only remedy, the temporary continued operation of the ships by the Government. He said, further:

"And the Government has got to keep the ships going, and put confidence either in ourselves or some others, to keep them going as efficiently as can be under the circumstances until such time arrives," until shipping gets buoyant again.

All through the hearings, time and again, the prominent exponents and advocates of a subsidy stated that they had to wait until ocean trade revives. Asked when, in their opinion, that would be, most of them said they thought within the next two years, that there had never been such a depression before.

My colleagues, it is urged upon this Congress that this subsidy means only $30,000,000 a year. Do not deceive yourselves with any such thought as that. Do not think for an instant that that is the limitation of cost. Why, the bill itself appropriates 10 per cent of the customs receipts, and 10 per cent of the estimated returns according to the latest figures would indicate over $40,000,000 a year. It further puts into the subsidy fund the tonnage taxes doubled under this bill, which are now $2,000,000, and which are increased to $4,000,000, making $44,000,000 in cash subsidies alone. Also provides for swelling the subsidy fund further by paying into it any excess earnings paid by shipowners, if there should ever be any such excess earnings. Provision is also made for doubling subsidies:

STATEMENT OF MR. R. T. MERRILL, DIRECTOR OF BUREAU OF RESEARCH, UNITED STATES SHIPPING BOARD.

Mr. GREENE. We will proceed.

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Merrill, in your estimate of $32,000,000 direct aid, to which you testified yesterday, have you taken into consideration the double aids allowed by the bill?

Mr. MERRILL. No, sir. That is estimated on the scheduled payments alone.

Mr. BLAND. Have you any estimate showing the amount of increase which would be occasioned by these double aids?

Mr. MERRILL. I could give you the amount of direct aid by schedule that any size, speed, and service will derive; and, of course, assuming the full figure of 100 per cent, it would be twice that, sir.

But this bill does more than that. It permanently appropriates every dollar which gets into that subsidy fund. If you spend only $30,000,000 one year, the accumulation is to stay in that fund for other years, to be used in the future. It is a growing fund, though out of it may only be spent $15,000,000 the first year and $30,000,000 the next year.

But that is not all. Your committee members, or some of them on our side, tried at the hearings to ascertain the value of the so-called indirect aid, how much that would amount to. Only in one respect could we get an estimate, and that estimate was with reference to the 5 per cent tax rebate—that it would amount to from $8,000,000 to $10,000,000 a year.

But they testified in that hearing that the indirect aids are more valuable than the direct aids or cash subsidy. If the direct aids under this bill will include between forty and fifty million dollars, the indirect aids must be more than equivalent; so, all told, they will amount to approximately $100,000,000 a year. Chairman Lasker testified, "Because of the great value it places on the indirect aids, the Shipping Board figured a very modest sum for direct aids."

If anybody reads this bill they will see that it bristles with tax exemptions of various kinds. I notice one of the advocates of the bill talked about the Shipping Board having power to decrease subsidies. I want to say that the subsidies can not be decreased without the consent of the gentlemen who secure that subsidy during the life of the 10-year contract. The subsidy is not going to be decreased by consent, my colleagues. It may be increased, but it will not be decreased.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Texas 10 minutes more.

Mr. BRIGGS. I want to discuss another argument frequently urged in support of this legislation, and that is that it means a reduction in freight rates. Why, on the contrary, it probably will mean an increase in freight rates. There is not a scintilla of regulation of ocean freight rates in this bill. It does put the railroads into the business of operating steamships in the foreign trade; it does, for the first time, perhaps, in the history of this country, allow the railroads to draw a subsidy for oversea operations in foreign trade. Yes; it does that, but it provides no regulation by anyone of the rates which may be charged in that ocean trade.

Mr. BOX. Will the gentleman yield for a brief question?

Mr. BRIGGS. Yes; for a moment.

Mr. BOX. Do I understand that the railroad companies connected with a steamship line will draw a subsidy?

Mr. BRIGGS. Certainly; draw it in the sense that under the bill they are entitled to it if the Shipping Board will award it to them.

Under the provisions of this bill the Shipping Board has unlimited power of determining who shall and who shall not get a subsidy. But under the power given, as specified in the bill, there is nothing upon which a man could rely so as to establish or protect a right to a subsidy in the courts of the land. The opinion of the board absolutely and finally determines who has and who does not have the ability, experience, character, and resources which would be reasonably calculated to carry out the policies of the law.

The President in his message last Tuesday said that, under the law of 1920, the failure to name a fixed interest rate for use of the construction loan fund "leaves the grant of building loans subject to any whim of favoritism." If this criticism can justly be lodged against merely the fixing of an interest rate on a loan, how much more strongly would it apply to the unrestrained power of granting or denying subsidies which is vested in the board by this bill, a power not subject to review in any court, and yet one which can make or destroy not only the steamship operator but ports throughout the United States.

Mr. Merrill, of the Shipping Board, also testified (p. 492, hearings):

Mr. MERRILL. The paper which I prepared yesterday showed, or was intended to show, the need for aid to American ships. It was not intended to claim, and I think does not, that all of those ships would get the full amount of aid. It was conceded that some might get none. How long and to what extent that aid would be needed we can not say. It is obviously needed in much the greater part of the ships to-day; but it might be—and this is the reason I can't give you a direct yes or no answer, much as I would like to, Mr. Briggs—it might be that these indirect aids may in time give enough aid—possibly within one or two years after direct aid—to place the ships on a self-supporting basis.

Mr. BRIGGS. I understand that. I understand there is a possibility that some of the lines—a great many of them, all of them—might succeed without any subsidy at all. I understand that. I do not understand, however, that we are just dealing here in the realm of possibility. I thought the whole thing was presented here on the basis of probabilities; and that is your argument here, that without these cash subsidies and other indirect aids the merchant marine can not live. I thought that was the whole gist of your argument yesterday.

Mr. MERRILL. Yes; largely.

Mr. BRIGGS. Well, that is what I thought. I am not asking for anything but frank statements. Now, if you leave out some of these American operators and give aid to others, the chances are that those who do not get it will not succeed, and those who do will. Is that the argument? Is that correct?

Mr. MERRILL. If the board—

Mr. BRIGGS. Just answer yes or no.

Mr. MERRILL. I can't answer that yes or no. If the board should give aid arbitrarily—refuse to give aid to a company otherwise entitled to it—it would have that effect, possibly.

Mr. BRIGGS. Yes; while the other line would go ahead and succeed?

Mr. MERRILL. Yes, sir.

Mr. SCHLESINGER. Hasn't the Shipping Board to-day got more power to put a company out of business by putting in competition or a fleet of its own boats?

Mr. BRIGGS. I am not saying that the Shipping Board to-day is not given a great deal of power. It is; but I think the witness here on the stand yesterday stated that this bill vests the Shipping Board with very much more power.

Mr. SCHLESINGER. I think it does.

Would it be said that with the great capital which the railroads possess they did not have the resources? Would it be said that the experience in inland transportation that they have acquired would not favor them when they applied for a subsidy? Would it be said that they would not have the ability?

My friends, this bill, in my opinion, means precisely this: It means the drifting of the finest fleet in the world to-day into the hands of a special few, a great syndicate or a group organized to take over that American fleet and be paid $500,000,000 to $1,000,000,000 to continue the operation, without any promise of continuance until trade conditions improve. But control of the Government fleet will carry with it the power to increase ocean rates. And does anyone imagine that power will not be utilized? The experience during and for a year and a half after the war closed was an era of fabulously high ocean freight rates, when ships in some instances were practically made to pay for themselves in a single voyage. Rates in some instances advanced over 1,250 per cent over pre-war rates. Of course, the demand for tonnage was almost unprecedented; but the people were made to pay all that the traffic would bear.

And yet without any regulation of ocean freight rates whatever, subsidy advocates would have the public innocently believe that those who acquire control of the Government's fleet will be interested chiefly in reducing ocean rates, and, apparently—from comparisons made with Government aid for highways and other great public works, which are free to all—not charging anything whatever for carriage of commodities on the high seas. The absurdity of such argument will be apparent to all.

The control by the Government of its great fleet has had at least some restraining influence in fixing of rates, and the instance cited by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. EDMONDS] of how promptly an advance in ocean rates on coal was checked by the Shipping Board calling into service additional vessels of its own was not only illustrative of the value of an American merchant marine, but especially suggested the thought whether if a private monopoly had then controlled our shipping such reductions would have been made.

The hearings disclosed that ocean freight rates are fixed by agreement between American and foreign lines and are arrived at in so-called conferences.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRIGGS. I will.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Would not the railroad owning a steamship line give that proportion of rates so that no railroad owning a steamship line would ever earn over 10 per cent?

Mr. BRIGGS. That may be. The railroads now are given favored legislation so they may make certain net earnings. The limit under the transportation act purports to be 6 per cent. There is no limit, however, fixed in this bill. No limit fixed at even 10 per cent; but if more than 10 per cent is earned in any one year, one-half of the overplus in such year must be returned in restoration of the subsidy paid during that year. Otherwise the railroads or other steamship organizations may earn all they can, whether 50 or 100 per cent, and after deduction of the subsidy for such year the rest would go into the coffers of the company, for which they would make no accounting whatever.

This bill is certainly not a beneficent measure for the American people. I say it is fraught with the greatest danger to the American people and imposes great tax burdens upon them.

It has not been shown that this subsidy legislation will restore America's idle tonnage to the seas nor enable the Government to sell its fleet at even present world market prices and retire from shipping operations.

You will still have to depend on a revival of foreign trade. I am sustained in that by the chairman of the Shipping Board himself when he appeared before the Committee on Appropriations in 1921 and never breathed a word of subsidy. He said we would have to wait until shipping gets buoyant and the avarice of men will make them want these ships and restore them to the seas; that such time is sure to come; and until that time the Government necessarily must continue the operation of the fleet.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRIGGS. Yes.

Mr. McDUFFIE. I have listened with great interest to what the gentleman is saying, and I want to ask him to discuss what effect the bill will have upon the smaller ports.

Mr. BRIGGS. It will result, in my opinion, in the acquisition of this great Government-owned fleet by a great subsidized syndicate, a steamship combination, which the president of the American Steamship Owners' Association testified can be organized to take it over, or its acquisition by the railroads, or perhaps by both, and it will result in confining the operations of that fleet to a few selected ports of the United States of greatest influence, while lines of American steamers which other ports seek to establish will not have strength or resources sufficient to compete with such combination of capital and probably be denied the subsidy given the stronger organization. The result would be the smaller American lines would languish and die, and the effect upon the less-favored ports would be disastrous. You will find testimony in the hearings that such would be the result.

Section 5 of the Jones Act is amended by this bill. It is amended chiefly by taking out of it the provision inserted there by Congress that this fleet should not be practically given away; that it is too valuable an asset; that it should be advertised for sale and that competitive bids should be invited; but that it should be sold as soon as possible to private owners. It was provided that the Government should not stand in the attitude of a person who was forced to sell; that it should not go under the hammer at whatever price it might bring and be sacrificed for a song. Everybody who testified at the hearings, those who advocated the passage of this bill and those who were against it, unanimously stated, as did the officials of the Shipping Board, that you could scarcely give away a ship to-day; that you could not sell the fleet. Yet at the hearings everybody who favored the bill wanted the ships sold as soon as possible, after having admitted that nobody wanted to buy them; also advocating, in the same breath, the removal of the restrictions against absolutely sacrificing the ships that exist now in the shipping law, and urging that they should be sold at all hazards and, I assume, to any buyer who would pay anything at all for them.

Mr. Lasker testified that Mr. Teagle, the president of the Standard Oil Co., said that he would not pay $40 apiece—not $40 a ton—for Government tankers, for that he had all that he needed now; and one of the gentlemen representing the tanker service at the hearings, introduced as speaking for them all, said that if they could buy them cheap enough they might tie them up for awhile in the hope of being able to use them a little later.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has again expired.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Texas five minutes more.

Mr. BRIGGS. Mr. Chairman, Mr. Lasker himself offered a solution for the present situation, and it was the only solution that anyone offered at the hearings except to press down for the passage of the subsidy bill. His solution was that the ships be retained until shipping becomes buoyant, and that that time is sure to come. It is estimated by those best able to know, men like Mr. Munson and Mr. Marvin and Mr. Raymond, that this would occur in two years to a substantial degree, and Mr. Lasker testified that it would require only a slight upturn in rates to eliminate the losses which are being sustained.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRIGGS. I have only five minutes, and I am sorry I can not yield.

Substantially the same view is expressed by Mr. Farrell, the gentleman selected for chairman of the Shipping Board by the President before Mr. Lasker was tendered and accepted the appointment. Mr. Farrell, it should be borne in mind, has not been advocating these subsidies, although the ships of his corporation would enjoy the benefit of the subsidy. There are 38 ships of over 200,000 tons of that corporation which it was admitted by Chairman Lasker are included in the subsidies under this bill; also that 182 ships of the Standard Oil fleet, representing a tonnage of 1,200,000 tons, would receive subsidies. One hundred thousand tons of the Fruit Trust fleet, would also obtain subsidies under this bill; all of these great fleets being now more than self-sustaining, if the reported accumulation of surplus and issuance of huge stock and cash dividends are to be credited.

The condition of shipping on the seas is a problem that confronts not only the United States but the other nations of the world to-day. Until ocean trade revives, you can not operate ships profitably.

We hear much talk about delivery wagons. One of the witnesses testified that he would not drive his wagons from his farm to town just for fun. If you pay large enough subsidies under the bill you may operate empty ships, if you want to, as France was accustomed once to do under her subsidy laws. Who would ever find justification, however, for any such action as that? Who would find support from the American people for running empty freight trains over this continent, which could be done, if you subsidized the railroads heavily enough, simply to see the trains run by?

The American people to-day are feeling the pressure of the transportation act. They are feeling the pressure of the tremendously high railroad rates, but even those are assumed to be limited to a 6 per cent return upon the money invested, as recognized by the Interstate Commerce Commission upon a valuation fixed by that body. This bill, however, fixes a minimum, not a maximum, of 10 per cent upon the whole investment. It allows owners to make that much money and then one-half of the surplus over and above that after paying back one year's subsidy, which they may earn during that year.

Under this legislation a depreciation allowance will be made to fleets like the Standard Oil, the United States Steel, and the United Fruit Company fleets, as well as to all other privately owned fleets, and it will enable them to write down the war costs of their fleets without regard to profits they have made during such period—profits the greatest in the history of the world, when the dividends declared were enormous, as shown in the minority report on this bill. The Standard Oil has lately declared stock dividends as high as 400 per cent and its subsidiary companies similar dividends of 200 and 300 per cent. Such vast profits enable them to write down depreciation. It enables them to bring the ships down to the present market value; and the testimony reflected that if custom had been followed and the revenue law had permitted, accepted practice would have been for them to have completely written off the capital cost of the ships by reason of the huge profits they had made through operation of them.

It must therefore be apparent to all who study this question that the proposed subsidy legislation constitutes no remedy at all for relief from existing conditions in the American merchant marine to-day; that it does not give any promise of restoring to the seas the American ships which are now laid up; that it does not give any assurance of selling the Government fleet at any better price than can now be obtained; it does not relieve the Government of any losses, but proposes to exchange the probability of elimination of all operating deficit within the next two years for a committal of the Government to the payment of huge subsidies aggregating, over a period of 10 years, $750,000,000 to $1,000,000,000; but the subsidy program does not end in 10 years, for, under the bill, it will continue after that time until it should be repealed—if ever that could be effected over the opposition of those who are the direct recipients of its bounty.

It is contemplated that the Shipping Board will continue to operate for a period of from three to five years, anyway, and will also continue as a bureau, with a large administrative staff of employees with resultant expense during the life of the legislation.

The probabilities are that, under the bill, immense shipping monopolies will be created and be the real beneficiaries of its lavish gifts.

If it should be passed, it will involve far more danger and harm to American commerce and the American people than it will good, and it will constitute a tax burden of the greatest magnitude.

I repeat that it is not subsidies which are needed but revival in ocean trade and increase in foreign commerce to put our idle ships back upon the seas.

Subsidies, whether granted to great shipping combinations or railway mergers, will avail nothing unless and until trade revives. And when trade revives, the operating deficits which are now being sustained will be wiped out, and subsidies would constitute only extra and unnecessary burdens upon the American people.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has again expired.

Mr. BRIGGS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BRIGGS. I want to refer to and present some of the testimony developed at the hearings which bears upon various phases and supplies much illuminating information regarding the pending legislation.

THE GOVERNMENT FLEET AND WHAT IT HAS MEANT.

In referring to the accomplishment of the United States in building the great fleet within such a remarkably short space of time Chairman Lasker asks:

How did we accomplish this miracle of production? (Washington Post, June 6, 1922.)

He also stated:

HIGH TIDE OF OPERATION.

At the height of its operations, October, 1920, the Shipping Board had 1,317 steel ships plying between our shores and those of foreign markets. With the decline which has come in world trade we are now (May 15) operating 447 steel ships, of a total of 3,675,614 dead-weight tons, and have 983 steel ships, of a total of 6,478,316 tons, tied up.

Immediately after the close of the war, had we not possessed the Government fleet, there is no doubt that freights would have soared even higher than they did; and to-day, were America's Government-owned tonnage withdrawn from the seas, our traders would pay increased tolls to foreign owners. So we must remember that while the operation of the fleet is costing us millions, it is saving us millions in freights and insuring us continuous relations with our customers.

But I aver that under the Harding administration the Shipping Board's operation has become comparable to the best operations of privately owned ships. (Washington Post, June 7, 1922.)

Chairman Lasker also testified (p. 9, hearings):

When the World War was over there was a great scramble on the part of all the maritime nations to use their own tonnage for their own peace-time needs. Had America not possessed the tonnage she built during the war, in the two years of prosperity that followed the war we would have lost largely of markets that were ours, much as their need would have been for our wares, because there would not have been tonnage available to carry our goods. Those who needed them would have sent us their ships to the extent that they needed goods, but even then many would not have had enough ships to carry that which they alone needed, and others would not have furnished us their surplus ships for our trade aggrandizement at their own expense.

The vast sums we saved to ourselves in freights alone, which through faulty governmental bookkeeping was converted to construction charges, would have shown during that period that handsome freight returns inured to the Public Treasury. Private operation at that time would have been impossible; there had been but little overseas carriage under the American flag by private owners before the war, and private capital therefore would not have been available at the war's conclusion quickly enough to operate successfully the Government-owned ships, even had the Government sold those ships at fair prices to private owners. So that in order that the war-built fleet might immediately come into America's peace-time needs the Government was forced into operation, an operation that from that time to this, through the lack of private facilities, has been the greatest insurance we have to our future overseas prosperity, which involves our entire national prosperity.

FOREIGN TRADE CARRIED IN AMERICAN VESSELS.

Chairman Lasker testified at the hearings that—

For the year 1921 America carried under her own flag 51 per cent of her total foreign trade. (Page 8, hearings.)

Mr. Merrill, Director of the Shipping Board Bureau of Research, testified:

Measured in quantity, we are at present carrying the major part of our foreign commerce in American ships, but this figure is attained only by including our huge traffic in mineral oil, most of which moves in American tank ships, and our Great Lakes traffic. Eliminating these movements, the United States is carrying only about 36 per cent of its foreign commerce in American bottoms. Since tank steamers can not be used to carry any other cargo, it follows that in order to protect our trade in all commodities except bulk oil we ought to have a merchant marine sufficient to carry at least 50 per cent of our dry cargo as well as 50 per cent or more of our tanker shipments.

Export statistics compiled by the United States Shipping Board, showing the extent of the movement of the commerce of the United States in American bottoms, is herewith given (page 1747, part 27, hearings):

The variance between these statistics and those supplied by the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce (pp. 1031 and 1041, hearings) is apparently due to the fact that the latter are based upon values and the former upon tonnage.

This is indicated by the testimony of Mr. Marvin, page 1022, hearings.

VOYAGE AND OTHER OPERATING LOSSES AND IMPROVEMENTS.

In January last Mr. Lasker also testified before the Appropriations Committee as follows:

The prepared statement I submitted yesterday showed that we are now losing about $4,000,000 per month. We feel that we have gotten that loss down to about the minimum to maintain the trade routes necessary, to pay the expenses of tie-ups which have to be paid if the ships are not running, to pay the expenses of the necessary repairs which must be made on the ships, and to pay the administrative expenses necessary to liquidating the properties of the corporation and the expenses of litigation. You will notice that of the $4,000,000 we are losing per month less than $1,000,000 is on account of voyage loss. The rest of it is made up of the expenses that I have just enumerated, and that loss would remain whether we were operating the ships or not. If we could get the claims out of the way we might bring our overhead expense down; I do not know how much, but by possibly one-half. (Page 909, hearings "Independent offices appropriation bill, 1923.")

The following record of operating expenses, chiefly furnished by the Shipping Board at the hearings, shows that while the number of ships operated was substantially reduced—in fact, about one-half within a period of 12 months—yet the voyage losses with reference to the present reduced number which have been operated for several months show a gratifying improvement. Mr. Lasker testified:

We only completed 155 voyages in February and we completed 108 voyages in January, although we had approximately the same number of ships out, and you only enter up in shipping your figures as the voyages are completed. (Hearings, p. 50.)

This same witness gave a very full statement of the operating losses, which testimony is as follows:

Mr. LASKER. I will cover some ground covered yesterday. The actual excess of expenses of voyages, just on the ships, and for managing agents, over income was in July $1,896,644.10.

In August—I am taking our fiscal year; the board's fiscal year—$1,853,297.80; September, $1,238,102.53; October, $765,323.43; November, $654,555.31; December, $1,249,081.61; January, $934,937.42; February, $527,879.30.

Mr. DAVIS. That is what I was referring to. You call that the voyage loss?

Mr. LASKER. I call that the voyage loss, yes, sir; not the operating. Now, that voyage loss will now be—in February we came to the low peak; then it goes up, because we haven't the cargo until fall, when the grain and the crops start moving.

Now, then, we have our repairs, which are constant, so long as we operate. In July the repairs were $1,467,376.82; August, $1,776,439.82; September, $1,114,621.02; October, $779,644.03; November, $1,306,321.93; December, $734,907.57; January, $950,000; February, $1,050,000.

Insurance expenses, which is constant, as constant as the voyage expense—understand, as long as you have voyages you will have voyage repairs; as long as you have voyages you will have insurance.

The insurance expense for July was $578,994.82; August, $604,191.30; September, $546,668.70; October, $688,244.51; November, $617,754.63; December, $641,998.65; January, $416,359.04; February, $320,355.53.

Expenses during lay-off. That expense, of course, would increase if we did not operate and did not sell, but as long as we only operate but this amount of ships we will have this.

The lay-off expense for July was $898,563.62; August, $877,621.71; September, $617,794.63; October, $685,690.81; November, $505,081.62; December, $605,532.09; January, $466,170.83; February, $413,076.60.

All of those expenses remain whether we liquidate the past or not as long as we operate up to this point. Those expenses are the actual expenses in connection with the tie-up and the physical operation of the fleet. Insurance and repairs are physical operation as much as the payment of the seamen who constitute the crews.

We then come to the next and last item and the only item that would be affected by the liquidation of the past—of the war—and that is the item of administrative expense.

Mr. DAVIS. That is what I was inquiring about.

Mr. LASKER. Sir?

Mr. DAVIS. That is what I was inquiring about.

Mr. LASKER. Yes; now we come to the item you were inquiring about, as to how far it would affect the general expenses.

Mr. HARDY. What did you say was the item affected by the sale of the ships, the operation?

Mr. LASKER. I didn't say "affected by the sale of the ships." I said "affected by the operation of the ships."

Mr. HARDY. I started to put down "The only item affected by the sale."

Mr. LASKER. These were the only items that would be affected if the ships were tied up. Let me put it positively—that is negatively. Those are the only items affected by operation. As long as we operate those items would be constant—that is, they would fluctuate according to business—according to how business was—but we would have to make provision for them.

Now we come to the only item that is affected by the liquidation of the past; but only in this are the items in connection with the liquidation of disputes and operation. I did not yesterday give you our overhead expense in connection with material sales and ship sales and the Shipping Board itself, because that properly we did not put into our operating administrative expense; so when you take the figures I am going to give you you can not deduct those of ship sales, for instance, from material sales. It would not affect that overhead, because we keep it in another account. In this account we keep only ships' operations and some claims. Many of the claims are in the construction department and would not be affected here, because nothing of construction overhead is in here; so very little of this administrative expense would be affected. You see, we have already taken the administrative expense, broken it down and separated it, and this is what remains.

Net operating "loss for the month of January of $3,445,449.14" (p. 50, hearings).

In July the administrative expenses were $1,182,423.56.

As I only came into office in June, that is the administrative expense that we inherited from the prior board.

In August the administrative expenses were $1,270,349.18; September, $1,159,008.38; October, $999,066.51; November, $999,629.07; December, $906,315.39; January, $677,981.85; February, $778,147.98.

These are the figures that constitute the $50,000,000. As long as we keep operating, these figures would be largely the same, less the loss that would be saved from sailing routes that would be operated by others. We wouldn't have the repairs on those ships any more, we wouldn't have the insurance, but the administrative expenses would be largely the same.

Mr. DAVIS. What was the total cost in February?

Mr. LASKER. The cost in February, I am proud to state—if you will permit another boast; you know, it is about the only dividend we get—to call attention to the very good work we are doing, the cost was $3,089,459.41.

However, I would say that you should not think later we are getting incompetent when the loss goes up in April, May, and June. It has to go up, because we can not get the cargoes. This is the low point.

Operating expenses, including losses for March, 1922.

Total operating losses..... $3,704,155

Including—

Voyage loss.....	913,720
Repairs.....	1,313,298
Insurance.....	391,565
Expenses during lay-up (of vessels).....	381,088
Administrative expenses.....	687,581

Voyage losses in March exceeded those in February, which amounted to $527,000, but the expenses during lay-up of ships were less, and the administrative expenses for March were $90,000 less than for February. (Hearings, testimony of Mr. Lissner, pp. 983 to 985.)

The New York Tribune of June 23, 1922, publishes a statement of the net loss the Shipping Board incurred in operation of the 400 vessels in service:

April.
Net operating loss.....	$2,977,246.72
Net voyage loss.....	$967,751.61
Total number of voyages.....	185

May.
Net operating loss.....	$2,660,486.81
Net voyage loss.....	$376,445.84
Total number of voyages.....	205

This improvement is due partly to the increase in passenger revenues, which for the month of May showed an excess of income over outlay (excluding overhead, repairs, and insurance) of $217,369.13. This is one improvement of $152,515.83 over the preceding month.

Excess of income over outlay for tanker voyages in May was $267,545.41, or an improvement of $124,813.14 over the preceding month.

This paper reports that for the first time—evidently referring to the period since the new Shipping Board was appointed, and not with reference to the period immediately subsequent to the armistice, when enormous net profits were made by the Shipping Board and even greater ones by American private owners—the Shipping Board shows that during the month of June, 1922, there was an excess from voyage operations of $204,531.75, as against a deficit for the month of May, 1922, of $376,445.84.

The Shipping Board, however, sustained a loss on operations during June, 1922, of $2,660,486; that is, the expense of operation exceeded receipts by the sum named.

Lay-up expenses amounted to.....	$365,572.61
Insurance premiums.....	418,875.40
Salaries and wages.....	471,396.80
General expenses.....	282,523.51
Repairs.....	1,461,016.71

This item of repairs, however, includes, apparently, repairs upon vessels laid up, which were put into commission to meet the demand for tonnage for transportation of coal. The repairs on such vessels amounted to approximately $500,000.

IMPORTANCE OF VOLUME OF TRAFFIC.

Mr. LASKER. We hoped to get the contract for the Army transport, which should give a great volume of business, and its volume that our ships need as much as anything else to bring down these costs. Personally, I think the greatest difference between ourselves and Great Britain is volume. (Page 59, Hearings.)

MERCHANT MARINE OF ALL COUNTRIES NOW LOSE MONEY.

Chairman Lasker also testified before the Appropriations Committee last January as follows:

Mr. WOOD. There is another thing that is striking. You are operating now at a loss. You have reduced it from some $6,000,000 a month down to $4,000,000 a month.

Mr. LASKER. Yes, sir.

Mr. WOOD. In a word, what is causing a loss now of $4,000,000 a month to the Shipping Board in its operating end?

Mr. LASKER. First, let us take the last two months, October and November; we are paying out actually more money on voyage account than we are taking in; that is, freights received are less than cash expended in physical operation of ships alone.

Mr. WOOD. I understand that. Are the corporations that are operating private lines operating at a loss now?

Mr. LASKER. I would say, by and large, yes; the world throughout. Very few are making money.

Losses being sustained by American and foreign lines in last year or 15 months:

Mr. BRIGGS. You mentioned the operation of vessels a few minutes ago by foreign lines as well as American lines, and I think you stated they had all been losing money?

Mr. LOVE. Roughly, I think they have all been losing money.

Mr. BRIGGS. And that has been going on for the last year or so?

Mr. LOVE. The last year or 15 months.

Mr. BRIGGS. In fact, there is hardly anybody making any money in the shipping business at the present time. Is not that true?

Mr. MARVIN. That is true generally of the whole world.

Mr. BRIGGS. Your idea, then, Mr. Lasker, is that there has been but little or no improvement in the situation so far as the operating end is concerned?

Mr. LASKER. Yes; there has been great improvement—tremendous, overwhelming improvement. Yes; there has been tremendous improvement. I think we have surprised the whole shipping world in every quarter of the globe.

Mr. BRIGGS. I mean in the actual operation—everybody, with the crews and personnel and condition of the fleet.

Mr. LASKER. Well, in some cases we are still giving a poor operation, and there I think it is done on purpose. I can not believe that it is an accident. It is some of those who are under contract and can not get out of it, you see. But, by and large, they are really getting a vastly improved operation, and the proof of that reflects itself in our insurance claims, reflects itself in the greater percentage of trade we are carrying, reflects itself in the greater percentage of our ships that are to-day sailing more promptly on the advertised sailing dates than any ships in the world, and that is what makes for confidence.

Mr. BRIGGS. I recollect some testimony you recently gave, I think before the Appropriations Committee, in which you stated it would require very little upturn in rates, I think, to put the Shipping Board on a basis where it would pay for the operation of the fleet. I understand you drew some distinctions at that time that it would not be an investment proposition; it would not be a paying proposition in that sense, but it would pay for the cost of operation.

Mr. LASKER. Yes, sir.

II.

OCEAN TRADE REVIVAL EXPECTED WITHIN TWO YEARS.

If, therefore, ocean trade improves—and several advocates of the American Steamship Owners' Association, such as Mr. Marvin, vice president and general manager, and Mr. Munson, of the Munson Lines, and others, testified that there were signs of slight improvement and that they thought that some time within two years an ocean trade revival might be expected—the operating losses of the Shipping Board, as well as the operating losses of private owners, can be terminated. It must be remembered that practically all the witnesses who testified at the hearings agreed with Chairman Lasker that the worst depression in ocean trade which the world has ever known is now being experienced, and it is not known how conditions could become any worse. (See testimony Chairman Lasker, p. 11.)

Mr. BANKHEAD. Well, don't you think the whole economic situation justifies the belief that shipping conditions are going to steadily improve—possibly slowly but steadily from now on?

Mr. MUNSON. I believe they will.

Mr. Marvin also testified:

Mr. BRIGGS. What I am asking you now is how soon can you expect a trade revival to normal conditions?

Mr. MARVIN. My own opinion is it will require two years under the most favorable conditions; but we should approximate—I mean get close to more normal conditions in world trade.

EFFECT OF BILL ON PRICES FOR FLEET.

It is urged that the passage of the subsidy bill will enable the Government to sell its fleet, sell it soon, and sell it at an increase in price of several hundred million dollars.

The evidence does not justify any such assertion or conclusion. In fact the testimony did not indicate anything more than a hope that an increased price might be obtained, but it unquestionably discloses that there was no one in the market practically to buy tonnage, even if the subsidy bill be passed, unless a shipping financial syndicate should be organized (which Mr. Raymond, president of the American Steamship Owners' Association thought possible) and take over the fleet.

In fact, Mr. Raymond did not seem to feel that the passage of the bill would mean the operation of any additional number of American-owned vessels, for he stated that he thought even more would have to be tied up than are tied up now. (P. 975, hearings.)

Mr. Thompson, president of the Texas Steamship Co., indicated that if the subsidy bill were passed and tankers could be bought at the extremely low price at which they can now be obtained that his company might buy some and hold them until trade conditions improved; but he did not indicate whether he meant to buy them at the price of $40 apiece, which Mr. Teagle, president of the Standard Oil Co., is reported to have told Chairman Lasker that he would not offer for a Government tanker at the present time, or whether he expected to get the tankers for even less.

Mr. LASKER. Well, I will answer that this way: There were peculiar reasons, for instance, with the Standard Oil Co. The president of the Standard Oil Co. told me that if we offered them tankers for $40 apiece he wouldn't buy them to-day. He couldn't use any more. You have to take one relationship with another. (Hearings, p. 230.)

The probabilities are that, so far as the passage of this bill bringing about an increased price for the Government fleet, it is calculated to have the opposite result, for it removes practically all restrictions regarding the sale of the vessels which were provided by section 5 of the Jones Act, and practically constitutes, by the removal of such restrictions, a legislative direction by Congress to the Shipping Board to sell the Government fleet as soon as possible for the best price that can be obtained, no matter what is bid.

The effect of this proposed change in the present law, which practically means a forced sale of the fleet, can only have the result of causing prospective purchasers, whether shipping syndicates or other large combinations commanding sufficient capital to buy, to hold off sufficiently until they can take over the fleet at their own price and get it for a song, practically for nothing.

The Shipping Board, as reflected by the testimony of its own officials and by their acts disclosed at the hearings, show that they are not being prevented now under the present law from selling the fleet to-day at even world market prices or lower. The report of the majority of the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries, accompanying the bill, contains the following statement:

At the present time there is, by and large, no market for our vast tonnage. Compared to the total tonnage built by the Government, practically no tonnage has been disposed of. After thorough consideration, in January last the Shipping Board decided to sell its tonnage at world market prices; and on its steel freighters, after careful investigation, it found this to be a minimum of $30 per ton for the best tonnage. So difficult is the situation for an owner of American tonnage to-day that even at these prices it has been able to dispose of but 100,000 dead-weight or 65,000 gross tons. (Page 6, committee report American Merchant Marine.)

Which reflects that the Shipping Board concluded to offer the fleet last January at world-market prices, but could not sell it under these conditions. This shows that the Shipping Board was not handicapped by the present law, but was affected by the tremendous decline in ocean trade and lack of demand for ships, even at such an extremely low price as $30 a dead-weight ton for its best cargo vessels. But in spite of the fact that the privately owned American steamship companies are declining to buy the Government-owned fleet, even at present world-market prices and less—which are at least one-third of what new construction would cost at the present time in the United States—yet these same steamship owners are particularly insistent that the Government should sell its fleet at once and as soon as possible, and that in order to do so the restrictions which it is claimed are imposed by the present Jones Act of 1920 should be removed.

If the present Jones law does not prohibit the Shipping Board from selling the Government fleet at present world-market prices, or even substantially less, what is meant by the insistence for immediate sale, without any safeguards whatever, unless it is that the magnificent American-owned fleet is to be forced on the market and sacrificed at a most tremendous loss, below even present world-market prices?

In fact some of the witnesses at the hearings thought the removal of certain safeguards now provided by law regulating the sale of the Government fleet might result in forcing the fleet upon the market and being sold at the greatest sacrifice, unless the Shipping Board should exercise proper judgment.

But would not the Shipping Board answer, if the new bill is passed, that Congress had exercised such judgment already in the removal of practically all restraints governing the sale of the vessels, and thereby indicating that all such vessels be sold immediately, no matter at what price.

The conclusion is irresistible that the Shipping Board would not only be justified in so deciding, but would probably feel impelled to do so.

Of course, if the fleet is to be sold off at world-market prices, it will probably not be disposed of for several years to come, even if this subsidy bill be passed.

With reference to the time that it would probably take the Emergency Fleet Corporation to sell enough of the Government fleet to go out of business, Chairman Lasker testified at the hearings as follows:

Mr. LASKER. I say in my statement that within 30 months from the time of the passage of this bill, I felt that I was on conservative ground in promising that we would dispose of sufficient ships to keep going the routes that the Government is now operating, and thus in that period put the Emergency Fleet Corporation out of business. Does that answer you, sir?

Mr. BRIGGS. I understand that if this bill should be passed it would be the purpose of the board to dispose of the assets as soon as possible.

Mr. LASKER. Yes; it is going to take a long time.

Mr. BRIGGS. I understood you to estimate it would take 30 months, anyway.

Mr. LASKER. Not 30 months to dispose of those ships we are now operating.

Mr. BRIGGS. Of course, those others which you have not given a particularly good name, it may take a whole lot longer.

Chairman Lasker testified (pp. 236, 237, hearings):

Mr. DAVIS. It was stated in the press some time ago, purporting to come from members of the Shipping Board, that $200,000,000 was expected to be realized. Is that substantially correct?

Mr. LASKER. I would not stand back of that figure. I do not know. It is in the womb of the future. If you don't give us this legislation you will never get this $200,000,000; if you give us this legislation, you may get more. How much I don't know.

Mr. DAVIS. Now, Mr. Lasker, I assume that you and your associates have made some sort of estimate as to what you would hope to realize out of our fleet in the event this bill goes through?

Mr. LASKER. I have answered that at such length to the judge and to Mr. BRIGGS that I can not think of a new way to answer it.

As demonstrating the accuracy of the statement that it is not seriously contemplated that even the passage of the subsidy bill is expected to bring a better price for the ships than can be obtained now, even though bids for the fleet last March were regarded as "facetious" and "jokes" by Chairman Lasker, attention is called to the testimony of Vice President Love, of the Emergency Fleet Corporation, witness on behalf of the Shipping Board, who testified as follows (pp. 862, 863, pt. 17, hearings):

Mr. BRIGGS. I want to ask this question. I don't know that it was made quite clear to my mind. Suppose this fleet was put on the market to be sold. As I understand, you think that is what ought to be done with it, at the earliest possible moment—that it ought to be put on the market and sold?

Mr. LOVE. Get it into private hands.

Mr. BRIGGS. Suppose it could not be sold except to a very few large companies. Do you think it ought to be sold under those conditions just the same?

Mr. LOVE. It might just as well.

Mr. BRIGGS. Irrespective of whether it could only be sold to a few large companies, one or more, you think it ought to be sold just the same?

Mr. LOVE. I do.

Mr. BRIGGS. At the best price they could get, putting it on the market.

Mr. LOVE. I do.

Mr. BRIGGS. Mr. Love, I think you said you didn't know what the bids were that came in?

Mr. LOVE. No; I do not.

Mr. BRIGGS. There is nothing in this bill, so far as you know, except the advantages offered in the way of subsidy and general advantages which the bill offers, that would produce a larger return from the ships than if they were sold now, is there?

Mr. LOVE. Well, I don't quite get your question.

Mr. BRIGGS. I mean by that, there is nothing to insure the Government a better price for these ships, if this bill should pass, than they could get right now, other than the fact that the subsidy would be paid. Is that true?

Mr. LOVE. Oh, yes.

Mr. BRIGGS. Well, now, if the fleet is to be sold and sold as promptly as possible, and that fact is known, don't you think bidders would hold back and bid just about as low as they could buy that fleet for?

Mr. LOVE. Oh, they might. The question of this subsidy is going to have a very vital effect on the value of that tonnage.

Mr. BRIGGS. Of course, it will. I am not speaking about that. I am speaking about the price the Government can get for its fleet. Suppose the bids came in—if this bill should pass—and the bids made were of about the same character as those recently made for the fleet, and it was thought then that Congress intended that the fleet should be sold and put into the hands of private operators at the best price the board could get. They would have to sell it?

Mr. LOVE. Then you are going to end all the good that is done, because if you are going to hold it and sell it at the value established after the subsidy is made a law, you are going to put into the hands of the private operators ships at a higher cost and put another burden on them.

Mr. BRIGGS. You don't think that ought to be done?

Mr. LOVE. Let them sell the ships at the best price they can get for them now and start over, like everybody else starts.

Mr. BRIGGS. Well, it is generally conceded that nobody now wants ships. That is true, isn't it?

Mr. LOVE. That is true.

Mr. Raymond, president of the American Steamship Owners' Association, apparently does not think that any more than present world-market prices ought to be asked for the Government fleet, even if the subsidy bill is passed. (Pp. 972-973, part 18, hearings.) A syndicate also may be organized to take over the fleet:

Mr. BRIGGS. How much do you think they would bring if a subsidy bill were passed?

Mr. RAYMOND. I do not think that should be a question to the citizen; I think the Government should try to put the American shipowner, or any American citizen who wants to become a shipowner, on a parity with the foreign owner; but, as I have stated here, and have given evidence, the sales of foreign ships have been around $20 a ton, and some a little more—$23 a ton for a very fine ship in New York the other day. And you can not assess or undertake to place upon the American purchaser a higher value than he can purchase abroad and have him compete with the foreign-flag vessel. He has his capital charge on the vessel 24 hours out of the day.

Mr. BRIGGS. What I am referring to particularly is this: Suppose you could not get $20 or $25 a ton, do you think they ought to be sold for $5 a ton or $10 a ton or any price they would bring?

Mr. RAYMOND. You would not have to go to that, Mr. Briggs. I think that is too far-fetched.

Mr. BRIGGS. Who do you think would take those vessels over, because it involves a good deal of money? Even if you only had the 3,000,000 gross tons to dispose of, at $50 a ton, it would take a considerable amount of money, would it not, to swing that?

Mr. RAYMOND. I had the privilege of serving on a committee two or three years ago—an advisory committee—with five other experienced men, known over the United States as men of ability, one of whom has passed away, and we recommended at that time the sale of those ships and a price for them. We conferred with every shipowner and others that were interested in the purchase of ships, and even with bankers; and at that time a syndicate could have been formed similar to what was done in Great Britain. When Great Britain turned over to this syndicate, headed by Lord Incheape—I do not know what his first name was—a syndicate could have been formed to have taken the Shipping Board fleet that was desirable out of the Government's hands and then disposed of it over the country. There was business then for them. To-day there is no business. But I would have the courage to believe that if it could be determined what ships would be sold and at a low price, that the aid that is here asked for, plus little additions that we may ask for, that you could have something concrete to go before the banking communities of the Nation, and that this syndicate could be formed again, and they would carry those people that wanted to buy them. I believe that; I do not know that it could be done, but I believe it. I do not think it would be necessary to go down to any $5 or $10 a ton, or even to $15; but if you will put the ships, as I say, at the value of other flag tonnage and give the aids necessary to offset the differences in cost, then you will come nearer to disposing of the fleet than you will in any other way.

Mr. BRIGGS. Is it your belief that this financing would have to be done by a very large syndicate?

Mr. RAYMOND. It might be; but the Government ought to help finance that if it got clear of them under the provisions of this bill.

As also showing that little or no expectation of much or any increase in the price of ships, even if the subsidy bill be passed, Mr. Munson, of the Munson Lines and American Steamship Owners' Committee, testified as follows:

Mr. BANKHEAD. Now, do you think within that period of two years the American investing public will be sufficiently interested in the purchase of our whole fleet to form companies to furnish the capital to buy these vessels the Shipping Board is going to sell?

Mr. MUNSON. My opinion is that a very large majority of the really efficient boats owned by the Shipping Board would be absorbed within two years after the passage of this bill.

Mr. BANKHEAD. At the suggested rate of $30 a ton?

Mr. MUNSON. Yes; at a fair market rate—let me qualify that—which may be determined by the Shipping Board from time to time.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Well, that may be increased—

Mr. MUNSON. It may be increased or decreased.

Mr. BANKHEAD. As you suggest, it may be increased or decreased. Now, how long do you think that this subsidy is going to have to be paid, Mr. Munson?

Mr. MUNSON. My feeling is that American capital, particularly in these southern, southeastern, and western ports, will be far more interested if the subsidy was passed for 20 years than they would be if it were passed for 10 years.

Mr. Eugene O'Donnell, secretary of the Maritime Association, Boston Chamber of Commerce, and private American operator, testified that even if the subsidy bill passed he did not think that the Government fleet, if forced on the market, would bring up the price. His testimony is as follows:

Mr. BRIGGS. There is a tremendous amount of trade depression at present, perhaps the greatest the world has ever known, isn't there?

Mr. O'DONNELL. That is correct, as I understand it.

Mr. BRIGGS. If these ships had to be forced on the market at the present time and sold at the earliest possible time, do you think that even if the bill should pass, as provided here, that that would insure better prices?

Mr. O'DONNELL. For the board?

Mr. BRIGGS. Yes.

Mr. O'DONNELL. No. I don't think that it would. Naturally, any forced sale must mean reduced prices.

As to how soon the Government fleet ought to be sold, Mr. Raymond, president of the American Steamship Owners' Association, testified, on cross-examination, as follows:

Mr. BRIGGS. I want to get your statement with reference to the disposition of this fleet. How soon do you think it ought to be disposed of, Mr. Raymond?

Mr. RAYMOND. At once.

Mr. BRIGGS. Irrespective of what price they could get for it?

Mr. RAYMOND. Yes, sir.

The pending bill also contemplates credit rather than cash sales of the ships, and on 15 years time, with no provision for payment of any part of the principal during such period beyond a depreciation estimate, for which security may be given.

HOW THE FLEET WILL BE DISPOSED OF.

Chairman Lasker at the hearings testified:

(Pages 7 to 8, hearings.)

On the 6,000,000 tons of freighters the Government possesses, it is the hope of the Shipping Board that ultimately a great measure of the 3,000,000 good tons will find itself in the hands of American owners, should the legislation here proposed be adopted. It is doubtful if, under the happiest conditions, the American flag will need the 3,000,000 good tons in its entirety, and ways and means must be found to dispose of such of the good tonnage as remains, so that American interests will not be hurt. Under no circumstances must the surplus good tonnage that America can not absorb be disposed of so as to bankrupt those who buy from the Government at current prices.

Automatically the 3,000,000 poor tons must be done away with. Part of it can be used by selling to Americans the hulls at low figures for conversion to types of freighters of which we are not possessed. The balance may either be sold in small quantities in local trades abroad, if any, where because of shorter runs and cheaper labor local operation may be possible, or it must largely be dismantled. For if we permit a potential surplus to remain, with the possibility of its use in only abnormally prosperous times when any tonnage can be profitably operated, the burden of loss will fall on the good tonnage in times of adversity without full enjoyment of profit in time of prosperity, and thus we depress the price of all of our tonnage, and so it will come to pass that we shall liquidate the whole for less than we could liquidate the good part.

It is the unneeded surplus, in ships as in all else, that determines the market, and the same circumstances that forced some farmers to burn their corn last winter demands that, at least in so far as the uneconomical 3,000,000 tons of freighters go, we recognize that one of our problems is to force its disappearance from the market. If we are to induce private investment in American ships it must be under an assurance as to what will be done with the surplus tonnage, plus an assurance that the Government will retire from operation, for private owners can not live and can not finance themselves with those two swords of Damocles hanging over their heads.

PREPARATION FOR SHIP-PURCHASING SYNDICATE.

Apparently in line with the plan suggested by the president of the American Shipowners' Association at the hearings on the ship subsidy bill, wherein he stated that he thought it might be possible to organize a syndicate for the purchase of the Shipping Board vessels, it is reported that steps to that end are being completed to have such a plan perfected, for a recent issue of the New York Journal of Commerce reports the organization of the Maritime Trust Co. of America for the purpose of financing shipping operations under the American flag. The organizers are H. H. Raymond, president of the American Steamship Association, and a number of other ship operators and builders.

It would therefore seem no fantastic or visionary idea that the large interests have in view the organization of a great shipping syndicate to take over the Government-owned fleet at practically their own price, and then to enjoy the benefit of the vast subsidies and bounties to be provided under the subsidy bill upon a basis of new construction costs.

GOVERNMENT FLEET NOT IN COMPETITION WITH PRIVATE OWNERS.

The impression also seems to have been created, after the most vigorous and skillful efforts through propaganda, that the operation of the Government fleet is resulting in competition with privately owned and operated vessels, which is driving the latter from the seas. This is only another instance of the misleading and unreliable propaganda disseminated apparently with a view to bolstering up support for the colossal subsidy program proposed.

Mr. Marvin, vice president and general manager of the American Steamship Owners' Association, who is heart and soul for the subsidy program in the pending bill, and who wants even more subsidy than the vast sums provided there, states that from 66½ per cent to 75 per cent of the Government-owned fleet is tied up now and only the remainder being operated, while it is estimated by him that only 25 per cent of the privately owned fleet is tied up and that 75 per cent of the same is being operated. His testimony is as follows:

Mr. BRIGGS. Mr. Marvin, what proportion of the American privately owned fleets is being operated? I think the Shipping Board testified that it is operating out of its fleet something over 400 ships, about 421. If my recollection serves me correctly, with something over a thousand tied up.

Mr. MARVIN. As an estimate, and only as an estimate, and that the result of a good deal of conference with owners, I should say that at the present time 25 per cent of our privately owned tonnage is idle.

Mr. BRIGGS. Twenty-five per cent?

Mr. MARVIN. Yes.

Mr. BRIGGS. The proportion of the Shipping Board vessels, of course, is much greater than that?

Mr. MARVIN. Yes.

Mr. BRIGGS. Said to be nearly 75 per cent?

Mr. MARVIN. Yes.

Mr. BRIGGS. If not quite that, between 66½, anyway, and 75 per cent?

Mr. MARVIN. Yes.

Mr. BRIGGS. Now, lots of those vessels of the Shipping Board that are tied up are good vessels, are they not?

Mr. MARVIN. Yes; they are good vessels.

The testimony at the hearings moreover discloses beyond question that so far from driving the American privately owned ships from the ocean, every effort is being made to promote such lines and trade routes and withdraw Shipping Board vessels whenever privately owned lines are willing to take such routes over. In fact, that is chiefly the reason why only about one-fourth of the privately owned fleet is laid up, but nearly three-fourths of the Shipping Board fleet is idle.

That this condition obtains can not be seriously disputed. The following excerpts from the testimony of American private steamship owners and operators are herewith given, which fully sustain the accuracy of the statement that American privately owned steamship companies are being given preference by the Shipping Board and not driven from the seas by Government vessels.

Chairman Lasker also stated, at the hearings on the subsidy bill, that the Shipping Board was giving the privately owned American tonnage preference in operation on any route upon which such privately owned line operated.

The effect of this preference was also manifested in the statement of Chairman Lasker that only about 20 per cent of the privately owned tonnage was laid up as compared with the Shipping Board tonnage. He testified:

Mr. BRIGGS. What proportion of the American-owned tonnage is not laid up as compared with the Shipping Board tonnage?

Mr. LASKER. A very small percentage. About 20 per cent as much of the privately owned tonnage is laid up as compared with the Shipping Board tonnage, and a goodly share of that is coastal tonnage.

Mr. BRIGGS. About how much of that is coastwise?

Mr. LASKER. I don't think we know. We haven't made that survey.

Mr. BRIGGS. Has the Shipping Board in its operation given preference to the privately owned tonnage as far as they could do so in the operation of any line or anything of that kind?

Mr. LASKER. Well, I don't know that I get your question.

Mr. BRIGGS. I mean, for instance, wherever it appeared that private lines could exist and carry on, has the Shipping Board given them any opportunity to do so?

Mr. LASKER. Oh, yes. The law makes that mandatory.

Mr. BRIGGS. That is what I thought.

Mr. LASKER. Absolutely. For instance, here, say that there were three lines going to a certain port and it looked as if two lines could serve it, we have withdrawn one of our lines.

Mr. Lasker further testified:

Mr. WOOD. What trouble do you have, if any, in your competition with the owners of private ships?

Mr. LASKER. Under the merchant marine act of 1920, through which we operate, it is the purpose of the Government not to use its great wealth and great power to the detriment of privately owned ships. In fact, the whole spirit of the act is for the Shipping Board to aid in building up privately owned ships in order that the Government may ultimately dispose of its fleet to private owners.

Mr. DAVIS. You stated yesterday, Mr. Lasker, that some of our prospective customers had been driven off the sea by Shipping Board vessels, I believe. Will you please tell us any private American lines that have been driven out of business by these Shipping Board vessels?

Mr. LASKER. They were driven off of routes, I said. I don't mean off of the seas, but out of a given route. We have constantly cases—I would not say constantly, but we have people who come and say constantly that they are losing money. I don't know that I said they were driven off of the seas, but I will say they are losing money.

Mr. DAVIS. You used the words "driven off the seas," on page 5 of your testimony.

Mr. LASKER. I will give you the names of the routes. I haven't got it in mind, but I will put that into the record.

Mr. DAVIS. As I understand it, you do not wish to be understood as saying that they were absolutely driven off the sea?

Mr. LASKER. I said driven off in the past, not now, because we have cut down the number of ships. We don't do it any more.

Mr. DAVIS. Now, since the Shipping Board has been in operation I want to know any American line that you have driven off of the seas, if any.

Mr. LASKER. I will furnish that information to you to-morrow. I will get the details on that.

Mr. DAVIS. I understand your two experts to say that there are none.

Mr. LOVE. I do not know of a single one. Possibly you have in mind the Luckenbach Steamship Co.

Mr. DAVIS. No; I was simply asking Mr. Lasker about a statement of his yesterday.

Mr. LOVE. I do not know of a single one.

On July 27, 1921, before the Appropriations Committee, Chairman Lasker also testified:

In many cases we took our Government-owned boats off and gave preference to privately owned boats. (Page 8, urgent deficiency bill.)

As illustrative of the fact that even the American Steamship Owners' Association does not claim that the Government has been unfair in the operation of its ships or driven them out of business through its competition I quote further from the testimony at the hearings, as follows (p. 969, pt. 18, hearings):

Mr. RAYMOND. I think one of the greatest opportunities for trade revival in the United States is to get rid of this menace of Government-owned ships in competition with privately owned property. There is no reason for us to keep going on here indefinitely, speaking for our own companies and not for the association, with a losing proposition. On the contrary, we are ship people. I have been engaged in it my entire business life, and my family before me, and so are the people I am associated with; and it is reasonable to suppose, as that is our business, we would go anywhere we could, with a reasonable opportunity of making some profit or a reasonable chance of making a profit.

Mr. BRIGGS. You are referring to Government competition. Have you any special line or lines in view? I think under the Jones Act of 1920 it was provided the Government should not engage in competition with private lines, but, rather, should stimulate them and encourage them as far as it was possible to do so, with a view and purpose of getting them to take over the Government-owned lines and operate them.

Mr. RAYMOND. The steamship owners are rather fortunate in having a sane board and sane people to handle the property that is in their hands. If they did not, why, they would have us all out of business. They have been perfectly fair in their competition; I am not complaining about that; but there is that menace. You can encourage and can not persuade a banker, any new man going into the business, to loan his money on ship property, nor could you get a shipbuilder to entertain a proposition to build you property if you did not have the cash to pay for it, so long as these ships are floating around here in the air.

CONDITION OF GOVERNMENT TONNAGE.

Even with the 10,000,000 dead-weight steel tonnage which is owned by the Government, the Shipping Board was not able to state the condition of at least a half of it, except in the most general and injurious way—that is, from "fair to useless."

The 5,000,000 tons from fair to useless it is contemplated apparently by the board to either sink or junk or sell to foreign countries for anything that can be obtained, even though Mr. Raymond, Mr. Marvin, and Mr. Farrell testified that all the steel tonnage was good tonnage, but some of it more efficient than another part.

Mr. DAVIS. Now, Mr. Lasker, in reaching your estimate of the percentage of our ships that are first class you do it largely along the lines of tonnage, do you not?

Mr. LASKER. No; we took a survey of each ship. We do it by ships. Each ship was surveyed.

But neither Mr. Lasker nor anyone else who testified was able to tell what part of the 5,000,000 dead-weight tons of the fleet classed as from "fair to useless" tonnage was to be called as "fair" and what as "useless."

Both Mr. Raymond, president of the American Steamship Owners' Association, and Mr. Marvin, vice president and general manager of the American Steamship Owners' Association, testified that they thought that practically all the steel tonnage owned by the Government is good tonnage, but only about 50 per cent of it suitable for American trade.

Mr. BRIGGS. What do you think about the other steel ships? Are you familiar with the types of the steel ships and their characters?

Mr. RAYMOND. Most of them.

Mr. BRIGGS. What would you say as to how many of the 6,000,000 gross tons of steel vessels you would regard as good tonnage and how much is worthless?

Mr. RAYMOND. I should not say any of the steel vessels are worthless, because they are all good. They must have some market somewhere, but we are very much overtonnaged here with certain sizes of ships. I would say, without any absolute knowledge, as an estimate only, that only 50 per cent of the steel vessels are fit to be retained under the American flag.

Mr. BRIGGS. The rest ought to be disposed of somewhere else?

Mr. RAYMOND. Somewhere or other.

Mr. Marvin, vice president and general manager of the American Steamship Owners' Association, testified:

Mr. BRIGGS. The Government owns in steel tonnage approximately 6,000,000 gross tons, doesn't it?

Mr. MARVIN. It does.

Mr. BRIGGS. Are you familiar with the character of that tonnage? By that I mean, in the classification you alluded to a moment ago as good tonnage, what proportion of that fleet would you say was "good tonnage"?

Mr. MARVIN. All of that steel tonnage is good tonnage—some of it better than the rest, but good tonnage.

Mr. Munson, president of the Munson Steamship Lines, however, testified that in his opinion one-half of the steel tonnage, or about 3,000,000 gross tons, was inefficient and ought to be sold at about $5 a ton. (Page 1166, part 20, hearings.)

Mr. BRIGGS. Now, for instance, I think you testified that some of these ships you regarded as in the inefficient class. That is rather an indefinite term, of course, but we will get back to that in a little while; but you testified they should be sold at about $5 a ton.

Mr. MUNSON. That is right.

Mr. BRIGGS. I understand that there are about 3,000,000 gross tons of ships which are classed, I assume by the board, Mr. Lasker, their spokesman, as from fair to useless for some purposes. Do you regard those as inefficient types?

Mr. MUNSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. BRIGGS. You do not think they ought to be expected to bring over $5?

Mr. MUNSON. I said that in connection with conversion purposes.

Mr. BRIGGS. For whatever purpose. Suppose they want to utilize them in their trade and they are not efficient, those vessels would fall within that class of inefficient?

Mr. MUNSON. Yes, sir.

NO REDUCTION IN OCEAN RATES CONTEMPLATED AND NO REGULATION OF THEM.

Commissioner Plummer is recently reported to have made the assertion that the pending ship subsidy bill was designed to or would have the effect of reducing ocean rates.

There is nothing in the bill providing for such reduction of rates, unless it is claimed that the tax rebate on freight moneys paid is equivalent to such reduction.

The bill, however, does not provide for control of ocean rates in foreign commerce, and Chairman Lasker expressly states that it was not the purpose of the bill to control them in any way, and intimated that he did not approve any such control by governmental agencies.

The following testimony was adduced at the hearings (page 209, part 2, hearings):

Mr. BRIGGS. How would you prevent—or how do you propose to prevent—the pooling such as obtains now by agreement, in these conference agreements, after the disposition of the fleet; that is, the international pooling agreements whereby the rates are fixed?

Mr. LASKER. The present law that we propose does not go into that feature any more than we go into such changes, if any, as should be made in the navigation act. That is not the purpose of this law—of this present proposed law.

Mr. Lasker frankly admitted that the present system of conference agreements as to rates—that is, agreements between American and foreign lines, as to what passenger and cargo rates should be—was heartily indorsed by him and indicated that no departure was contemplated from the practice of fixing foreign or American rates through such conferences.

Mr. LASKER. The Shipping Board believes in conferences. You can not have a merchant marine without it because the fighting would be so great they would all lose money.

Mr. LASKER. I do not think any private operator will try to get better rates than the Shipping Board tries to get. We try to get everything the traffic will bear and permit American manufacturers to compete with the world.

Mr. BRIGGS. It is the purpose of the Shipping Board, as I understand it, to make reasonable transportation rates and insist upon those in these conference agreements with foreign companies, is it not?

Mr. LASKER. It is not the purpose of the Shipping Board to subsidize American manufacturers by getting the rates so low as to equalize them.

Mr. BRIGGS. I do not imagine the Shipping Board would, on the contrary, want to get them so high that it would put an unnecessary burden or tax on the production of industrial organizations.

Mr. LASKER. You understand if the rates are too high, the shipping companies won't carry the cargoes. It is an automatic thing. I do not think, by and large, the conference rates would be higher, with the Shipping Board out of operation, than with the Shipping Board in; at least my instructions to our men are that the main purpose of the Shipping Board should be to keep routes going, as per the mandate of the Jones Act; but it is not the purpose of the law anywhere that the Shipping Board be used as an instrument for cutting rates to American shippers.

Mr. Love, vice president and general manager of the United States Shipping Board Emergency Fleet Corporation, also testified as follows:

Mr. BRIGGS. Now, I want to ask you about conference rates with reference to other parts of the country. Don't the Shipping Board have a conference rate established with reference both to passenger and freight service from the Atlantic to the Gulf?

Mr. LOVE. We are members of many conferences.

Mr. BRIGGS. Well, don't they establish conference rates?

Mr. LOVE. Yes.

Mr. BRIGGS. Don't they have passenger as well as cargo?

Mr. LOVE. In a number of the trades we do.

Mr. BRIGGS. Is that in most of the trades?

Mr. LOVE. The bulk of them.

Mr. BRIGGS. Do you adhere to those conference rates?

Mr. LOVE. Our people do.

Mr. BRIGGS. Well, so far as you are able to ascertain, are the others doing it or not?

Mr. LOVE. We believe they are.

Mr. BRIGGS. You would be pretty quick to determine it if they weren't?

Mr. LOVE. We would.

Mr. BRIGGS. You would be able to tell by the cargo whether there was a leak in the cask or not?

Mr. LOVE. We could.

Mr. BRIGGS. I thought so. And those rates are fixed at levels according to the grade or character of the service and the grade or character of the ship, are they not?

Mr. LOVE. Not so much with reference to the trade of the service, but the trade and the commodity itself.

Mr. BRIGGS. I mean, that is true with reference to the passenger ships?

Mr. LOVE. Oh, yes; all passenger ships are graded.

Mr. BRIGGS. It isn't so much with reference to the cargo service?

Mr. LOVE. Oh, no.

Mr. BRIGGS. It is the trade and the cargo you spoke of?

Mr. LOVE. Oh, yes.

Mr. BRIGGS. Have you ever given any consideration to—after the disposition of this fleet into private ownership—the question of conference agreements, to the effect that they would have on the rates that might have been put in, as you stated recently?

Mr. LOVE. Mr. BRIGGS, I represented the Atlantic Transport Co., and after that the International Mercantile Marine Co. for possibly 20 years in the United Kingdom conferences. They were private owners, and conferences, as a rule, tend to the prevention of extremely low rates and likewise to the prevention of extremely high rates. They stabilize the market. They enable a man who is selling a typewriter, a bicycle, an automobile, corsets, and a hundred other articles to send out a price list in England at the beginning of the year and sell at that price throughout the 12 months. He can carry on his selling campaign almost a year ahead and know exactly what it is going to cost him 12 months in advance to lay down any given commodity in his warehouse in the United Kingdom.

Mr. BRIGGS. It is true, isn't it, that the influence of the Shipping Board has been, even with respect to the conference, to aid in keeping rates down to a more nearly reasonable basis, even during the period when much higher rates might have been exacted?

Mr. LOVE. It has had a leveling influence.

Mr. BRIGGS. It has had a helpful influence, I understand?

Mr. LOVE. In many cases.

Mr. BRIGGS. I want to ask you, therefore, if this fleet should go into the hands of a few individuals or a large organization of capital, whether or not it would not vest in them the power to dictate what the rates should absolutely be in connection with conferences with foreign interests? Couldn't that be done?

Mr. LOVE. It might come within their power; but they wouldn't make use of it.

Mr. BRIGGS. You don't think there would be any misuse of it?

Mr. Raymond, President of the American Steamship Owners' Association, testified as follows (p. 961, pt. 18, hearings):

Mr. BRIGGS. Well, the conference rates are made by agreement between foreign lines and American lines, are they not?

Mr. RAYMOND. That is right.

Mr. BRIGGS. So there really is not very much competition in the conference rate; it is rather an agreed rate or price.

Mr. RAYMOND. It is my understanding at some of those conference meetings you would think there was competition if you were in them. I do not want to go.

Mr. BRIGGS. But when they get through with the interesting time you are talking about, the debate and discussion you are talking about, they work out some conference rates?

Mr. RAYMOND. Oh, there is not any reason—none of them give up their right to name any rate that they want. There are some of them that do, and withdraw.

Mr. BRIGGS. As long as they are members of the conference, though, they are expected to observe the conference rates, are they not?

Mr. RAYMOND. That is right.

Mr. BRIGGS. That is the usual practice, I think Mr. Love stated. Mr. RAYMOND. It has been for many years, and it can not be otherwise, in my judgment.

Mr. Marvin, vice president and general manager of the American Steamship Owners' Association, testified as follows:

Mr. BRIGGS. I want to ask you this on the question of operation: The conference rates obtain generally, do they not, now throughout the world—the shipping world?

Mr. MARVIN. Generally speaking, in the important trades they do prevail most of the time.

Mr. BRIGGS. Fixing passenger and freight rates?

Mr. MARVIN. Yes, sir.

Mr. BRIGGS. Do you think there is any danger, without any regulation of control being vested in a Government agency over those rates, of huge combinations increasing those rates up to as much as the traffic would bear and enhancing the cost of operation to the people?

Mr. MARVIN. I believe that under the publicity commanded by American law there is no danger of unfairness in the long run in the operation of the conference system.

Mr. BRIGGS. Do you think that confidence has been justified in many other channels and avenues of trade these days?

Mr. MARVIN. Where publicity obtains; yes.

Mr. BRIGGS. Aren't the disclosures these days that are being given to the public of tremendous abuses that have been practiced such that indicate that if the profits were high enough they might risk a whole lot of publicity, if it was long enough in coming?

Mr. MARVIN. I am a great believer myself in the virtue of publicity.

Mr. BRIGGS. You think that would be an effective check, without any provision for regulation?

Mr. MARVIN. I do believe it would, and, in the nature of the business itself, a shipping company like any other concern that raises its prices too high loses its trade.

SHIPPING BOARD CAN NOT CONTROL RATES.

The Shipping Board, through its general counsel, admitted at the hearings that the Shipping Board has no power to either fix or pass upon the reasonableness of ocean rates in foreign commerce. Mr. Beecher, general admiralty counsel for the Shipping Board, testified as follows:

Mr. BRIGGS. And there is no power given to the Shipping Board to fix rates?

Mr. MANGHUM. There is as to coastwise.

Mr. BRIGGS. I am speaking about foreign commerce.

Mr. MANGHUM. No; it is only to remove discrimination.

Mr. BRIGGS. I am asking Mr. Beecher as to that. He has made a special study of that, as counsel for the Shipping Board.

Mr. BEECHER. There is no power given to fix reasonable rates.

Mr. BRIGGS. Or to pass upon the reasonableness of the rates that are fixed?

Mr. BEECHER. No.

Mr. BRIGGS. I understood so.

Mr. Beecher, counsel for the Shipping Board, testified that under existing law there is no provision for the regulation of ocean rates in the foreign trade by a Government agency:

Mr. EDMONDS. Now, let me ask you this: If the shipper gets the benefit on his income tax or return if he ships in American ships, he is going to pay a little more for that to ship in American ships, but the result will be your ships will be more profitable.

Mr. LASKER. Certainly. And if he gets a 5 per cent reduction, he can afford to pay 4 per cent more; but, of course, he won't have to.

Mr. BEECHER. The Shipping Board is not given any power to fix rates with respect to vessels of any type or character engaged in foreign commerce; the power with respect to rates relates to maximum rates only in connection with coastwise commerce of the United States, therefore the inquiry that you were directing with reference to tramps and the subsidy of tramps in the foreign trade, I think perhaps is based upon that misapprehension of the existing state of the law.

Senator FLETCHER. Well, here is section 17, perhaps we had better set it out in the hearings:

"That no common carrier by water in foreign commerce shall demand, charge, or collect any rate, fare, or charge which is unjustly prejudicial to exporters of the United States as compared with their foreign competitors."

Mr. BEECHER. That is only control.

Senator FLETCHER. Then it goes on:

"Whenever the board finds that any such rate, fare, or charge is demanded, charged, or collected it may alter the same to the extent necessary to correct such unjust discrimination or prejudice and make an order that the carrier shall discontinue demanding, charging, or collecting any such unjustly discriminatory or prejudicial rate, fare, or charge."

That seems to me to give pretty broad powers, and it refers to carrier by water in foreign commerce.

Mr. BEECHER. Yes, Senator; but they can not pass upon the reasonableness of rates or fix what the rate shall be, whether it be high or low; the only control is with relation to discriminations in the respects which you have read from the law.

SUBSIDY BENEFITS.

Although two-thirds of the commerce of the world is carried in cargo carriers, and the Government owns these vessels in greatest number, this type of ships receives less subsidy under the bill than vessels of any other type. Ocean greyhounds will obtain the greatest bounties and oil tankers will draw down nearly $5,000,000 annually, and almost $10,000,000 if they obtain the benefit of the double subsidy provision of the law.

The subsidies provided in the pending bill aggregate annually from ten to twenty times more than ever before proposed, so far as is known, in any subsidy bill ever considered by Congress.

It provides greater subsidies than the total amount last reported by the Department of Commerce as including all mail subventions, admiralty payments, and subsidies paid by all other nations combined.

SLOW CARGO SHIPS CARRY TWO-THIRDS OF WORLD TRADE.

Most of the world trade now is carried in slow-speed cargo ships, about 8 to 11 knots; and although there is a tendency toward liner service, with some increase in speed, such tendency in cargo carriers is not marked.

Mr. BRIGGS. The greatest amount of trade is really carried in cargo ships?

Mr. MARVIN. It is in this class of ships all over the world.

Mr. BRIGGS. The slow-speed ships?

Mr. MARVIN. Relatively slow-speed ships, of 8 or 11 knots.

Mr. BRIGGS. About two-thirds of the world's commerce, I think, according to the study submitted here, is carried in those ships?

Mr. MARVIN. The bulk of the world's commerce is carried in ships of this description, and it is ships of this description that make up most of the Government's tonnage, the purchase of which by private capital we are considering.

Mr. BRIGGS. Do you expect that to continue, that in the trade the bulk of the commerce will continue to be carried by the cargo ships, such as this?

Mr. MARVIN. For many years to come. There is a tendency in the world's trade at large for liners of somewhat higher speed, generally speaking, as the years go on to take a greater and greater volume of the commerce of the world. That is, more and more of the commerce of the world is moved, generally speaking, year after year, by ships maintained on regular schedules and of a speed that tends slightly to increase.

Mr. BRIGGS. Has that been very material and appreciable in the last few years?

Mr. MARVIN. The progress, I think, was interrupted by the war greatly, and the change from year to year is hardly perceptible.

Mr. BRIGGS. Hardly perceptible?

Mr. MARVIN. I have noticed it over 30 or 40 years' observation of the commerce of the world, but from year to year there is slight change.

Mr. BRIGGS. So that it is making slight progress?

Mr. MARVIN. Yes.

Mr. BRIGGS. And it is your opinion that for a long time to come the great majority of the cargo will be carried in ships of this description?

Mr. MARVIN. In ships of this description.

Mr. BRIGGS. They can utilize ships of this description in liner service as well as tramp service?

Mr. MARVIN. Many ships of this speed are employed in berth service, regular line service, regular cargo service in almost all ports in almost all nations.

Mr. BRIGGS. In other words, you can not carry certain cargoes on certain voyages or certain routes and earn anything unless you do employ that type of steamer?

Mr. MARVIN. It is absolutely necessary, with the economy made possible by these steamers.

Mr. BRIGGS. When you begin to increase the speed of the vessels, you begin to increase materially the operating costs?

Mr. MARVIN. Every increase of a knot increases cost heavily, particularly when you raise to 15 knots and upward. As I say, while there is a tendency toward the use of liners of 12 or 13 knots speed, or 14 knots in some instances, the change is very slow from year to year.

Mr. BRIGGS. And these ships are to be for a long time to come the great carriers of the ocean trade?

Mr. MARVIN. For a long time.

The cargo ships of the Government fleet are all vessels with a speed of from 8½ to 10 knots an hour, with the exception of 15 which have a speed of 12 knots or over. This does not include passenger or combination vessels. (See testimony of Mr. Merrill, p. 500, hearings.)

It is therefore apparent that the 10,000,000 dead-weight tons, or 6,000,000 gross tons, of Shipping Board cargo carriers are precisely the type and speed of cargo carriers employed in transporting about two-thirds of the world's tonnage. (See testimony of Mr. Merrill, pp. 434 and 496 of hearings.)

In testifying to the "economical" speed of cargo steamers, Mr. Rosbottom testified that it was from 8½ to 10 knots an hour, his testimony being as follows:

(Pages 369 and 370, part 6, hearings.)

Mr. BRIGGS. And have you had any experience—well, I will pass that just for the moment. In your operation of cargo steamers, what is the general speed at which they are operated?

Mr. ROSSBOTTOM. Well, the cargo steamers that I operated ran from 8½ to 10 knots.

Mr. BRIGGS. Why were they operated at such a speed as that? Was that the daily speed of the cargo steamers?

Mr. ROSSBOTTOM. That was the economical speed for the steamers we were operating.

Mr. BRIGGS. Why do you call it the "economical" speed? What is the reason for that? Why do you fix it at as low a rate as that?

Mr. ROSSBOTTOM. The maximum speed that cargo steamers are capable of is about 12 knots, but to do that you have to drive her.

Mr. BRIGGS. What do you mean by "driving"?

Mr. ROSSBOTTOM. You have to work your firemen very much harder than you do when you are operating about 9½ or 10 knots an hour. Your coal consumption is greater; and you don't need to operate her at 12 knots' speed if you can reach the ports at which you are to call operating at a 10-knot speed. Your operating expense is very much less when you can operate a steamer at her economical speed than it is if you try to force her.

NO REAL DIFFERENTIAL AGAINST AMERICAN SHIPS.

It was further demonstrated at the hearings that the extremely low price at which Government-owned tonnage can be secured will effectually prevent an American buyer and owner of such tonnage from any handicap through capital cost of his ships.

SEAMEN'S ACT.

Relative to the La Follette or so-called seamen's act, Chairman Lasker testified (p. 43):

Mr. BANKHEAD. I understand from the President's address to Congress, and also from the statement that you have made, that you do not undertake to recommend or urge any material change in the seamen's act that now exists?

Mr. LASKER. You are right. I want to take occasion to say here that I think the seamen's act has been one of the most misrepresented acts of which I have ever heard. I came down to Washington believing, as most people in my part of the country do, if you repeal the seamen's act you would have a merchant marine. That is pure bunk.

Mr. BANKHEAD. That is the reason I asked the question, because for a long time those who were undertaking to give reasons why we could not operate successfully with our foreign competitors based their assertions exclusively on the discrimination caused by the seamen's act.

Mr. LASKER. I think they have gotten worn out on those representations.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I am glad to hear that.

SUBSISTENCE AND WAGES.

The evidence at the hearings established that there was no real differential or handicap against American ships in the matter of wages and subsistence except as relates to licensed officers. This differential would probably not be as much as 1 per cent of the total operating cost and was more than compensated for by the advantages which the American ship enjoys over those of foreign nations through the use of oil rather than coal as a fuel.

Mr. FURUSETH. Manned as they are at present, the amount of money paid to the seamen, exclusive of officers, will be less on board of the American vessel of the same tonnage than on the British vessel of the same tonnage. The British vessel will, so far as the crew is concerned, exclusive of the licensed officers, have to pay more than the American vessel, manned as she is now. (Hearings, page 1362.)

Mr. BANKHEAD. So that, Mr. Furuseth, it is your conclusion that, properly administered, there is no substantial difference, but, in fact, a substantial equality between the subsistence upon British and American vessels—the cost of subsistence?

Mr. FURUSETH. There is no difference there except in the quantities. Sometimes one item is a little more in the American, and sometimes one item is a little more in the English, and so on; but there is no substantial difference; and as to a difference in cost I characterized it in my statement as being microscopic. (Hearings, page 1363.)

AMERICAN ADVANTAGE WITH OIL OVER COAL BURNERS.

According to the testimony, about 75 per cent of the American fleet is oil burning, as against about 15 per cent of the British fleet, as indicated by the following examination:

Mr. BRIGGS. For instance, I recollect very well that previously one of the previous directors of operations of your board, I think Mr. Rosseter, seemed to attach a great deal of importance to the fact that we had fuel oil in this country in such large quantities—that is, it was possible to be obtained at least on this side of the water, more than all other nations—that it would be a great advantage to us to practically convert all of our ships or most of our ships into oil-burning ships; and, in that connection, I wanted to know to what extent, if at all, the oil burners we were operating exceeded those or were less than other ships that had been converted into oil burners. In other words, whether we have more oil-burning ships in operation to-day than other nations or have less.

Mr. LASKER. We have many more.

Mr. BRIGGS. About how many more?

Mr. MERRILL. About 75 per cent of our American fleet is oil burning.

Mr. BRIGGS. What percentage of the British fleet?

Mr. MERRILL. It is quite perceptibly under that.

Mr. BRIGGS. Isn't the British fleet as much as 50 per cent?

Mr. MERRILL. I should doubt it.

Mr. BRIGGS. They use mostly coal in that fleet, do they not?

Mr. LASKER. Surely; because they produce coal.

Mr. BRIGGS. Possibly it will not exceed 25 per cent?

Mr. MERRILL. I do not know; we have no figures on that.

Mr. FURUSETH. I think it is about 15 per cent.

Mr. BRIGGS. Not more than 12 to 15 per cent?

Mr. FURUSETH. Not more than 15 per cent, at any rate.

The higher efficiency of oil burners over coal burners was testified to by Mr. Thomas H. Rosseter:

Mr. BRIGGS. What has been your experience in the operation of oil and coal on the ships you have operated? You have operated both types, have you not, in cargo steamers?

Mr. ROSSETER. Yes, sir.

Mr. BRIGGS. Has there been any resultant saving by operating with oil over coal?

Mr. ROSSETER. The principal saving that I have noticed is the less number of crew, the best type of crew that you can secure in the fire-room, and the less deterioration that takes place in the boilers.

Mr. BRIGGS. Well, what do you estimate that advantage is?

Mr. ROSSETER. That depends a great deal on the cost of coal and the cost of oil. If the cost of oil per ton is approximately the cost of coal per ton, I should estimate that there would be a saving by using oil as against coal of easily 15 per cent.

Mr. J. H. Rosseter testified as follows:

(Pages 640-642, part 12, hearings.)

Mr. BRIGGS. Now, the other day when I asked you something about the testimony of Mr. Rosseter on the oil question, you stated that it was not clear to you just what Mr. Rosseter meant by some of his expressions in there.

Mr. MERRILL. Yes, sir.

Mr. BRIGGS. He gave other testimony which I have copied here, an extract from hearings on foreign trade zones on H. R. 9778, before the Ways and Means Committee in October, 1919. He makes this statement, in part—it is not necessary to read it all. Referring to the British advantages and disadvantages, he says:

"Now, one of the disadvantages they suffer, and one of the great advantages we have, is the fact that their merchant marine was constructed to use coal as the agency of propulsion, whereas our fleet is largely composed of so-called oil burners. All British bunker stations in the trades of the world are designed to handle coal. Practically the entire British merchant marine, both as to regular and irregular lines, rests entirely on coal.

"The value of oil propulsion we have discovered to be of dominating advantage as compared to coal. In my experience this was made plain as far back as 1900. Generally speaking, the operation of sister ships, one with oil and the other with coal, will show an advantage in the case of the oil burner amounting in dollars and cents to more than the total pay roll for officers and men, not the difference between American and foreign scale, but offsetting the entire pay roll of the ship.

"Mr. YOUNG. When did you say you reached that conclusion?

"Mr. ROSSETER. Beginning with experiments as far back as 1900, in my own operation. Our first experiments were not so successful. We were the pioneers; but beginning from that time and going up to the beginning of the war our yearly operating returns showed the benefits or advantages I have stated, and more.

"Mr. TREADWAY. About what would that represent in percentage of expense?

"Mr. ROSSETER. It is very difficult to give you an intelligent answer on a point like that, and I will have to explain why.

"Mr. TREADWAY. You said it represented the pay roll of your vessel?

"Mr. ROSSETER. Yes, sir.

"Mr. TREADWAY. That is not very clear to me, at least, what that might be actually.

"Mr. ROSSETER. In those days the pay rolls of large steamships ran about $2,750 to $3,200 a month.

"Mr. TREADWAY. $3,200 a month?

"Mr. ROSSETER. Yes.

"Mr. TREADWAY. So that would be in the neighborhood of $37,000 or $38,000 a year?

"Mr. ROSSETER. Yes, sir; and that was the saving between oil and coal. The contract was based on comparatively cheap oil, as also cheap coal. Coal prices, as you may know, in Great Britain and in all places except the United States Atlantic ports, have quadrupled during the past three years. Coal at ports in Great Britain now cost 80s., and it is expected to go to 100s., or in our currency from, say, $20 to $25, whereas pre-war cost was about $7 and $7.50. High cost of coal at home ports means proportionately higher costs at foreign stations along British trade routes. The colliers must charge higher freight to offset this increased cost of bunkers, as also for the delay in loading and heavier expense of handling the coal. These conditions go to make bunker costs a very serious charge for the pre-war type of British ship to face. As newcomers, we have the disadvantage of paying more for our ships, but we have the advantage, which has not been overlooked, of making them adaptable for oil propulsion, and having established throughout the world oil-bunkering stations, which makes us independent of a situation such as we have faced under the British licensing preferential system.

"Mr. TILSON. Would it not be possible for England to build her new ships the same way, so that her new ships could burn oil?

"Mr. ROSSETER. Yes, sir; and she is doing that.

"Mr. TILSON. But these new ones cost her as much to produce as they cost us?

"Mr. ROSSETER. Right. And she has no arrangement for oil-bunkering stations along her trade routes, and she has yet to begin where we began a year ago.

"Mr. TILSON. Therefore, so far as her new ships are concerned, we shall be practically on a parity, in your judgment, in the capital cost of a ship and in the cost of operating. Now, what about the difference in wages of the men who man these oil-burning ships run by England and those run by this country?

"Mr. ROSSETER. On the oil burner we do away immediately with what is known as the black squad. We have in the engine room what might correctly be designated as junior engineers. They are called water tenders and oilers, etc., but they are a class of men who are in course of apprenticeship for engineers, and the black squad is gone. There is no more shoveling of coal. In the burning of oil, it is like the turning of the wick in a lamp, and the black squad is dispensed with, and thus the engine-room force on cargo ships is reduced by from 8 to 14 men, while on passenger liners the crew is reduced from 50 to 250 men, according to size of the ships."

The testimony at the hearings conclusively demonstrated that a great advantage is enjoyed by oil-burning ships over ships which burn coal.

Mr. Munson, of the Munson Lines, and representing the committee of the American Steamship Owners' Association, testified as follows:

(Pages 1159-1161, part 2, hearings.)

Mr. BRIGGS. Now, in the operation of these bareboat vessels I want to ask you which are the ones you make a profit on?

Mr. MUNSON. The larger type.

Mr. BRIGGS. Ranging from where?

Mr. MUNSON. Well, as I have said, bareboat charters run from 5,000 to 6,000 tons. Those are the only ones.

Mr. BRIGGS. In what service?

Mr. MUNSON. Running between the United States, Cuba, and Mexico ports.

Mr. BRIGGS. In fact, that trade in the Caribbean is rather a valuable trade generally, is it not?

Mr. MUNSON. It has been for years.

Mr. BRIGGS. And in normal times one of the very best fields for trade, is it not?

Mr. MUNSON. I would not say so, no; I think that in normal times there are a number of other trades very much better.

Mr. BRIGGS. But it is a good trade?

Mr. MUNSON. It has been for a long time a very fair trade. There is a great deal of competition in it to-day of foreign-flag ships, foreign owners, trying to get into it very actively.

Mr. BRIGGS. In the ships that you are operating, what percentage of them are oil burners and what percentage are coal burners?

Mr. MUNSON. Of our own fleet 15 out of 20 ships are oil burners.

Mr. BRIGGS. Why do you have so many oil burners?

Mr. MUNSON. Because when we started in constructing the more modern ships in 1915, seven years ago, my judgment was that that was a great economy, and that it was a great thing for the consideration of American labor. The first ship that we turned out as an oil burner I went into the engine room on her trials myself and saw the difference in working conditions and made up my mind that it was going to be one of the greatest factors to get and keep good men in the crew.

Mr. BRIGGS. What difference was that that you observed?
Mr. MUNSON. Well, the engine room, the fire room, was painted white and the men were in white suits in that ship, and they continued to be in white suits and not dirty suits throughout the voyage, and the working conditions were that the men were strolling around changing these oil burners every 20 minutes or half an hour, and they did not have that great physical strain of being before an open fire and drawing the fire and putting in new fuel, which is the case with the coal burner.

So that change was adopted as the standard for all the ships we built from that time on.

Mr. BRIGGS. You operate considerably fewer men in the fire room, too, do you not?

Mr. MUNSON. About one-third less.
Mr. BRIGGS. What number is that? What is that in numbers?
Mr. MUNSON. Well, you take a freighter, it means six men.
Mr. BRIGGS. What does it mean—it means a very much higher number on passenger ships?

Mr. MUNSON. Very much greater.
Mr. BRIGGS. I think Mr. Rosseter testified that on some of them it went up as high as 250.

Mr. MUNSON. The large trans-Atlantic types, 200 to 250 men.
Mr. BRIGGS. Do you get very much more power out of a ton of oil than you do out of a ton of coal?

Mr. MUNSON. The efficiency is very much greater.
Mr. BRIGGS. What percentage do you estimate that at?

Mr. MUNSON. We figure that the speed on an oil-driven vessel is about 5 to 8 per cent better than it is on a coal-fired vessel. We converted two ships that we built under the American flag, coal burners, to oil burners, so we have an actual comparison.

Mr. BRIGGS. You have an actual comparison of the efficiency?
Mr. MUNSON. It was 5 to 8 per cent increase.

Mr. BRIGGS. Do you have as much repairs on your boilers with the oil burner as you do with the coal?

Mr. MUNSON. No; we don't have as much repairs with oil.
Mr. BRIGGS. That is a valuable saving, is it not, on the repair item?

Mr. MUNSON. Yes, sir.
Mr. BRIGGS. It amounts to a substantial sum?

Mr. MUNSON. The reason for that is, and one of the reasons for our adopting oil burning as a standard for our fleet, was that when you get a steady pressure under the boilers instead of a varying pressure dropping 20 or 30 pounds, as you do when you draw fires, you save the life of the boilers—increased the life of the boilers.

Mr. BRIGGS. How much?

Mr. MUNSON. Well, we haven't had them long enough to say yet, but we figure it will mean probably 10 or 15 per cent longer life.

Mr. BRIGGS. How do you find the fuel costs, relative costs of the two, coal and oil?

Mr. MUNSON. It varies very much. There are times when it would have paid to have gone back to coal, with the high price of oil. To-day it is about an even proposition. If the price of oil goes higher, the use of coal will be cheaper. It is running about level now. Whether you buy from the Atlantic ports or whether you buy from the Gulf, the variation is about the same. Of course, it is less in the Gulf than it is in the Atlantic.

Mr. BRIGGS. That is figured on the basis of oil delivered on board ship as well as coal delivered on board ship?

Mr. MUNSON. Yes, sir.
Mr. BRIGGS. That includes all those costs?

Mr. MUNSON. Yes, sir.
Mr. BRIGGS. Now, with reference to the uses of your cargo space, you save considerable cargo space by the use of oil rather than coal?

Mr. MUNSON. On long voyages, yes. Boats that are going on a long voyage have to take cargo space for bunkers when they use coal, and on the oil basis it is not so. We can, however, in the matter of dead weight very largely—and there you can figure on the dead-weight basis—that you actually get an increase of one-third of the bunker capacity of the boat more on the oil burner than you do on the coal burner, just because two-thirds as many tons of oil are consumed as coal.

Mr. BRIGGS. Now, what percentage of the dead-weight capacity of your ship is utilized usually in the carriage of trade, the cargoes they carry?

Mr. MUNSON. It depends altogether on the trade.
Mr. BRIGGS. What do they range from? Just give some ranges.

Mr. MUNSON. In the Caribbean Sea trade when a boat is loaded with cargo we—

Mr. BRIGGS. (Interposing.) I am not speaking about dead-weight cargoes; I am speaking about the average cargoes.

Mr. MUNSON. The same thing. The answer will be the same. We run about 90 per cent cargo and 10 per cent for fuel storage.

Mr. BRIGGS. Is that the oil?
Mr. MUNSON. That is with oil.

Mr. BRIGGS. How would they run with reference to coal?
Mr. MUNSON. About one-third more; about 13 per cent for fuel, storage, etc.

Mr. BRIGGS. About 13 per cent more?

Mr. MUNSON. About 13 per cent total. About 87 per cent cargo.

Mr. BRIGGS. What are the other services that you run? What is the relation trans-Atlantic?

Mr. MUNSON. Well, take the South American trade, the percentage is on the cargo on the boat, about 75 per cent cargo and 25 per cent for fuel and storage.

Mr. BRIGGS. That is oil?
Mr. MUNSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. BRIGGS. How about coal.
Mr. MUNSON. With coal it will run about 32 or 33 per cent of the fuel in storage.

Mr. BRIGGS. Now, in your trans-Atlantic service, do you use any oil and coal on those boats?

Mr. MUNSON. Yes; the trans-Atlantic trade on oil runs about 20 per cent and on coal about 26 per cent.

Mr. BRIGGS. Do you carry in these services enough oil for a round trip?

Mr. MUNSON. Yes, sir.
Mr. BRIGGS. You do that right along, do you?

Mr. MUNSON. Yes, sir.
Mr. BRIGGS. You get your supply on this side and carry enough to supply you for the round trip?

Mr. MUNSON. Yes, sir.
Mr. BRIGGS. Is that true of the South American trade as well as trans-Atlantic?

Mr. MUNSON. That is true on South America and trans-Atlantic. The only trade that that is not true on is between New York and Mexico ports, because they can pick up oil at the Mexico end, and from the Mexico end they take fuel for the round voyage.

Mr. HARDY. Do they take coal for the round voyage, too? Do you take coal for the round voyage, too, or do you coal at each end?

Mr. MUNSON. We coal for the round voyage, because fuel is cheaper here, unless the boat is going to England, and if she is going to England we usually take on fuel there to bring us home.

Mr. BRIGGS. To what extent do you figure the total superiority of oil over coal in the efficiency of the ship? To what extent?

Mr. MUNSON. Just that percentage that I have mentioned. If the price is the same on the oil as on the coal, taking into consideration the saving of the crew, then there is that difference in dead-weight carrying capacity gained by having oil as compared with coal.

Mr. BRIGGS. In the carrying of your cargoes, of course, space is frequently more valuable than dead weight?

Mr. MUNSON. It is on regular line service.

Mr. BRIGGS. That is what I referred to a minute ago by dead-weight cargo. It is frequently so on line service, that a cargo of certain commodities may be lighter and more valuable than others. That is true, is it not?

Mr. MUNSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. BRIGGS. In other words, the prices for freight, too, are determined to some extent, and a very large extent, by the value of the cargo?

Mr. MUNSON. Not the value alone, but the space they occupy also.

Mr. BRIGGS. And the space they occupy?

Mr. MUNSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. BRIGGS. And very frequently, therefore, if you have got cargo that does not weigh so much as coal, for instance—you take a cargo of cotton, it doesn't consume so much of the dead weight, but it takes up a whole lot more space.

Mr. MUNSON. Yes, sir; and on an oil-burning boat with cotton you have a great percentage of efficiency, or any commodity which is lighter than the dead weight the vessel can carry.

Mr. BRIGGS. And you would find it far more valuable to you than a coal burner under those circumstances?

Mr. MUNSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. BRIGGS. All those advantages, therefore, are rather substantial ones?

Mr. MUNSON. Yes.

Mr. H. H. Raymond, president of the American Steamship Owners' Association, testified as follows:

(Pages 663, 964, and 966, part 13, hearings.)

Mr. BRIGGS. Are you familiar with the Shipping Board fleet?

Mr. RAYMOND. In a general way.

Mr. BRIGGS. Some of your lines have operated some of their vessels, have they not?

Mr. RAYMOND. Yes, sir.

Mr. BRIGGS. Were those vessels oil burners or coal burners?

Mr. RAYMOND. We have operated both.

Mr. BRIGGS. Which have you found the most economical in actual use?

Mr. RAYMOND. The oil-burning vessels.

Mr. BRIGGS. To what extent?

Mr. RAYMOND. Well, it is hard for me to tell, in the per cents. They ought to have those figures, because they buy the fuel and they have their capital charges if they have any. All we have done is to operate them and give credit for freights.

Mr. BRIGGS. I thought you might have known whether it was about 10 per cent, 20 per cent, or 30 per cent.

Mr. RAYMOND. No; I do not.

Mr. BRIGGS. In what service have you operated those vessels?

Mr. RAYMOND. The West Indies service particularly, and some of them off-shore—overseas.

Mr. BRIGGS. What price did you pay for oil and what price for coal per ton?

Mr. RAYMOND. We took the oil under Shipping Board contract; they had their own contracts.

Mr. BRIGGS. You took it under those contracts?

Mr. RAYMOND. Yes.

Mr. BRIGGS. How about the coal; the same way?

Mr. RAYMOND. The same way.

Mr. BRIGGS. You operated those ships with fewer men in the crew, did you not?

Mr. RAYMOND. Yes; decidedly.

Mr. BRIGGS. About how many; six or seven?

Mr. RAYMOND. What I am asking you, is not that because you are engaged in the coastwise service? If the line was only engaged in the foreign service that would not be true?

Mr. RAYMOND. No; that would not be true.

Mr. BRIGGS. In other words, that exaction is not made with reference to other American lines which are operated in the foreign trade?

Mr. RAYMOND. No; that is right.

Mr. HARDY. Did I understand Mr. Raymond to say that some of their ships are operated both in the foreign and coastwise?

Mr. BRIGGS. That is in the Clyde Line.

Mr. RAYMOND. We may have a Santo Domingo ship arrive to-day and she may go out next week to Galveston.

Mr. BRIGGS. On the so-called Mallory Line?

Mr. RAYMOND. Yes.

Mr. BRIGGS. You say she is in the coastwise service, then, and, the other way, she is in the foreign service?

Mr. HARDY. I want to get that clear, because so many witnesses have left the impression on my mind that a ship either goes coastwise or foreign and never makes the two.

Mr. RAYMOND. I think, Judge, to understand that you should differentiate between the foreign and what we might term semiforeign. Of course, we are going foreign in going to Santo Domingo and the West Indies; but the ship that is suitable for that trade is not suitable for what is regarded as the trans-Atlantic and Pacific Ocean trade and the Far East. They are too small.

Mr. BRIGGS. I think most people have been concerned about that. I do not think there is any question about that. There is a substantial advantage in the use of oil over coal as a fuel, in your opinion, is there not?

Mr. RAYMOND. There is as long as you can get it at a price that is equivalent to the coal price.

As illustrative of how much the value of space in ships counts, attention is called to the difference in ocean freight rates on cotton shipped in high-density bales and in standard bales.

The rates from the Gulf to United Kingdom ports recently announced are:

First-class rate high-density cotton, 45 cents.
First-class rate standard bale cotton, 60 cents.

The weight of the standard and the high-density bales does not vary materially, but the latter are compressed into a very much smaller compass than the standard bale and therefore occupy much less space in the ship, thereby permitting more high-density bales to be stored in the vessel than would be possible if the cotton was contained in standard bales.

The testimony at the hearings reflected beyond dispute that the saving in cargo space through the use of oil as fuel, rather than coal, was very material. To the United Kingdom and most continental ports sufficient oil for the round-trip voyage can be carried in the double bottoms of the ships without resort to cargo space. Of course, this is not true with respect to coal, which requires about one-seventh of the space of the vessel, which could otherwise be utilized for cargo (p. 547, hearings).

On June 30, 1921, the report of the United States Shipping Board—fiscal year ended June 30, 1921, pages 113 to 115—reflected the following number of ships of types indicated:

FUEL OIL AND TANK STEAMERS.

"Fuel oil has become a vital factor in the economical operation of ships, and in view of the shortage in coal, with attendant high prices, the steel tank steamer program assumed a position of primary importance, as the majority of the vessels constructed for the corporation are either 'oil' or 'oil or coal' burners. This program was rapidly nearing completion, as only six vessels remained to be delivered, and the last of these was estimated for delivery during the month of August, 1921.

"The following figures show the active steel tank steamer program by class of construction:

FUEL OIL.

In the fifth annual report of the United States Shipping Board, fiscal year ending June 30, 1921, the following statement occurs:

The establishment abroad of fuel stations operated to reduce the price of oil in Europe, and since these stations were established purchases of oil abroad by the board from private concerns since the middle of April have been negligible.

From the foregoing statement it appears that the obtaining of fuel oil by the Shipping Board in Europe at a reasonable price is no longer a matter of any difficulty.

CONSPICUOUS FEATURES OF H. R. 12817 (OLD NUMBER, H. R. 10644). TITLE I.

Section 1 amends section 5 of the present merchant marine act of 1920, which relates to terms and conditions of sale of Shipping Board vessels.

The proposed amendment seeks to strike out of the present law the following safeguards contained therein and adopted so that the fleet will not be absolutely sacrificed at forced sale:

The board in fixing or accepting the sale price of such vessels shall take into consideration the prevailing domestic and foreign market price of, the available supply of, and the demand for vessels, existing freight rates and prospects of their maintenance, the cost of constructing vessels of similar types under prevailing conditions, as well as the cost of the construction or purchase price of the vessels to be sold, and any other facts or conditions that would influence a prudent, solvent business man in the sale of similar vessels or property which he is not forced to sell.

The nature of the proposed amendment is to give five members of the Shipping Board authority to sell the ships without advertisement and without competitive bids.

It further fixes the rate of interest on deferred payments at 4 per cent.

It makes no provision for payment annually of any portion of the principal of the purchase price, though it would seem wise to do so, even if the present law has no such provision, but does state that "payments of principal shall be so arranged that the amounts due or paid under the contract of sale as principal up to any moment of time shall be sufficient to cover depreciation of the vessel up to such moment."

What the amount of such depreciation is to be, however, is not stated. The board, moreover, is given authority to waive this requirement upon the giving of adequate security.

One of the most important features which the present amendment, however, discards is that portion of the present law which in the sale of the Government ships requires the board to take into consideration—any other facts or conditions that would influence a prudent, solvent business man in the sale of similar vessels or property which he is not forced to sell.

The value of such a provision is clearly evident when it is remembered that the only bids for the fleet which the Shipping Board was able to obtain as late as last March were of such character as compelled Chairman Lasker to designate them as "facetious" and a "joke."

Of course, the restraining influence of the quoted provision, which is sought to be eliminated from the law, would be to cause the Shipping Board to reject bids which meant simply giving the fleet away. But if the safeguard referred to is removed from the law it may be reasonably and fairly concluded that Congress and the people intend that the fleet shall be sold, no matter at what sacrifice, and even if it is to be practically given away.

Section 2 of the bill adds a provision for a two years' continuance of trade routes by the Shipping Board, unless sooner sold to persons of the domestic communities primarily interested in such lines. This provision, as written and under the definition of the term "domestic communities primarily interested in such lines," shall be understood to mean "geographical divisions of the coast lines," will permit any steamship company or organization along any part of a coast line, such as the Gulf of Mexico, the South Atlantic or North Atlantic or the Pacific coast, to take over the fleets and trade routes now operating from the various ports, and would permit such steamship company or companies to abandon all except one port on each of those coasts, if it desired to do so.

Subdivision (b) of the same section does not prevent this, although it indicates and expresses a policy of hope that trade routes established will be preserved.

The Gulf coast organizations, as well as the Mississippi Valley Association and Merchant Marine Committee of the Central West, advocated a five-year continuance of such trade routes, with preference right of the ports from which operated to purchase such vessels, and intended the term "domestic communities" to be so understood. This definition, however, has been so expanded as to practically destroy any preference right during even the two-year period to the ports to acquire the trade routes now operating from them.

Section 3 proposes to amend section 11 of the merchant marine act of 1920 by broadening the sources from which the $125,000,000 revolving construction loan fund is to be obtained. The old law indicated receipts from sales and operations, the new law, "all receipts of the board, except appropriations made by law and profits of the board from operation of vessels."

The old law is further amended by making the fund not only available for construction of vessels but for equipment both with respect to vessels to be constructed as well as those already built, such equipment relating to the most efficient and most economical machinery and commercial appliances. The old law allowed no portion of the fund to be used for equipment.

Another proposed amendment is a limitation of 15 years upon such loans, but the interest rate is made 2 per cent. The old law fixed no limitation of the loan period, nor any interest rate; but this, of course, left the interest rate to be exacted at the usual current rates. No provision is made for repayment of any part of the principal before the end of the 15-year period.

The reduction which is thereby obtained in interest alone is of the greatest advantage, especially so when Mr. Munson, representing the committee of the American Steamship Owners' Association, testified that the rate for such purpose now was from 7 to 7½ per cent and under normal conditions from 5½ to 6 per cent.

The amount of loans for equipment purposes is allowed to be two-thirds of the cost of the equipment or two-thirds of the value of the vessel when thus reequipped. It is to be noted that the utmost difficulty in determining such value will not only be encountered, but this provision gives the Shipping Board the widest authority for advancing far more money even than the sale price of a vessel.

In other words, it was testified at the hearings by Chairman Lasker that some of the Shipping Board vessels were recently sold at $8 a dead-weight ton for conversion purposes into Diesel-engine types.

Congressman Edmonds stated at the hearing that the cost of such conversion would be about $65 a dead-weight ton. Mr. Merrill, director of research of the Shipping Board and a naval architect and engineer, also testified that the conversion costs would be extremely high and approximated the amount named by Mr. Edmonds.

There is nothing to indicate what the world market prices of such vessel or vessels after conversion or equipment would be, but if trade conditions do not materially improve soon it is easily appreciated that the Shipping Board can under this proposed law advance more money for the conversion or equipment of vessels already built than could be obtained for such vessels after the equipment was completed.

The provision for loans being two-thirds of the cost of the vessel for construction purposes is substantially the provision of the present law.

TITLE II—TAXATION.

SECTION 201.

This section is one involving amendment of section 23 of the present merchant marine act of 1920; but it also includes very much more, and amends the provisions of the revenue act of 1921 by adding new sections, beginning with section 265. Under the present law, as contained in section 23 of the merchant marine act of 1920, the only tax deduction allowed for the purpose of ascertaining net income is that income subject to the war-profits and excess-profits taxes.

As the war-profits and excess-profits taxes, however, were repealed by this Congress, all advantages which could have been gained under section 23 of the act of 1920 have already been enjoyed to the fullest degree.

It is now proposed by this new section to allow deductions in computing net income to an amount equivalent to the gross income in the foreign trade derived from the operation of vessels so engaged under the American flag, provided—

1. That the amount of income tax thereby allowed to be deducted shall—

(a) Be invested in building, in private shipyards in the United States, new vessels of a type and kind approved by the board; or

(b) Such amount be set aside by the taxpayer in a trust fund for investment in such building within a reasonable time, to be determined by the Shipping Board.

(c) The owner is required to furnish 50 per cent of the cost of the vessel in order to obtain the benefit of such tax deduction.

This last provision reduces the amount of the taxpayer's contribution for shipbuilding from two-thirds of cost of the vessel, as now provided by law.

Subdivision (e) of this section also provides allowance to a taxpayer, other than a corporation, shall not exceed the allowance to a taxpayer which is a corporation. It is also to be observed that this tax deduction is for a period which is retroactive to January 1, 1921, and continues for each of the eight taxable years following.

The purpose of making this provision retroactive is clearly no other than to enable shipowners who have already paid excess-profits taxes and war-profits taxes since January 1, 1921, to also obtain a refund of such excess-profits and war-profits taxes, if such return is invested in new ship construction.

SECTION 266.

This is the provision which amplifies the present law as contained in the second paragraph of section 23 of the act of 1920 and relates to exemption or deduction of the taxable gain derived from the sale, in taxable year 1921 and eight years thereafter launched—present law uses word "built"—of any vessel prior to January 1, 1914, which at the time of the enactment of the proposed measure was registered, enrolled, or licensed under the laws of the United States.

This section requires the entire proceeds of the sale to be invested by the taxpayer in the building in private shipyards in the United States of new vessels of a type and kind to be approved by the board to be registered under the laws of the United States (as now required by section 23), or to be put in a trust fund for investment for such owner within a reasonable time, to be determined by the board.

This section further amends the present law by granting tax exemption for any portion of such proceeds, less than the entire amount, which may be invested in new ship construction.

The section further amends the existing law by providing that "where a vessel is exchanged for property, or for money and property, the transactions shall for the purposes of this section be deemed to be a sale," and so forth. The full extent and meaning of this section is by no means clear. No testimony was given at the hearings with respect to it, because it was not incorporated in the original bill introduced. It is probable that this new addition to the law would enable many deductions to be obtained which ought not to be obtained and which would not represent any real investment in new ship construction or any improved types of converted ships.

SECTION 267.

This section deals with the investment trust fund and provides that the interest obtained upon such fund shall belong to such fund.

SECTION 268.

This is a section which has heretofore been referred to, and provides that a taxpayer who establishes a trust fund for investment may be allowed to furnish a bond with security "for an amount not less than the estimated income, war-profits and excess-profits taxes that would have been payable but for the deduction claimed under those sections (referring to secs. 265 and 266)." Clearly, it means nothing else, of course, than a refund of the excess and war profits as well as income taxes from January 1, 1921, provided they are used for ship-construction purposes or put in a trust fund for a similar purpose.

SECTION 269.

This section also deals with the investment of the trust fund and provides that any loan made by the board under the provisions of section 11 of the act of 1920 shall not be regarded as part of such fund created by the taxpayer.

SECTION 270.

This provides that sections 265 and 266 are retroactive to January 1, 1921.

SECTION 271.

Grants the benefits of sections 265 and 266 to the members of a partnership and the beneficiaries of an estate or trust.

SECTION 202.

This section amends the revenue act of 1921 by making appropriate changes in numbers of sections indicated in the proposed subsidy measure.

DEPRECIATION OF VESSELS.

SECTION 203.

This is a new section and a proposed new provision of law granting to American shipowners of vessels of 1,000 gross tons or more registered, enrolled, or licensed under the laws of the United States (does not indicate when, and therefore is available up to the time of the passage of this act), which vessels were acquired after August 1, 1914, and prior to January 1, 1921, a reasonable deduction for the taxable year 1922 and each of the four succeeding taxable years, for the exceptional decrease in value thereof since the date of acquisition. Such deduction to be determined under rules and regulations prescribed by the Shipping Board. No investment requirement is made and taxes returned may be used for any purpose.

This section, it is also stated, shall take effect as of January 1, 1922.

This is one of the most important provisions in the bill, and is unquestionably designed to enable the American shipowners to write down the capital cost or book values of all vessels acquired after August 1, 1914, up to January 1, 1921, for a period of five years, so that such owners may enjoy the benefit of a tax deduction or exemption of a most unusual and valuable character, and which will enable such owners to write down the book values of vessels built at war costs or high costs after the war to prevailing world-market rates during the five-year period, with a range from $225 a ton to $25 a ton or less, without charging against such owners any portion of the enormous returns earned by them during such period from the fabulous freight rates paid.

At the hearings it was frankly admitted by the representatives of the steamship owners' association, such as Mr. Munson, Mr. Marvin, Mr. Raymond, and Mr. Thompson, that the profits during and for a year and a half, at least, after the war closed were enormous, and that it was the custom and practice of the shipowners to write down capital costs or book values of their ships in accordance with the extraordinary and unusual profits received, but that this had not been done because under the bookkeeping system and requirements of the income-tax bureau only the small amount of depreciation provided for could be written off. The result was, as testified, that the enormous net earnings were either declared in dividends or reinvested or carried to surplus.

It is now proposed, therefore, to grant a bounty to such shipowners of a most startling sum in order to write down the so-called capital cost of ships acquired by them since January 1, 1914, when the testimony reflects that many of such steamship companies earned during such period far more than the total cost of their investment. In fact, one concern earned more than 600 per cent upon its capital in one year, while another earned over 250 per cent in a similar period.

If capital costs are to be allowed to be written down by tax deductions which must be paid out of the Treasury, or by withholding money from the Treasury which would otherwise be received there, then surely those who have already enjoyed, through their enormous earnings, the benefit of already having entirely or in part written off the capital costs of their ships should not be granted any further gratuity or benefit for such purpose.

REDUCTION IN CAPITAL COSTS.

(Pages 1136-1137, part 20, hearings.)

Mr. BRIGGS. And you know the bill provides, of course—has provisions providing for the reduction in investment costs, do you not?

Mr. THOMPSON. Yes, sir. That is the book costs.

Mr. BRIGGS. Yes.

Mr. THOMPSON. Yes.

Mr. BRIGGS. Bringing them down to what might be called the world market prices, as testified to by one of the witnesses here.

Mr. THOMPSON. Yes.

Mr. BRIGGS. That would be a very substantial provision to your company, or any other company that fell under the provisions of this bill, would it not?

Mr. THOMPSON. If we earned money enough. I take it that is a relief in taxes; is not that the way it is going to work out?

Mr. BRIGGS. That is what I am talking about. Is not that a substantial relief?

Mr. THOMPSON. Yes. It is going to be of material benefit if we earn a lot of money; it means we will have to pay less taxes; but if we do not earn a lot of money it will not mean much.

Mr. BRIGGS. Money that does not go into the Treasury of the United States means real money to a company that has that privilege, does it not?

Mr. THOMPSON. If you have taxes to pay, yes; that is true. But some of them won't have any taxes to pay.

Mr. BRIGGS. That may be, too.

Mr. THOMPSON. Over a period of time, assuming reasonable prosperity, that will be of some advantage.

Mr. BRIGGS. And it is intended to be, by reducing those investment costs and bringing them down?

Mr. THOMPSON. Certainly; otherwise it would not be in the bill.

Mr. BRIGGS. Certainly. It is intended to bring down the capital costs.

Mr. THOMPSON. That is as I understand it.

Mr. BRIGGS. It will bring down your capital costs, which you have averaged so high here?

Mr. THOMPSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. BRIGGS. And it is a fact, of course, that the exemption from taxes in any form is like a return of the same taxes from the Treasury if you had already paid them in.

Mr. THOMPSON. That is true.

Upon the failure of American-owned steamship companies to write down book values in spite of large earnings, Mr. Thompson, of the Texas Steamship Co., representing all tanker and industrial company tonnage, testified as follows:

(Pages 1135-1136, part 20, hearings.)

Mr. BRIGGS. But you do not know what effect even the passage of the bill would have on the market for tonnage?

Mr. THOMPSON. On tanker tonnage?

Mr. BRIGGS. Yes; in view of your statement that the tanker tonnage market is already oversupplied.

Mr. THOMPSON. It is oversupplied.

Mr. BRIGGS. There is a great excess, of several million tons?

Mr. THOMPSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. BRIGGS. In your capital costs—you were referring to those a little while ago—you do not carry those capital costs for your ships at the high prices you named a moment ago, at $175 to $185 a dead-weight ton, do you?

Mr. THOMPSON. I said they would average up to $185 a dead-weight ton of new tonnage.

Mr. BRIGGS. You are not carrying those high prices on your books?

Mr. THOMPSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. BRIGGS. You have not marked them down to the world market price, to what tanker tonnage can be obtained for now?

Mr. THOMPSON. No.

Mr. BRIGGS. You are carrying them at the old costs?

Mr. THOMPSON. Yes; allowing usual depreciation which is allowed by the Internal Revenue Department.

Mr. BRIGGS. Did they issue stock dividends—your company—in the last two or three or four years?

Mr. THOMPSON. We issued a stock dividend of 10 per cent. Just what year it was I do not recall.

Mr. BRIGGS. About when was it?

Mr. THOMPSON. In March, 1921.

Mr. BRIGGS. Is that the only one?

Mr. THOMPSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. BRIGGS. On what capitalization was that, Mr. Thompson?

Mr. THOMPSON. Well, at that time I rather think it was on a capitalization of $130,000,000, but I would rather submit that to you if you want it.

Mr. BRIGGS. Oh, I have no objection. If you want to correct the figures and make them accurate, I have no objection at all.

Mr. THOMPSON. Yes; because I am not quite sure what the capitalization was.

Mr. BRIGGS. Did you have any dividends declared at that time other than stock dividends—during that period?

Mr. THOMPSON. Well, we have paid—within the last few years we have paid 12 per cent dividends.

Mr. BRIGGS. Annually?

Mr. THOMPSON. Yes; within the last few years.

Mr. BRIGGS. What do you mean; from what date on; take it from 1914, say?

Mr. THOMPSON. My recollection is that in 1914 we were probably on a 10 per cent basis but earning more than that, and we finally put ourselves on a 12 per cent basis. However, in 1921 we did not earn 12 per cent.

Mr. BRIGGS. Had you been carrying some to surplus during this period?

Mr. THOMPSON. We had.

Mr. BRIGGS. About what would that average with reference to your capitalization?

Mr. THOMPSON. Well, our surplus is now—I guess it is about 50 per cent of our capital.

Mr. BRIGGS. So that in order to make up some of this full 12 per cent you are resorting to some of your surplus for that purpose?

Mr. THOMPSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. BRIGGS. At the present time?

Mr. THOMPSON. Well, that is not quite accurate, because a part of our loss in 1921 was due to the depreciation in values in petroleum products from 1920. Petroleum products were high in 1920, and they gradually went down. In 1921 they had depreciated materially.

Mr. BRIGGS. How much, approximately?

Mr. THOMPSON. Oh, I think with us it was about ten million.

Mr. BRIGGS. About 10 per cent—8 or 10 per cent? Well, that is close enough; I do not care to have it any closer.

Mr. THOMPSON. Yes; something like that.

Mr. BRIGGS. Has it gone up since 1921?

Mr. THOMPSON. No.

Mr. BRIGGS. It has just kept about the same?

Mr. THOMPSON. About the same.

Mr. BRIGGS. None of this 12 per cent, then, of dividend paid was paid out of any of the surplus?

Mr. THOMPSON. No; our surplus remained about the same.

Mr. Frank C. Munson, of the Munson Steamship Co., who also represented the committee of the American Steamship Owners' Association, testified that his company, in spite of the enormously high operating profits made during the war and for some time thereafter—that high construction costs of vessels built during such period were not written down, although the custom is to do so whenever large profits are made. It appears the bookkeeping proposition in following income-tax regulations, however, resulted only in a comparatively small depreciation charge being made and the large profits which were not declared in dividends being carried to surplus. (Hearings, p. 1153.)

(Extract from testimony on page 1153, hearings.)

Mr. BRIGGS. Certainly; he can put in both. This calls to mind another proposition I want to ask about. In the capital cost, which refers to investment cost largely, practically, how are your vessels carried—the one you own? Has the book value been written down to world-market prices or not?

Mr. MUNSON. No.

Mr. BRIGGS. Are you still carrying them at the book values?

Mr. MUNSON. You see, the Treasury Department provides we can only depreciate them 5 per cent per annum, and in calculating our income tax we have only been able to depreciate them that amount.

Mr. BRIGGS. That is under the allowance by the income-tax bureau—the Government?

Mr. MUNSON. Yes.

Mr. BRIGGS. I mean, so far as the years are concerned. Suppose you had an unusually good year—say the years of the war, 1918, 1919, the early part of 1920, when rates were, as has been testified by everybody here, enormously high—

Mr. MUNSON. Yes.

Mr. BRIGGS. That is perfectly true?

Mr. MUNSON. Yes.

Mr. BRIGGS. The amounts that were earned at that time would usually and ordinarily come out of the net earnings and go toward the writing off of a large part of the capital costs, or, perhaps, all of them, if they were sufficient?

Mr. MUNSON. If we had no restriction from the Treasury Department we would have written off a larger amount, but we did not write off a larger amount because of that restriction. We couldn't carry a different value on our books.

Mr. BRIGGS. I understand. That involves a great deal of bookkeeping. If you couldn't write it off you had to do something with the money, and it either went into surplus or something else.

Mr. MUNSON. It went into surplus.

Mr. BRIGGS. So the representation is here, though the books may have it in a certain form. The process that would have been employed, except for the accounting system, would have been to have applied those surplus earnings in the reduction of the capital cost?

Mr. MUNSON. Yes.

Mr. BRIGGS. One gentleman testified here that one ship practically paid for itself in a year—I think it was $75,000—and they just wrote off the whole capital cost in one year.

Mr. MUNSON. Yes.

Mr. BRIGGS. That is the practice, isn't it?

Mr. MUNSON. That is the practice in normal times, when we do not have the income tax we have now.

On custom of writing down capital cost out of large earnings, Mr. Love, vice president of the Emergency Fleet Corporation, testified that it was customary, such testimony being as follows:

(Pages 850 and 851, part 16, hearings.)

Mr. BRIGGS. How does the foreign line compare with that? Is that the same thing with reference to a foreign line and an American line privately owned?

Mr. LOVE. Some of them write off more than 5 per cent depreciation.

Mr. BRIGGS. The amount of depreciation varies?

Mr. LOVE. It does, sir.

Mr. BRIGGS. To what extent; just give the levels?

Mr. LOVE. Possibly from 15 per cent down to nothing, according to the year.

Mr. BRIGGS. Just what do you mean by that?

Mr. LOVE. If they have had a good year, they will write off a larger amount of depreciation; if they have had a poor year, they won't write off so much.

Mr. BRIGGS. In other words, if the profits are big they write off depreciation not only for the one year but sufficient to cover the extent of the surplus profits they have made?

Mr. LOVE. It might be.

Mr. BRIGGS. In other words, if they have made 100 per cent net they might be able to write off the whole capital cost in the one year?

Mr. LOVE. It might be; it is possible.

Mr. BRIGGS. Is that customary?

Mr. LOVE. Not to that extent.

Mr. BRIGGS. Is it customary when you make big earnings to write off the capital costs—to write them down in a very large measure?

Mr. LOVE. Yes, sir.

Mr. BRIGGS. That is customary in all well-established shipping lines?

Mr. LOVE. Yes; I have seen companies that had a ship that cost $75,000 write off the ship, write it right off to the dollar.

Mr. BRIGGS. Out of the profits they had made?

Mr. LOVE. Yes; the first year, to write it right straight off.

Mr. BRIGGS. I say that is customary whether it is an American privately owned line or a foreign-owned line, is it?

Mr. LOVE. Yes, sir.

Mr. Rossbottom, of the Panama Railroad Co. steamship line, now temporarily with the Shipping Board, also testified to the same effect:

Mr. BRIGGS. I want to ask you a question as to depreciation, too, as an element of cost. Do you carry on the books the actual value of the ships, or the cost value of the ships, in figuring depreciation? In other words, take the Shipping Board fleet to-day, ships costing $200 a ton to construct, and which it is stated now would probably have a market value of $30 a ton dead weight; on which basis would they be carried?

Mr. ROSSBOTTOM. I do not know.

Mr. BRIGGS. On which basis would they be carried on the books?

Mr. ROSSBOTTOM. I do not know just how the Shipping Board does carry depreciation.

Mr. BRIGGS. But, as a ship operator, how would you carry it?

Mr. ROSSBOTTOM. As a ship operator, if I had bought a ship for $150 a ton and had a capital expenditure of a certain amount, and I found out I had bought the ship at too high a price, I would reduce the capital expenditure; I would charge off to profit and loss a certain amount of the capital cost and then base the depreciation on the actual value of the ship.

Mr. BRIGGS. In other words, you would carry the ship along at actual value, constantly, whether it rises or falls?

Mr. ROSSBOTTOM. Yes.

Mr. BRIGGS. Is that it?

Mr. ROSSBOTTOM. Yes.

Mr. BRIGGS. In figuring off depreciation on capital investment?

Mr. ROSSBOTTOM. That is right.

Mr. Merrill, for the Shipping Board, also testified on the subject of custom of writing down capital costs of ships out of excess profits, as follows:

(Pages 514 and 515, part 9, hearings.)

Mr. BRIGGS. Now, Mr. Merrill, did not the ships during the period of these high rates to which you referred a while ago earn enormous returns in freights directly after the armistice and on up till January, we will say, 1920?

Mr. MERRILL. I think they did; yes, sir.

Mr. BRIGGS. Is not your familiarity with the subject such that you are able to state they did? If you don't know, of course, just say so.

Mr. MERRILL. I don't know, absolutely, sir, because—the reason I qualify the statement is that I can testify clearly and fully that the freight rates were very, very high.

Mr. BRIGGS. Extremely high.

Mr. MERRILL. Extremely high, but at the same time costs were very high, too.

Mr. BRIGGS. Were not the net returns extremely high, too?

Mr. MERRILL. I am not in a position to testify that.

Mr. BRIGGS. Didn't some ships earn as much as a quarter of a million dollars on a single voyage?

Mr. MERRILL. I should not be surprised if they did.

Mr. BRIGGS. And some even in excess of that sum, up to nearly $500,000?

Mr. MERRILL. I know, of course, there were very large earnings made during the war, or even before we got into it.

Mr. BRIGGS. I am talking about after the war, when the war ended, or the armistice was signed.

Mr. MERRILL. I don't know so much about that.

Mr. BRIGGS. Wherever these large earnings were made at any time, do they tend to reduce the capital costs in any way—are they regarded as doing so—over and above the estimated return that the investment should reasonably pay? In other words, if a ship earns enough in one year to about halfway or fully pay for itself, is that estimated in the reduction of the capital costs on the books?

Mr. MERRILL. I assume that is a matter for the particular owners to decide.

Mr. BRIGGS. It could not be regarded necessarily as such a reduction?

Mr. MERRILL. They may and should write it off.

Mr. Marvin, after stating that Mr. Thompson would testify for "that entire group of shipowners" affected by old section 701 (f), relating to cash subsidy—private operators for their own benefit, like Standard Oil and Steel Trust—was asked, "Do you feel that with the resources of these great organizations that they will really need a subsidy to succeed and carry on the operations of their lines," and answered, "I know so far as their ships are concerned they do." (Page 1051, part 19, hearings.) Yet Mr. Thompson testified (page 1135, part 20, hearings):

Mr. BRIGGS. I mean the cost of operating the vessels, generally, just like the cost of operating the plants on shore, they are all carried as part of the cost of operating the company?

Mr. THOMPSON. That is true.

Mr. BRIGGS. And they are figured in as part of the ultimate costs in the disposition of your product, are they not?

Mr. THOMPSON. Well, yes.

SECTION 204.

This section adds a new section to the revenue act of 1921, and replaces section 301 of the original subsidy bill.

It grants a tax rebate of 5 per cent of the amount of freight money paid by the taxpayer for the transportation of cargo in the foreign trade which moves in a vessel under the United States flag.

It also provides that where a vessel is chartered by the owner of any part of the cargo from a person not affiliated with such owner the amount of freight money paid by the charterer shall be such amount as is determined by the Shipping Board.

It is also provided, subdivision (b), that "the credit provided in this section shall not be allowed with reference to transactions between persons who are affiliated." This is ostensibly to deny the benefit of this provision to large concerns having enormous subsidiaries or interlocking companies, such as the Standard Oil Co.; but the value of the provision just quoted is destroyed by the further provision that for the purposes of this section two or more corporations or associations shall be held to be affiliated if one corporation or association owns or controls more than 50 per cent of the outstanding stock or interest in the other.

Of course, it is generally known that many of the great combines and trusts are so welded together that frequently less than 50 per cent of the stock of a subsidiary company is held by the parent company, but the control over the subsidiary is just as complete and effective, through understandings of a mutually satisfactory character, as if the parent company owned all of the stock of the subsidiary. It is therefore believed that this provision will not in any way interfere with the Standard Oil Co. or any of its subsidiaries, the Steel Corporation, or others operating large fleets for their own benefit, enjoying the advantage of this tax rebate.

This provision is the one which is intended to replace section 301 of the original bill, and also section 34 of the present act of 1920.

The mere fact that an affiliated company may not own 50 per cent or more of the stock of another company does not in the least determine the question of actual domination or control or identity of interest.

Even the ownership of 30 or 40 per cent, or less, of the stock of another company may give the owning company control of the other corporation. That this is not a fanciful or extravagant assertion is borne out by the findings of the Federal Trade Commission in the recent investigation of the Wyoming petroleum industry, wherein the commission expressly states:

During the past year, 1920, the Standard Oil Co. (Indiana), which has had close business relations with the Midwest Refining Co. since its formation, purchased 205,053 shares, or about 33 per cent of the Midwest Refining Co.'s stock. This percentage is admitted by representatives of both of these companies to be sufficient to give the Standard Oil Co. (Indiana) practical control of the operation and policies of the Midwest Refining Co.

The Standard Oil Co. of Indiana is also shown by the Federal Trade Commission to be interested with the Sinclair interests, upon a 50-50 stock ownership basis, in the organization of the Sinclair Pipe Line Co. and the Sinclair Crude Oil Producing Co. in Wyoming, and through other subsidiaries of the Standard Oil Co. dominates the petroleum industry now in that State.

I am also advised that the largest stockholding which the Gould interests held in any one railroad at the time the late

Jay Gould was operating was in the Missouri Pacific, and that he actually controlled no more than 23 per cent. In other roads which he controlled as fully as though he owned 100 per cent the actual ownership was much less.

The chairman of the Federal Trade Commission, Hon. Nelson B. Gaskill, informs me that—in effect it seems to be the fact that control seems to be dependent not so much upon the amount of stock the active minority holder may own as upon the diversification of holding and inert qualities of holders of the majority interest.

One thing is certain, and that is that no mathematical proportion can be assigned as necessary to constitute control.

The fact, therefore, that ownership of 33½ per cent of the stock of the Midwest Refining Co. admittedly gives to the Standard Oil Co. of Indiana practical control of the operation and policies of the Midwest Refining Co., and that even a smaller minority stock ownership has enabled other interests to control the policies and operation of other companies, demonstrates that under the definition in the bill of affiliated companies no serious difficulty will be encountered by such affiliated concerns in also reaping the benefits of the 5 per cent tax rebates allowed under section 204 of the bill.

SECTION 205.

This is the proposed amendment to section 28 of the act of 1920.

TITLE VII.

Relates to transportation of Government officials on Shipping Board vessels when practicable.

CURRENT SHIPBUILDING.

The tremendous decline in ocean freight within the last two years has occasioned a corresponding decline in the amount of shipbuilding during such period.

During the war and immediately for some time after the armistice, shipbuilding increased by leaps and bounds, particularly in the United States, in order to overcome the submarine campaign against merchant ships which was being waged with disastrous effect.

The United States, with its vast resources, ingenuity, and energy, increased its steel tonnage from 1,837,000 gross tons, on June 30, 1914, to 12,314,000 gross tons, on June 30, 1921, or an increase in steel tonnage during such period of nearly 700 per cent, while the increase of the British fleet during such period was practically negligible. On June 30, 1914, its steel tonnage consisted of 18,887,700 gross tons; while on June 30, 1921, it was 19,288,000 gross tons, or an increase during such period of only 411,000 gross tons.

On June 30, 1914, the gross steel tonnage of the British Dominions amounted to 1,407,000 gross tons; while on June 30, 1921, it was 1,950,000 gross tons, or an increase of 443,000 tons.

On June 30, 1914, Germany had 5,098,000 gross tons of steel ships, which, through losses and surrender during and after the war, was reduced, on June 30, 1921, to 654,000 tons.

Japan, on June 30, 1914, had 1,642,000 tons, which was increased to 3,063,000 tons of steel tonnage on June 30, 1921, or less than 100 per cent increase.

The following table, taken from Commerce Reports for August 28, 1922, page 616, published by the Department of Commerce, gives the relative standing of the countries of the world with respect to their merchant marines up to as late as June 30, 1922:

Tonnage of steel steam and motor vessels, over 100 gross tons each.

Countries.	June 30, 1914.	June 30, 1921.	June 30, 1922.
	Gross tons.	Gross tons.	Gross tons.
United Kingdom.....	18,877,000	19,288,000	19,053,000
British Dominions.....	1,407,000	1,950,000	2,201,000
United States.....	1,837,000	12,314,000	12,506,000
France.....	1,918,000	3,046,000	3,303,000
Germany.....	5,098,000	654,000	1,783,000
Holland.....	1,471,000	2,207,000	2,613,000
Italy.....	1,428,000	2,378,000	2,600,000
Japan.....	1,642,000	3,063,000	3,325,000
Norway.....	1,923,000	2,285,000	2,237,000
Other countries.....	6,913,000	6,973,000	7,181,000
Total.....	42,514,000	54,158,000	56,802,000

From the foregoing table it appears that the United States is not only possessed of the greatest ocean tonnage of all the nations, except Great Britain, but has now more than three and a half times as much tonnage as Japan, over seven times as much as Germany, and nearly four times as much as France.

In addition, the American fleet is the newest of all the other nations, as the great bulk of its vessels have been built during and since the World War. This in itself is of the very greatest advantage because the United States has thereby had the advantage of the most modern methods and improvements in shipbuilding.

The proposal of Chairman Lasker for solving the existing difficulties of the American merchant marine which has heretofore been referred to may again be repeated as the substitute for the subsidy legislation which is now being so strongly urged:

When the world shipping gets buoyant, the avarice of men will make them want to increase their fleet and will sell the ships, and that day is sure to come. And the Government has got to keep the ships going, and put confidence either in ourselves or some others, to keep them going as efficiently as can be under the circumstances until such time arrives.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the Record.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. I make the same request.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to these requests? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MANSFIELD] be permitted to extend his remarks in the Record?

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I wish to ask that Mr. EDMONDS, who has been obliged to go home on account of sickness in his family, may extend his remarks in the Record.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman from Pennsylvania extending his remarks in the Record? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GERNERD]. [Applause.]

Mr. GERNERD. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, a number of years ago, in 1911, I had the pleasure of visiting the city of Genoa, Italy, on a summer's tour. One morning I walked down to take a view of their beautiful harbor and there I saw hundreds of ships anchored—German, English, Portuguese, Danish, and in fact ships from all parts of the world, all busily engaged in unloading their cargoes; but in that busy harbor with its great maritime business there was not a ship that floated the American flag. Little did I realize then that I should ever be called upon as a Member of Congress to help in preserving our merchant marine, for at that time we possessed none. I frankly tell you that I was sad and my pride was wounded when I stood there and realized that the leading Nation in the world even then was without representation in one of the greatest seaports of the world. That same thing happened when I got to Liverpool, Antwerp, and Trieste. I traveled thousands of miles on the seas that summer, and I had to travel all of that distance under a foreign flag. Now, my friends, the World War has brought about a changed condition—we needed ships; we had none. When we realize that more than a million of our boys had to be transported to the scenes of action in foreign vessels, it should occasion our pride to droop just a little and cause us to realize that we had failed to develop one of the greatest commercial opportunities in our history. We never even thought of the danger that confronted us. We paid Great Britain more than $57,000,000 to take our boys to the front to fight for the common cause. Here we are confronted with a merchant fleet of 7,500,000 tons, admittedly a good fleet. It may require some strengthening; yet there are many who are hesitating to sustain that fleet from decaying for fear that certain large commercial corporations might get a little subsidy out of this great undertaking. To my mind, these fancied allegations are of small circumstance and should be brushed aside in the honest consideration of a matter as important as this. I recall that just a few years ago we had no Rural Free Delivery Service, nor did we have a parcel-post system, yet the Postal Department, through acts of Congress, made both of these services possible. It was known at the time that it would cost tremendous sums of money to inaugurate this service; and yet who to-day, realizing the great benefits it has produced, would hesitate to appropriate enough money out of the funds of the United States Treasury to make up the deficit or even criticize the expenditure of so large a sum of money to maintain it? By reason of this service large commercial houses sprang up, whose businesses are exclusively founded on mail orders, and they have been tremendously successful, earning large profits, which have been made possible only through the Parcel Post and Rural Free Delivery Service, which service is being maintained by the Government. Yet no one would criticize anyone engaged in a business of this character, and yet these business enterprises were fostered and made prosperous by indirect governmental aid. Who is criticizing the nominal cost of carrying the magazines and newspapers of the country through the mails?

I wish to say that the newspapers and magazines have been making large profits, and yet they are getting postal rates that are most favorable to them. Upon what theory? Upon the theory that they are disseminating public information to the American people. These papers and magazines are owned privately or by corporations, and yet we know that the American people through their Government are paying for this special service, for none of them are paying the actual cost of distribution, and their success is also based upon governmental aid. Realizing these facts, are we going to hesitate now when we all agree that we need a merchant marine and when only a matter of twenty or thirty million dollars a year is involved? There was a time when we could do without a merchant marine in this country. There was a time when this country was able to consume all of her manufactured products. That day has passed. There was a time when the South, with her great production of cotton, a noncompetitive article in the world's market, brought the ships of the nations of the world to her ports because they had to have her cotton to feed their manufacturing. They are still coming for that cotton, and will continue to do so just as long as cotton remains a noncompetitive article. But we must not overlook the fact that Egypt and other countries are developing the cultivation of cotton, and there may come a time when those freight ships will turn their prows in other directions, and then the prosperity of the cotton growers of the South will be dependent upon the American manufacturer and his ability to sell the finished merchandise in the markets of the world. I fear that most of the hostility of my southern friends to this bill is predicated upon the theory of free trade.

There was a time when Europe needed the wheat of the United States, when our only competitor was southern Russia, and that is less than 25 years ago. In those days it was a question whether Odessa or Chicago, through Liverpool, sold Europe's supply of wheat. To-day Russia is not a competitor, but we have in her place Australia, the South American Republics, and Canada. They have become most active competitors, and it is reasonable to suppose that southern Russia will in a few years again become a real factor. During this last year 34 per cent of our production of wheat, and wheat converted into flour, was exported and came in direct competition with Canada, Australia, and the Argentine. That represented 279,406,776 bushels of wheat. Of that amount American vessels carried 27 per cent of the wheat shipments and foreign vessels carried 73 per cent. We must not lose sight of the fact that transportation rates and favored preference shipments are very important factors in the sale of a competitive article such as wheat. A very large proportion of our export tonnage passes through Canada to Montreal and Vancouver, which have become the two great embarkation centers for Europe and the Orient in the north of America, and since the great agricultural areas of the United States are adjacent to Canada we can not help but recognize what an advantage the Canadian possesses over that of the American shipper. Permit me to call to your attention what actually happened last year at the port of Montreal by quoting to you from an article that appeared in the Montreal Gazette of October, 1921:

PORT OF MONTREAL ACUTELY CONGESTED—BY UNPRECEDENTED GRAIN SHIPMENTS—UNITED STATES SWELLS TOTAL.

The extraordinary activity has been largely due to the shipment of grain from the United States through Canadian ports. American grain has constituted about 40 per cent of the total shipments from Montreal this season. At the beginning of the season it was all Canadian, and at the present time it is about 60 per cent American and 40 per cent Canadian; but the proportion of Canadian grain will be larger as soon as the western crop movement begins properly. In order to prevent Montreal being blocked with American grain to the detriment of Canadian shippers the railways will apply the permit system to American grain coming to Georgian Bay ports for transit to Montreal. In future no boat can come from American lake ports without a permit to unload. The congestion appears to be increasing rather than otherwise. About 2,100 cars were reported at Montreal waiting a chance to receive elevator handling to the ships, and about 2,000,000 bushels were being sent to Quebec, to which about a dozen tramp ships are bound for cargo.

Mr. RAKER. This is from Montreal to the Orient?

Mr. GERNERD. No; that is going to Europe, but I say shipments to the Orient go by way of Vancouver, and the same obstacles that are confronting American shippers at Montreal are confronting American shippers by way of Vancouver. My friends, when we realize that that is the situation, I can not understand why—

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. GERNERD. Yes.

Mr. RAKER. Taking the gentleman's statement in regard to the large amount of tonnage that has gone to those ports, and I suppose some has gone to the American ports, is there a sufficient amount of ship tonnage to handle it to foreign ports, or has there been in the last year?

Mr. GERNERD. Yes. If they had gone by way of American seaports, and if the American ships could have been utilized.

Mr. RAKER. Was there any congestion at New York or Philadelphia or Baltimore in regard to the freight to be sent from there?

Mr. GERNERD. I am not prepared to give you an answer on that point. There was a time, not far distant, when we had American ships plying between the Orient and the Pacific Coast, but to-day we have none. Are we going to permit $1,877,000,000 worth of wheat and other export articles to be shipped in foreign bottoms? That is what we exported last year. Are we going to close our eyes to this great commercial opportunity? Shall we continue to hazard our prosperity for lack of an effective merchant marine just because we fear that some one will get a little governmental aid, called a subsidy? We must rise above all prejudices and resolve that our merchant fleet must sail the great waterways of the world. Gentlemen, I wish to say that I am for a well-rounded development of our country, and while I come from one of the largest industrial centers of the country, at the same time I represent a large farming element. I recognize that 45,000,000 farmers and stock growers in this country have got to be prosperous and their business put on a safe and substantial basis. I am eager that it should be done, for two-thirds of the country can not be prosperous and the other third be weighted down by adversity. The one is going to draw the other down eventually. What we must do is to inaugurate such a policy as will bring prosperity to all of our people. I firmly believe that the passage of this great, constructive measure will prove fundamental in establishing such a policy. Just as we have developed our transcontinental lines in years gone by and brought California within less than a week's travel of New York City, and opened up that great and vast territory, so I want the ships of my country to bring the ports of the world nearer to my own country. If we are to be among the leaders of civilization and to insure our industrial supremacy, we must have ships that will ply the seas and appear in every foreign port of the world. We must give them a little touch of the American spirit, and in order to win the world's confidence and good will we must trade with them, for I contend that we can no longer remain inactive and do our part for the world's progress. Up to 1890 we were primarily an agricultural nation. Then by inventions and through the discovery of the Lake Superior ores and the great iron deposits in Alabama, there came about a great transition. An evolution in the steel industry, and, almost as if by magic, we became the world's real competitor in the manufacture of steel with Birmingham, England. This was due to the genius and the God-given natural products that we had in our own hills and valleys that we knew not of, and that were brought under the spell of American ingenuity and the spirit of aggression that caused us to outdistance Europe in that industry. From 1890 to 1912 we experienced a marvelous development. We came to be one of the leading industrial nations of the world.

I can recall that when I was a boy, in my district we had only a few small manufacturing industries. We knew nothing about silk mills. We had no hosiery or cotton mills. But today we have more than 72,000 industrial workers employed in our mills. Those plants, during the war, more than doubled their capacity and production. It is contended that between 8 and 12 per cent, and some say 15 per cent, is the surplus production in our country. We must find an outlet in order to protect ourselves, or even to maintain normal production. My friends, I firmly believe that if the industries of our country are going to be run at normal capacity as they now stand, we can not consume more than 75 per cent of our production, either industrially or agriculturally. If that be true then it is absolutely imperative that we find world markets to dispose of that surplus production. I realize that we ought to consume as much of our agricultural products in our own country as we can, and I want to see Texas, Nevada, California, Idaho, and those other western States that are adapted to grazing and stock raising, continue to raise their cattle and their sheep and their wool, rather than have it imported from Australia or New Zealand or any other part of the world. I recognize that those very people need every extension of help that the American Nation can give them.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GERNERD. May I have just a few minutes more?

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. I yield to the gentleman five minutes more.

Mr. RAKER. Right in that connection, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. GERNERD. Yes.

Mr. RAKER. Our farmers and our stockmen are practically being bankrupted.

Mr. GERNERD. I realize that.

Mr. RAKER. They have their cattle and they can not get a price to live on.

Mr. GERNERD. I agree with you.

Mr. RAKER. And the sheepmen the same.

Mr. GERNERD. That is true.

Mr. RAKER. And tons of potatoes and carloads of apples and all the produce that the American people ought to have are rotting in the fields.

Mr. GERNERD. That is true.

Mr. RAKER. And the eastern people can not get this produce. What is the matter?

Mr. GERNERD. Do you recognize that that agriculture depression is world-wide; that it is not only true of the United States, but of the whole world? The potato growers in my district are but 62 miles from Philadelphia, a natural market for the sale of potatoes, and my farmers are obliged to sell those potatoes at 50 cents a bushel, and they can not begin to grow those potatoes for less than 70 cents a bushel. That is the situation. That condition is not alone true in the West, it is true in the East. They are getting 85 cents a bushel for wheat and 55 cents a bushel for corn. No farmer can grow wheat or corn or potatoes at any price like that. But when you read about conditions in Denmark, Holland, Ireland, and get the story of the Republics of South America and of Australia they will tell you the same thing.

Mr. RAKER. Will the gentleman yield for another question?

Mr. GERNERD. Yes.

Mr. RAKER. That being true, would it not be good business judgment and sense for the American people to just hold on to this merchant marine for another year or so, rather than to give it away and destroy it?

Mr. GERNERD. Who wants to destroy it? I want to preserve it, and I want to help strengthen it, so that when the shipping revival comes the United States will be right there to meet the competition of the world. [Applause.] I am not afraid of this bugaboo about this corporation or that private individual getting a subsidy. I want to say to you that I have faith in the integrity of the business men of America. [Applause.]

Mr. RAKER. That being so, ought we not to have business men enough who could handle the shipping activities, or the various functions now performed by the Shipping Board, that could make this merchant marine a success if conditions revive in the next six months or a year?

Mr. GERNERD. I believe we have the best business minds in the world; but as the President of the United States said in his address, there are laws on the statute books that make it impossible for that business ingenuity to utilize the business opportunities that we have from the standpoint of shipping. I am not criticizing the wisdom of those laws. It is a condition and a fact, and I have listened here for three days to arguments, and no one has said that he is willing to revoke those laws. They are willing to extend them—

Mr. RAKER. No one has yet pointed out wherein the law is deficient or wherein the law prohibits the Shipping Board from making this American fleet a success.

Mr. GERNERD. I grant you that.

Mr. RAKER. Now, that being the case, why should America practically give away this fleet until it has honestly tried to make a success of the ships that we have which have cost us $3,000,000,000 or more?

Mr. GERNERD. Of course, there seems to be a cleavage in the minds of some men as to whether they want Government ownership and operation of this fleet or whether it is to be operated by private enterprise. Japan, England, France, and Germany all have merchant fleets which are operated by individual enterprise. Why does England find it necessary to pay subsidies even to her own great merchant fleet when she has been the leading maritime nation of the world for years? If she is obliged to do it, when she has really carried the commerce of the world, then why shall we, who are just novices in the game—for we are really starting out as pioneers—how can we expect to do better than England when she has reached the acme of the shipping business? To my mind Japan furnishes a splendid example of what a little nation can do. What is she doing? She is building up a merchant marine, and her Government is giving every aid and assistance that she can to the private operators of her merchant marine, and she guarantees to them a profit of 6 per cent—a profit, mind you, not an operating cost of 6 per cent. But all her ships have to be designed according to the plans of the naval board of the Japanese Navy, so that they can be converted, almost at an instant's notice, into transports for her troops.

I regard this as a wise policy. It is foresight. I think the United States, with her many interests and important possessions in the Pacific, with the Hawaiian Islands, as beautiful as they are and productive as they are going to be, and the Philippine Islands, our outposts of civilization, where for the first time in centuries modern ideas are being taught by American school-teachers, should carry her own commerce in her own ships and not have Japan do it for her. If we desire to be a Christianizing nation, if we wish to take our place alongside of England and the other Christian nations, I say to our people that the establishing and maintenance of our American merchant marine is a proposition that will bring more cheer and more real assurances to our many missionaries, who are engaged in the world's great work of spreading the gospel of peace, than any other thing that I know of. The establishment of a merchant marine is not all mercenary; it is not all dollars and cents. I believe the moral effect and influence on oriental civilization to have American boats go into Shanghai and other ports of China will be an inspiration to the young Chinaman of the future just as the Americans have been to the Japanese. It is less than a century ago that Japan was taken out of her long sleep, and in this short period of time has taken a foremost position among the leading nations of the world. Are we who in the early part of the eighteenth century had a merchant marine which was the equal of Great Britain and which took our cotton to Europe and helped to build up the great textile mills in Scotland now to lose the prestige on the seas which had been lost for years but now regained? Are we, on the threshold of this century, with the opportunity before us and the costly price we paid for our merchant marine, going to surrender our pride and our patriotism for fear that somebody is going to get a little benefit, a little governmental help called a subsidy? I am not afraid of the word "subsidy." It is not an evil word. If the word "subsidy" and the idea that it conveys to me is going to put our boats on the ocean highways, so that when I go to Italy and I shall be permitted to stand where I stood in 1911, in the harbor of Genoa, and can see our merchant ships flying the American flag in competition with the rest of the maritime world, I shall feel proud of the fact that by my vote I helped to keep our flag upon the seas and thereby assured our Nation's place in the onward march of civilization.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. TILSON, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 12817) to amend and supplement the merchant marine act of 1920, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

ENROLLED BILLS PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT FOR HIS APPROVAL.

Mr. RICKETTS, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that November 24 they had presented to the President of the United States for his approval the following bills:

H. R. 367. An act for the relief of J. Irving Brooks; and

H. R. 10144. An act conveying the peninsula of Presque Isle, Erie, Pa., to the State of Pennsylvania, its original owner, for public park purposes.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, the correspondence herewith presented discloses a clear failure to enforce existing income tax laws by the Secretary of the Treasury. It further presents an arrogant disregard of law by powerful business interests that should be squarely met in the interest of the general public. My letters to Mr. Mellon have laid stress on his failure or refusal to enforce section 220 of the 1921 revenue law, set forth in letter of October 23 and in the following correspondence, but the main purpose has been to present a specific illustration of the ruthless disregard of law by big business, the unconscionable profits extorted from the American people by great monopolies, now disclosed by unprecedented stock-dividend distributions in addition to previous cash dividends, and the preposterous farce that permits Treasury records and income-tax administration to remain secret, thereby encouraging fraud. When big business interests were crying most loudly against an excess-profits tax and unwilling to divide profits over the 8 per cent legal exemption, the record of enormous "melon cutting" shows that profits exacted from the public, then in times of peace, were without parallel.

Destructive criticism is valueless, and after presenting the picture of riotous profiteering and tax evasions painted by the interests themselves, I have offered tentative constructive proposals, which if enacted into law will prevent us from slipping into a destructive economic whirlpool, to be avoided in time by sane legislation and its official enforcement.

The letters are self-explanatory:

WASHINGTON, D. C., October 16, 1922.

HON. ANDREW W. MELLON,
Secretary United States Treasury Department,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. SECRETARY: I have noted that the Standard Oil Co. of New Jersey has declared a 400 per cent stock dividend on its capital and that other subsidiary members of the Standard Oil Co. are declaring various stock dividends. In this morning's Post it is claimed that United States Steel will take the same course, with a surplus estimated at several hundred million dollars.

My attention has been called to section 220 of the revenue act of 1921, which provides methods for reaching holders of surplus stock when held for the purpose of escaping taxation. Can you please advise me whether or not this statute has been invoked by your department in the case of any corporations, and whether it has been considered in reaching the surplus earnings held by the Standard Oil Co.?

Thanking you for an early reply, I am,
Very sincerely,

JAMES A. FREAR.

A GREAT LOSS IN TAXES.

On receipt of Secretary Mellon's letter, hereafter inserted, excusing his failure to impose the penalty, I wrote immediately, urging him not to be misguided because the stock-dividend decision had no relation to section 220, and that if he failed to impose penalties the Treasury would lose possibly hundreds of millions of dollars in unenforced penalties and unreleased surtaxes.

Also, a reference was made to the stock-dividend 5-to-4 decision and a plea in the name of tens of millions of gasoline users that he impose a penalty on the extortioners as disclosed by the secret records of the Treasury under his control:

WASHINGTON, D. C., October 23, 1922.

HON. ANDREW MELLON,
Secretary United States Treasury Department,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. SECRETARY: Your letter of October 20 received, in which you announce your ruling against the enforcement of section 220, which was passed by Congress to reach large surpluses accumulated by corporations in order to prevent the payment of individual surtaxes. Your letter ignores and misrepresents the plain reading and purport of the statute, and your ruling assumes the prerogatives of the Supreme Court when it sets aside this law. Section 220 is intended to reach a different situation than that involved in the Macomber decision, as I shall endeavor to show herein.

In your ruling you go far beyond any holding of the Supreme Court, and by your ruling overthrow the action of both Houses of Congress approved by the President and passed for the purpose of compelling large profits accumulated in the form of a surplus by big business to be taxed either through penalties enforced by you or by a cash distribution which would then be subject to the provision of the law affecting surtaxes.

I trust you are not under a misapprehension, Mr. Secretary, as to the question squarely presented to you because the press has been filled with announcements that the stock dividends to be issued by the Standard Oil Co. and the proposed stock dividend of $500,000,000 in United States Steel, in which you are supposed to be interested, is for the purpose of avoiding the surtaxes that would apply if these enormous amounts, aggregating over $1,000,000,000, were distributed as cash dividends.

As a great financier and public officer of large responsibilities you certainly understand that the Standard Oil surplus, reaching in the aggregate upward of a billion dollars according to reports, if permitted to be distributed as stock dividends without enforcement of law, will rob the Government Treasury, of which you are guardian, of many millions of dollars, depending upon the rate of surtax or of penalties which you are directed by law to impose.

SECRETARY MELLON ALONE EMPOWERED TO ACT.

You are the only man authorized by law to prevent such result, because the commissioner of whom you speak is an officer who acts under your direction and according to your will; otherwise you would kick him out of his position, as you no doubt ought to do. I assume you know, Mr. Secretary, that the Commissioner of Internal Revenue is under your department and under your orders, and that you have further had many discussions with him on matters of policy and of law.

The statute of 1917 to the same effect as section 220, section 3, provides: "The fact that any such corporation * * * permits gains and profits to accumulate beyond the reasonable needs of the business shall be prima facie evidence of a fraudulent purpose of escaping such tax." This provision requires the Secretary of the Treasury to interpret the law as to the reasonableness of the surplus accumulated by the corporation, and a Commissioner of Internal Revenue acts under the Secretary of the Treasury, as he is required to do in all other matters, and his act is your act under the law.

I propose to set forth the enormous profits placed in surplus by the Standard Oil Co. for the purpose of escaping taxation. The facts and reports in your department were secret, so that the country could not understand the character or amount of profits until announcement was made that they were to be distributed as stock dividends.

Naturally, as a man of great wealth, interested in 60 or more corporations which may be affected by the ruling on stock dividends and taxation, you may find your personal interest involved in any decision, but I assume in your position as a public officer you will be governed by the law and by the interests of the public rather than by any personal consideration in the enforcement of the provisions of section 220 which I ask you to enforce and which reads as follows:

"That if any corporation, however created or organized, is formed or availed of for the purpose of preventing the imposition of the surtax upon its stockholders or members through the medium of preventing its gains or profits to accumulate instead of being divided or distributed, there shall be levied and collected for each taxable year upon the net income of such corporation a tax equal to 25 per cent. The amount thereof shall be in addition to the tax imposed by section 230."

In your letter to me you say the corporation has paid its full tax. This refers, I take it, to section 280, but the penalty of 25 per cent is imposed by Congress under section 220 in order to reach unwarranted surpluses that are held by the corporation and not distributed as cash dividends in order to evade payment under the individual surtax law. That is the distinction so clearly made by Congress that it can not fairly be misunderstood. It is another way of providing a tax on undistributed profits which is undoubtedly permitted under the law and the decision of the Supreme Court in the stock-dividend case.

SECRETARY HUSTON'S DRASTIC RECOMMENDATION.

Your predecessor, Mr. Houston, Secretary of the Treasury, recently proposed to tax such undistributed profits and reach the same annual accumulation of surplus by corporations. He then estimated that for the year 1920 that tax would bring in $190,000,000 additional revenue as a corporation tax, and that the effect on individual surtaxes, which is the point in question, would bring in additional revenues of $500,000,000 for that one year, or a total tax of $690,000,000, and this was his estimate for 1921. You will note that the revenue received from individual surtaxes which would be forced out by cash dividend distributions was estimated at more than double the amount received from this tax on the corporations, and that is the point involved in the enforcement of section 220, not to reach the tax on corporation but to reach the individual surtaxes which should be released by cash dividends not held as surplus, thereafter escaping taxation.

You have been opposed to the Houston tax proposal as a matter of principle on the theory, as I understand it, that the corporation ought not to be further taxed or its surplus distribution enforced. It was also on this theory, as I understand, that you lent your powerful influence last year to the repeal of the excess-profits tax on corporate profits of over 8 per cent, which at that time was bringing into the Treasury Department $450,000,000 or more per year.

In other words, your efforts to protect the Government Treasury in the past have not been directed toward collecting a tax upon large and powerful corporations, and in the present emergency your action in overruling the express act of Congress will result in a loss to the Treasury of an amount reaching several hundred million dollars annually, depending upon the rates of surtax as estimated by Secretary Houston.

Your suggestion that it is a corporation "formed" for the purpose of evading the law is not in any way involved. Whenever a corporation has been "availed of" for this same purpose it becomes a case where Congress directs the penalty to be invoked.

WHAT PROFITS ARE SUBJECT TO PENALTY?

In the case of the Standard Oil, United States Steel, and other companies, whose records are subject to your inspection—and yours alone, because they are secret—will you please give your views to the country, stating just what amount of extortionate profits and surplus you believe should properly be amassed before section 220 of the statute enacted by Congress applies, or do you hold that such statute is nugatory under the plea that the corporations have already been taxed?

I fear you are unwittingly aiding in a gigantic fraud upon the Government Treasury, which I do not believe you would countenance if familiar with the purpose of the statute.

Many thousands of farmers to-day in this country have relinquished their farms during the past year because they can not make ends meet, and their heavy debts compel such course. Hundreds of thousands of farms will be sold this year for taxes, for the same reason. Millions of farmers in the aggregate with a small average income and with only 60 per cent purchase power compared with pre-war prices are unable to make a net profit of 6 per cent on their farms. Yet they are confronted with the fact that oil used in running their tractors, their separators, and various other farm machinery, together with the steel purchased in various farm implements, has all returned an annual net profit running from 25 per cent to 100 per cent, according to the press, and that due to your proposed action this enormous surplus to be distributed in the form of stock dividends will escape a surtax which properly ought to be paid to the extent of hundreds of millions of dollars, thus enhancing the enormous profits of a few to the injury of the many, who have equal interests in our Government and are expected to have equal protection under its laws.

Let us here briefly set forth the surplus earnings of the Standard Oil, which is gathered from the press reports of which you have inside information through the secret documents in your possession and can easily verify such statements.

On October 11 of this year the press states that stocks of the Standard Oil subsidiaries have increased in value this year $1,060,944,532. This increase is reported from 31 of the 33 companies of the Standard Oil. During the last three weeks it was also stated that oil stocks have soared through expectation of huge stock dividends in some of the leading companies.

"This expectation has been gratified in the companies of Standard Oil of New York, which declared a $150,000,000 stock dividend, and 100 per cent dividend in the California company, with like dividends with other branches. The Standard Oil Co. of New Jersey showed an appreciation of $253,000,000 over the year's low price for its stock, and apart from 20 per cent cash dividend this company has accumulated $592,000,000, or nearly six times the amount of its common stock, which is to be distributed in a stock dividend." I have the published list of the 31 Standard Oil companies mentioned and if correct it bears out the truth of both statements.

OVERRULING AN ACT OF CONGRESS.

Can you, Mr. Secretary, overrule an express act of Congress when the following statement is offered you, quoted from the press of October 5?

"One of the biggest dividends in history was declared by the Standard Oil of California, which is reported to have the largest earnings of any oil company last year. One hundred per cent stock dividend will be paid the last day of the year at a par value of $25. This stock sold on the New York Stock Exchange Monday at $120, and the dividend amounts to $115,000,000 value based on the New York sales."

The article further states that the oil disbursements this year are estimated to reach $580,000,000. It is significant that the Standard Oil of California is the one on which the Supreme Court decision on stock dividends was originally based, and to which I will refer.

I will not discuss the question of extortionate and unconscionable profits, which amount will be apparent even to you, but I quote from the rulings of your department on section 220, appearing in the revenue act of 1918, wherein it is stated, article 352, that the application of 220 of the statute depends upon two elements.

(a). Purpose to escape surtaxes, (b) unreasonable accumulation of gains and profits. Prima facie evidence of (a) exists * * * where a company permits its gains and profits to accumulate beyond the reasonable needs of the business.

Article 353 of the act of 1918 holds the accumulation of gains and profits as unreasonable if it is not required for the needs and purposes of the business, considering all circumstances of the case. * * * The need of the investment of gains and profits is immaterial if they are not in fact needed in the business.

With this specific interpretation of the law by your own department for enforcement by your own regulations and rules, can you, in view of the facts regarding the enormous profits made by the Standard Oil which have been set aside as surplus for the purpose of escaping individual surtax, say that you will refuse to enforce the penalty provided by Congress?

NO COMPANIES WERE INTERROGATED.

Again I quote from the press, all of which articles are for your inspection and verification if desired, that "no corporation has yet submitted its case to the commissioner, so far as known (to ascertain its liability under section 220)." In the same article it states that other concerns reputed to have made large profits this year "are corporations in the nonunion coal, iron, steel, oil, lumber, and building-construction materials industry."

Again quoting, "Most conspicuous in this practice is the United States Steel Corporation, which is known to have enjoyed an extremely prosperous year thus far. The last annual financial statement of that corporation discloses an accumulated profit surplus of nearly $500,000,000." It is the general impression, whether well founded or not, Mr. Secretary, that in many of these vast interests about to declare dividends you have financial interests that desire protection, and I urge upon you in your public capacity as an official to set at rest any criticisms that might arise, and that you declare, as you were expected by Congress to declare, that the penalties provided by law be imposed before these stock dividends are allowed to be distributed.

I now come to the Macomber decision of the Supreme Court to which you refer and with which I am familiar. It is found in the case of Eisner v. Macomber (252 U. S. Reports) and arose from a distribution of stock dividends in 1916 by the Standard Oil Co. of California, which then sought, as it now seeks, to escape taxation through a stock-dividend distribution.

In that case it was held by a majority of one member of the court, with Justices Brandeis, Clark, Holmes, and Day dissenting, that such dividends were not taxable. In that opinion Justice Pitney says, among other things, "reexamination of the question with the additional light thrown upon it of elaborate arguments," etc., influenced the decision. The first counsel named in the case, Mr. Charles E. Hughes, now Secretary of State, of national eminence and ability, made an argument which, however elaborate and enlightening, did not convince the four dissenting judges from whom I briefly quote because of its direct application to the situation before us.

Justice Holmes, dissenting, said: "The word 'incomes' in the sixteenth amendment (to the Constitution) should be read in the sense most obvious to the common understanding at the time of its adoption. * * * The known purpose of this amendment was to get rid of nice questions as to what might be direct taxes, and I can not doubt that most people, not lawyers, would suppose when they voted for it that they put the question like the present at rest. I am of opinion that the amendment justifies the tax." "Justice Day concurs."

Justice Holmes states that "most people" when they voted for the amendment believed it applied to stock dividends, and also no doubt the four dissenting judges of the Supreme Court believed the same.

FOUR JUSTICES FILED VIGOROUS PROTESTS IN MACOMBER CASE.

The dissenting opinions of Justice Brandeis and Justice Clark in equally positive language state "If stock dividends representing profits are held exempt from taxation under the sixteenth amendment, the owners of the most successful businesses in America will be able to escape taxation on a large part of what is actually their income. So far as their profits are represented by stock received as dividends they will pay these taxes not upon their income but only upon the income of their income. That such a result was intended by the people of the United States when adopting the sixteenth amendment is inconceivable. Our sole duty is to ascertain their intent as therein expressed."

Mr. Secretary, the effect of your action in refusing to invoke section 220 is not only to prevent the clear imposition of the law enacted to reach the present situation in cutting enormous financial melons but for all time it confines a tax paid by such stockholders to their "income on their income," as quoted by Justice Brandeis. Again quoting from the dissenting opinion, "It is but a decent respect due the wisdom, the integrity, and the patriotism of the legislative body by which any law is passed to presume in favor of its validity until its violation of the Constitution is proved beyond all reasonable doubt."

I call your attention to this last provision, approved by four justices of the Supreme Court, and point out that by your proposed action you will do what four justices of the Supreme Court hesitated to do in that case, ignore a decent respect due to the wisdom, the integrity, and patriotism of Congress. I can not believe from the decision to which attention has been called that the Supreme Court will hold as unconstitutional section 220, because it is based on an entirely different state of affairs from that set forth by the stock dividend decision.

Among the facts stated in the decision it was recited that the Standard Oil Co. of Indiana had increased its capital stock from $1,000,000 to $30,000,000 in a comparatively short period and paid a stock dividend of 2,900 per cent.

Again, the Standard Oil Co. of Nebraska had also increased its holdings and issued stock dividends, and the Standard Oil Co. of Kentucky within a period of four years had increased its capital stock from $1,000,000 to $6,000,000. I call your attention to the fact that the enormous surplus recently reported by the Standard Oil Co. of over $1,000,000,000 has been based upon enormous capitalization caused by stock dividends heretofore issued by the same companies, and that unless some action is taken by the Government pursuant to the laws of the country that these great interests and others that to-day are controlling prices, profits, and press, and to a large extent legislation will indeed be supreme.

When that time arrives, and it would seem to be almost here, if such decisions as yours are to become substituted as the law of the land for those covered by Congress, we may well believe that the people of the country, in whose hands lies the decision, will lose confidence in their officers, their courts, and their form of government under which we live. I am only seeking in a modest way to point out to you the dangers of such decisions as you write me you propose to invoke setting aside section 220, a law passed by Congress for the purpose of meeting an exigency such as confronts the country to-day.

A COUNTRY HALF TAXED AND HALF FREE.

The language of ex-President Harrison was significant when he said, "Lincoln's startling declaration that this country could not continue to exist half slave and half free may be paraphrased to-day by saying that this country can not continue to exist half taxed and half tax free." When enormous aggregations of wealth escape taxation through the extortion of unconscionable profits, thereby creating enormous surpluses, which are to be issued as stock dividends for the purpose of escaping taxation, I submit that the situation presented by ex-President Harrison is one of deep concern to the country.

Publicity that will disclose such investments and such enormous profits and the efforts to evade taxation by those best able to pay will help curb the evil and will enable Congress by constitutional amendments affecting tax-free securities as such through legislation as may be desired, and also, if need be, to enact a law affecting undistributed profits in addition to the reenactment of excess profits law.

In addition to all this, of course, the country has a right to place in position high officials who will enforce the laws already on the statute books, and I trust, Mr. Secretary, that you will remain among this number, and that you will reconsider your ruling which may cause a loss of hundreds of millions of dollars taxation to the Treasury without any possibility of recovering the same.

In conclusion, I repeat what I recently stated when writing my first letter of inquiry, that the "administration of the law lies with Secretary Mellon, whose absolute honesty is not questioned in following the strict letter of the law; but Mr. Mellon is quoted by Klein to be worth $300,000,000, which, if reasonably accurate, should yield an annual income of about $15,000,000 or more annually, while his daily income of $50,000 is several times his annual salary as Secretary of the Treasury. Whether Mr. Mellon avails himself of the same avenues of income tax escape as Mr. Rockefeller is only known to the Secretary of the Treasury, who has the records, and what is true of Mr. Rockefeller and Secretary Mellon is equally true of many of the 20,000 individual income-tax payers whose annual incomes are supposed to run from $50,000 to $200,000,000 each, if correct reports are to be had.

These records, I submit, in all fairness should be made public by law, and I trust you will cooperate in securing that result.

Very sincerely,

JAMES A. FREAR.

WHY EVADE THE ISSUE?

When Secretary Mellon was pressed to impose the tax penalty that for some unknown reason he refused to enforce, the Treasury press bureau that keeps up a constant chatter over what the Secretary intends to do sent word broadcast that the Treasury was about to urge the passage of a law preventing the issuance of tax-free securities. This looked singularly like a smoke screen, because a bird in the hand was found in section 220, reaching eventually possibly hundreds of millions of dollars' income to the Treasury, whereas over $10,000,000,000 are invested in tax-free securities that can not be reached, and it will take many years to pass a constitutional amendment, with accompanying approval or required number of States, even if ever secured. This proposal was smothered last session. Where was the Treasury then? I urged its passage.

These matters were presented to Secretary Mellon in the following letter:

WASHINGTON, D. C., October 26, 1922.

HON. ANDREW W. MELLON,
Secretary United States Treasury Department,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. SECRETARY: On October 23 I wrote you expressing a hope that you would reconsider your announced ruling which sets aside section 220 of the revenue law passed in 1921, to reach a fraudulent diversion of corporation profits to an amount estimated at several hundred million dollars in increased income-tax payments to the Federal Treasury. You, of course, are charged with the administration of this law and any failure on your part to enforce its provisions will, according to estimates afforded by the press, rob the Treasury of tax receipts due on surplus corporate profits which are estimated to reach the enormous amount of over $2,000,000,000 in 1921—the surplus, not the tax imposed.

This surplus of corporation profits, reaching from 25 to 100 per cent annually, will in the case of Standard Oil alone aggregate over $1,000,000,000, according to the press, a large part of which has been set aside instead of being distributed in order to escape surtaxes otherwise due the Government from individual stockholders. There can be no reasonable question about the meaning of the law which I have quoted to you, and with which you are familiar, nor of the fraudulent purpose to evade individual income-tax payments through the issuance of stock dividends. You are directed by law to exact penalties when evidence of undue surplus for business purposes exists to an amount of penalties alone that is assumed to reach over $200,000,000, a conservative estimate under the retroactive provision of the statute.

Believing it my duty to urge your attention as strongly as I can to this evasion of taxes, that you may not later on mistake the full official responsibility for the enormous loss to the Treasury, I again write to point out the apparently defenseless position, in my judgment, you have taken and to suggest that your action may involve a serious economic and political mistake, apart from its failure to perform a plain official duty required of you by law.

On October 23 you gave to the press a statement regarding your purposes regarding tax-exempt securities, which according to Treasury Department practices I predicted would be done in order to distract attention from the requested execution of section 220 of the revenue law. Your statement was significant, however, because it cuts the ground from under any attempted subterfuge regarding enforcement of section 220. It intimates you will not impose penalties under any circumstances however fraudulent or howsoever flagrant the effort to evade taxes may be, although absolutely directed so to do by that section. Let me quote from your statement given to the press October 23:

"Reenactment of the excess-profits tax has its advocates in both branches of Congress, but this is opposed by the administration, as is also the proposition to tax undivided surplus of corporations."

President Harding signed the revenue law of 1921 containing section 220, directing that penalties be imposed, and surely he is not the "administration" you refer to in refusing to enforce that section which has been interpreted by your Treasury regulations, article 353, to mean:

"ART. 353. The accumulation (by corporations) of gains and profits is unreasonable if it is not required for the needs and purposes of the business." * * * "The need of the investment of gains and profits is immaterial if they are not in fact needed in the business."

An announced purpose in financial journals to distribute a large part of over $1,000,000,000 surplus in stock dividends by Standard Oil in order to avoid payment of individual surtaxes through a cash distribution is certainly known to you, and you alone of all men have control of the secret official records that evidence that fact. Will you refuse to enforce section 220, passed by Congress in 1921, under a plea that the administration is opposed to tax the undivided surplus of corporations?

I leave that statement to your own sense of justice in view of a law passed during your own incumbency in office, approved by the President, and which you are required by such law to enforce.

WHAT HAS MR. MELLON DONE OR WILL HE DO?

Your statement that you will urge upon Congress the passage of an amendment to prevent issuance of tax-free securities is noted. During last session I urged passage of such an amendment through the committee and through the House. It failed. What did you do apart from giving it your official approval, and what will you do next session toward its passage that you failed to do in the last? The publication of your statement, I fear, was to sidetrack the issue of penalties now due under the law.

You know, and so do the people generally, that it is impossible constitutionally to get any tax-free amendment through Congress in any form to reach the many billions of State and municipal securities on the market, and that it will take several years under the most favorable conditions to get any kind of an amendment enacted into law. You are only announcing with some gusto that you will ask Congress to lock the door after about all the horses have escaped. Why didn't you do before what you say you will do now?

It is a convenient explanation for failure to reach the tax-exempt security amendment, but I am asking why you do not enforce tax penalties now due on corporations by enforcing a release of "fraudulently" held surpluses which may bring to the Treasury in the aggregate several hundred million dollars in tax receipts? A surplus of over a billion dollars now held by Standard Oil alone and over $500,000,000 by United States Steel, according to the press, is awaiting early distribution as stock dividends largely for the purpose of escaping individual surtax payments. Will you permit it to escape the legal penalty?

Paying tribute to the exactions of the oil king to-day are over 10,000,000 users of business and pleasure cars throughout the country, and whether the price of oil be 10 cents or 20 cents per gallon more than is a fair price to the corporation, the consumer pays the price exacted. Profits of over 400 per cent on the stock, apart from cash dividends paid, indicates the character of the extortion. Millions of farmers who run tractors, separators, and other farm machinery in like manner pay full tribute exacted by the king. The user of oil not only pays the plunder price but also any increased tax burden caused by every enforced tax-dodging stockholder reaching an amount among nine figures.

FAILURE TO PENALIZE THROWS BURDEN ON HONEST TAXPAYERS.

Some one must pay the tax to run our Government, and apart from assessments according to ability to pay, if the burden is shifted or evaded by the oil stockholder through the "fraudulent" handling of surplus by the corporation under the department's definition of the statute, the remaining taxpayers of the country must make good any Treasury deficit reported by you, Mr. Secretary, either in the form of increased tax rates or from other sources. That is to say, the consumers pay the extortionate price of the oil, and their own tax, together with any deficit caused by the oil stockholders' escape.

In the name of 10,000,000 car owners and of many millions of farmers and countless others who use oil now controlled by Standard Oil, I urge you to impose penalties on the subsidiary companies mentioned in my letter of October 23 and thereby release a large part of the surplus profits estimated to have been accumulated by this company to the amount of over $1,000,000,000.

May I extend the list, Mr. Secretary, and ask in the names of the many millions of people of all vocations and parties, whom you equally represent as Secretary of the Treasury, and in the name of right dealing and common fairness will you not compel these great public evaders of taxes to comply with the tax laws of the land through the power vested in you under section 220?

In view of your understood statement in your letter to me, that you have never assessed a penalty under section 220 or sought to reach by taxation the fraudulent accumulation of surplus by corporations mentioned by statute, and also the failure on your part to indicate what surplus or what accumulations you personally would consider "fraudulent," notwithstanding an interpretation by statute and by your department, which I have quoted in a previous letter, I desire to ask you a question which under the circumstances I trust is not inquisitive or impertinent, because you alone have access to the income-tax reports of persons and corporations required by law to be kept secret.

SECRETARY MELLON'S COMPANIES.

Stated briefly, have any of the 60 or more corporations of which you were an officer prior to assuming the duties of Secretary of the Treasury announced or indicated a purpose this year of issuing stock dividends from the accumulations of surplus by such corporations? Have any of such corporations during the past five years averaged a net surplus apart from cash dividends of over 10 per cent annually. Have any of such corporations during the same period averaged 50 per cent annually or more, apart from cash dividends, or approaching an amount understood to have been averaged by some of the Standard Oil subsidiaries to which I called your attention in my last letter?

I do not ask the specific amounts nor rates, nor your individual interest, beyond a further query that if such surpluses have been set aside have you declared a penalty due on the surplus so accumulated by any such corporation, or do you expect to do so under the provisions of section 220? If not, what profits would you hold subject to a penalty, if any?

I do not believe you will refuse to enforce the law, Mr. Secretary, when its purpose is fully understood by you, but the effect of your decision ought to be well considered. The amount involved as estimated reaches a tremendous loss to the Treasury of hundreds of millions of dollars unless you impartially enforce the law, and will have a greater and more far-reaching influence on the country than you seem to appreciate, so I again ask you to reconsider your ruling on section 220 and again urge that the provisions of the 1921 law be enforced by you.

Very sincerely,

JAMES A. FREAR.

DOES "OIL" RULE THE GOVERNMENT?

It will be noted that Secretary Mellon was asked what profits his own companies had accumulated as surplus. The directness of this inquiry will later appear in these letters. A restatement of the law imposing penalties was deemed necessary in the following letter, and after referring to the unconscionable profits extorted by the Standard Oil Co. I called Secretary Mellon's attention to the tremendous power now wielded by this great oil monopoly that embraces Mexico, Central America, Teapot Dome, and far away Mesopotamia. Where goes the Standard Oil driller, there goes the flag and the Army and Navy, according to Cabinet members.

What is true of oil control in this country is equally true across the sea in England, where it is also under scrutiny.

The next letter is as follows:

OCTOBER 29, 1922.

HON. ANDREW W. MELLON,

Secretary United States Treasury Department,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. SECRETARY: On October 16 and again on October 23 and October 26 I wrote you asking if you, as Secretary of the Treasury, acting through the Commissioner of Internal Revenue in your department, had enforced section 220, revenue act 1921, enacted by Congress to reach "fraudulent" accumulations of surpluses by corporations in order to escape individual surtaxes. In those letters I urged that you, as the "watch dog of the Treasury," were expected by Congress when enacting the law to enforce the penalty and save an impending loss to the Treasury of several hundred million dollars, according to estimates. That was the law's purpose.

Your only answer, received on October 20, states nothing has been done by you under section 220, that the "commissioner" is the official authorized by the law to act, and in effect that the stock-dividend decision of the Supreme Court several years ago renders nugatory section 220, relating to penalties.

I have consistently tried to prevent you from falling into such a serious error whether due to any unconscious influence of your own individual interests or advice of others that may later be discussed, and I still maintain that while you are understood to be interested as a former official in over 60 corporations, including United States Steel, that announces a proposed stock dividend distribution of $500,000,000, it will not influence your decision as a public officer. Further that your reputed wealth, according to Klein, of $300,000,000 with a possible daily income of $50,000, places you in a position where you can unquestionably prove that your official act is independent of any personal interest.

Let me briefly again quote from section 220, law of 1921: "If any corporation, however created, * * * is availed of for the purpose of preventing the imposition of the surtax on its stockholders or members through the medium of permitting its gains or profits to accumulate instead of being divided or distributed, there shall be levied and collected for each taxable year upon the net income of such corporation a tax equal to 25 per cent in addition to the (regular corporation) tax imposed by section 230."

You will readily perceive that the stock-dividend decision has no more relation to the law of 1921 than an edict of Mohammed. I have pointed out this fact heretofore by liberal quotations, including one from your own Treasury regulations, which reads, article 253:

"The accumulation of gains and profits is unreasonable if it is not required for the needs and purposes of the business, considering all the circumstances of the case. * * * The need of the investment of gains and profits is immaterial if they are not in fact needed in the business."

This is a plain statement by your department showing section 220 bears no relation to the stock-dividend decision affecting dividends when distributed. The rule of law that full credit is to be given by every administrative official to the law, in this case passed by the present Congress and signed by your present chief, certainly applies to you, however great or powerful you may deem your present position to be.

The only question, then, is what facts are before you that call for the imposition of a penalty under section 220. As hundreds of millions of dollars in taxes are involved, I feel it my duty to present the matter as fully as my imperfect powers will permit.

EXTORTIONATE OIL PROFITS DISCLOSED.

On October 11 the press stated the stock of the Standard Oil subsidiaries had increased in value this year $1,060,944,522. This increase was reported from 31 of the 33 subsidiaries. That the Standard Oil of New York had declared a stock dividend of $150,000,000, and the Standard Oil of New Jersey, apart from 20 per cent paid in cash dividends, had accumulated $592,000,000, or nearly six times the amount of its common stock, and had declared a 400 per cent stock dividend; that Standard Oil of California, on a par value stock of $25, now worth $128, had reported a stock dividend of $115,000,000.

I am only discussing oil stocks, although others require equal attention through the secret official reports in your department known only to you. One week ago, October 23, Standard Oil stocks, for illustration, sold on the New York stock market at: Indiana, 127; Kentucky, 110; Ohio, 331; So. Ohio, 540; So. Kansas, 593; New York, 570; Prairie Oil & Gas, 670; Vacuum Oil, 655. The latter company reports, for illustration, on a $15,000,000 stock, apart from $11,400,000 cash dividends paid in the past, a surplus of $67,000,000. Of like character are profits reported by Mexican Petroleum, Pan American, and Doheny oil interests generally.

The law of 1917 certainly declares to be "fraudulent" evidence of setting aside of surplus, if any sane reading applies to that law and to the profits I have quoted.

You say in your letter to me of October 20 that the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, in the case of the New Jersey Standard Oil Co., "has found no evidence of the accumulation of surplus beyond the reasonable needs of the business." As the commissioner's findings are yours, I remind you that according to the press quoted in my former letter of October 23, "No corporation has yet submitted its case to the commissioner, so far as known." Is that correct? Your secret records will show.

If the commissioner has not asked any company for any statement, and if this New Jersey company, apart from cash dividends, has accumulated $592,000,000, or nearly six times the amount of its capital stock, in the name of conscience, which is supposed to have some place in your department, notwithstanding ugly reports in my possession concerning the commissioner's office, I ask, What do you understand was the purpose of Congress in passing section 220? Mr. Secretary, if you should suddenly resign your present portfolio, can you conceive it possible for any successor of yours or of your commissioner to view this remarkable situation without concern?

SEVEN MILLION INCOME-TAX PAYERS CONCERNED.

The purpose of issuing stock dividends to avoid payment of individual surtaxes will never be more flagrantly evidenced in the history of the country than now, and your failure to impose any penalty on the Standard Oil Co. will arouse more widespread concern than you seem to realize. What explanation can you make, Mr. Secretary, satisfactory to the 7,000,000 of income-tax payers of the country who pay their taxes according to law and are faced with this attempt to escape over a hundred million dollars in income taxes by one company, whether through a financial and political power exerted by that company or because of the shrewdness of its officers is immaterial.

In this connection I submit that Standard Oil is the best argument that can be offered for the reenactment of the excess-profits law, which was right in principle, according to many tax experts, but which you and other large business men asked to have repealed last session. Your aid in securing that repeal saved these gigantic companies large payments of taxes, that from all sources brought $450,000,000 tax to the Treasury in 1921. Doleful tales last year of corporate profits do not measure up with the average yearly profits now reported to have been maintained by oil and steel, all of which were known to you from the secret records in your department. What can be said regarding the sudden announcement of these oil and steel companies after several years of enormous profits that they now disclose by their books? Does it not seem a strange and striking coincidence that the announcements were held up until the excess-profits tax was repealed?

GASOLINE DROPS 1½ CENTS.

A strange coincidence representing over a million dollars saved daily to consumers and other data, occurred on October 26, the date of my third and last preceding letter to you, published quite generally in New York papers the same morning. In the afternoon Washington Star, same date, page 28, column 5, three leading notices strangely follow each other: First, "No change in crude-oil prices"; next, "Standard Oil to-day reduces price of gasoline 1½ cents per gallon"; next, "Aluminum Co. of America 78, 1933, 106½ bid."

No common stock quoted on market. All of which is interesting, if not significant.

Several chapters of interesting reading would be disclosed if the true inwardness of these stock-dividend announcements at this time was made public, and I again urge you, as some slight means of avoiding the enormous Treasury loss affected by the excess-profits tax repeal that you impose the 25 per cent penalty on surpluses found to be "not in fact needed in the business."

Government by Standard Oil and United States Steel will not be a matter of fiction if these great combinations of wealth are able to put aside between them a billion and a half dollars in surplus for the purpose of escaping the payment of individual surtaxes without any imposition of the law provided by Congress in 1921 to reach such "fraudulent" efforts, and at a time when the humblest citizen is obliged to pay every penny of his tax.

Letters and words of commendation for calling these facts to your attention have come from actuaries, attorneys, and leading Members of Congress to the effect that this matter will not be settled until settled right. Frankly, no better argument can be offered for the necessity of passing a law directly to reach all undistributed profits of corporations; for the reenactment of an excess-profits tax law; for an increased inheritance tax law, and for absolute publicity of the secret income-tax records of your department.

STANDARD OIL'S SUPREME POWER.

How far Standard Oil and its oil associates control this Government and threaten our relations with others may not be part of a discussion of its refusal to pay legitimate taxes due the Government, but I believe it not amiss briefly to call your attention to its recognized power to-day.

Standard Oil fixes absolutely the price for 10,000,000 of car users of oil in this country, for millions of farmers who use tractors and other farm machinery and for every large industry and every municipality that uses oil. No law can reach the price or the rate of profits or apparently the tax that should be paid by this octopus company.

The most eloquent pleader before the Supreme Court in the Stock Dividend case, who won to his views the fifth and deciding justice, now in his present position as a Cabinet officer of great ability and distinction, has just secured for Standard Oil and other American oil interests a right to 10 per cent of Mesopotamia's oil fields. If Turkey protests and refuses the demands of Standard Oil it remains for the Government to use force to carry out the demands of any Secretary of State, and force means an army and navy with which to fight the battles of private oil corporations.

Notwithstanding Washington's past and prospective world peace conferences, your close associates, Secretaries Weeks and Denby, are constantly quoted in the press in favor of a larger Army and Navy with which to meet foreign complications, the greatest of which appears to lie in protecting Standard Oil's various foreign developments and exploiting activities. Would it not, Mr. Secretary, be a matter of partial justice to compel Standard Oil to pay its full share of taxes with which to build any extra $40,000,000 battleships thus needed and to pay the extra men assumed to be required for the protection of private oil exploitations? In other words, why not let "John" and not "George" do it?

PHILIPPINE INDEPENDENCE DEPENDS ON OIL.

It is regarded as an open secret in many quarters that Philippine independence or the date of our release of the islands depends in part upon the result of Standard Oil exploitations in the islands. This statement made in the press may fairly be assumed to have some basis of fact.

I do not pretend to say just what part Standard Oil has played with existing and past strained relations between this Government and Mexico, but that oil and oil alone has been one great source of friction leading to violence and governmental interference by us with Mexico is a matter of history. Oil is the inspiration for such differences, whether Sinclair, that is reputed to be controlled by Standard Oil, or Pierce Oil or Doheny Oil, all of which stand together for mutual interests and level prices that are always maintained. In like manner, Central American countries can tell the same tale of our private oil exploitations and other activities there which affect our relations with the weaker countries at the south who have little voice in the control of their own countries.

Secretary Fall and the Teapot Dome "deal," to use no stronger term, is of recent date, and I am informed that 300 newspapers are advertising 9,320 acres known as naval petroleum reserve No. 3 in Wyoming; that oil wells there are flowing between 10,000 and 20,000 barrels per day and the Salt Creek field, of which this is a part, is producing 150,000 barrels per day. Shares are being sold by the Mammoth Oil Co. (Standard Oil controlled) that have no par value but have brought to the manipulators of the deal somewhere around $90,000,000 and that the Government has lost between $15,000,000 and $20,000,000, due to the low rate of royalties.

I can not vouch for the correctness of all these reports, but the one outstanding figure on the public mind is that another leading Cabinet official should have permitted this lease, sale, or gift to a powerful company that lays its hands on American and European fields with equal certainty; that places Mexico and all Central American Governments in a virtual state of subjection by our Government, and as a last evidence of its power after receiving a stock-dividend decision several years ago, in the California Standard Oil case, by a bare majority of one justice in the highest court in the land, again comes into public notice through its resistance of law and of any effort by Congress to compel a disgorging of a small part of its unconscionable profits which rests for its protection with your department, Mr. Secretary.

It has been common practice to denounce oil and steel magnates and to place them in a class with Jesse James and Captain Kidd and other buccaners, with a limousine polish brought down to date. All these men may have hold-up records of their own, each in his particular specialty, but I am not concerned with their acts or attitude, past or present. I am only presenting to you facts in my possession and the law and ask if any failure to impose the penalty on these interests or others that may be culpable owners, will the responsible officer be held blameless for permitting plunderers to escape scot free?

Let me say frankly, Mr. Secretary, I do not believe the question is one for which any political party alone can be held responsible, but the principal actor on the stage now is yourself and I trust you will not place your party and the country in a defenseless position by any failure to enforce the law. Again I repeat, I do not believe upon reexamination of the law and the facts you will refuse to impose the penalty.

Sincerely yours,

JAMES A. FREAR.

OUR OIL DIPLOMACY.

Great statesmen at both ends of the Capitol who rage over the League of Nations, and those who criticize the four-power treaty, I ask of them what is more serious as a matter of Government policy than the following extract from the Washington Post of November 23. Found in an inconspicuous place, it notifies us that we are kept from knowing the true facts regarding Standard Oil and our relations with foreign governments due to smothering of facts.

Not content with fleecing the American public out of a 775 per cent net profit on its capitalization in 10 years, or $775,000,000, the Standard Oil Company reaches out with its demands all over the world in the name of the Nation. Then, after provoking international entanglements that invite armed intervention, this same company boosts its profits by increasing the price of oil to Government vessels within 30 days over 30 per cent, as I have shown in these letters.

October 26, as stated in my last letter to Mr. Mellon, the Exchange stated: "No change in crude-oil prices," yet Uncle Sam has just been stuck for a 30 per cent increase by Standard Oil on a large naval fuel purchase made on November 14 with a 50 cents per barrel increase. We have given away our oil fields to these companies, and may well say "And you, too, Brutus."

Read the latest news of this infant industry:

AMERICANS' OIL RIGHTS GUARDED AT LAUSANNE—AMBASSADOR CHILD WILL DEMAND OPEN DOOR IN MOSUL FIELDS FOR NATIONALS.

[By Henry Wales.]
(Special cable dispatch.)

LAUSANNE, November 22.—Determined efforts to bottle up all the news of what is going on at the Near East peace conference are being made by the French and British. The latest suggestion is that the delegates and all persons attached to the conference shall be forbidden to converse with newspaper men. The communique, which is given out daily by a committee composed of French, British, and Italians, is becoming smaller and smaller.

Ambassador R. W. Child, the American observer, stated to-day that when the Mosul oil fields come up for discussion by the conference he will enunciate the American Government's policy and will demand an open door there the same as in other mandated territory where there are oil fields.

It is understood that the American observers have been instructed by the State Department to safeguard the interests of the Standard Oil Co. in Mesopotamia and not to accept without a protest any disposition by the British of the country's fabulously valuable oil deposits.—(Copyright, 1922, by the Chicago Tribune.)

November 26 the press carried another threat by this country if Standard Oil rights to develop the Turks' country are not respected. We threaten the Turk to protect a questionable right of an oil company and stuff cotton in our ears when Armenians ask equal protection. Doubtful oil-property rights superior to humanity is the European and American policy.

On November 24, two days later, McDonald, leader of the Labor Party of 141 members, declared in the House of Commons that his country (England) is entitled to a much fuller statement of the Government's policy in the Near East, and further he asked: "Is our foreign policy to be guided by the oil interests as in the past?" What is the answer here and in England to that same question?

MR. MELLON, THE TREASURY CUSTODIAN, LEADS THE RACE.

In the next letter follow two significant articles. The first by the official organ of Standard Oil—the "Lamp"—gives the net profits of the New Jersey company for 10 years at $775,163,260, and is an eye opener to the millions who have bought "gas" and paid tribute to the monopoly for a decade.

Another quotation is more startling because it charges Secretary Mellon, the "capable Secretary of the Treasury," with instituting the mad riot that has given the country a shock not easily forgotten, because nearly every citizen has contributed to the oil extortion profits, and now we find that the man who is chosen to enforce the law is the chief offender with his Gulf Oil properties. No more grotesque maladministration of office can be imagined if these charges by reputable New York brokers are true. The letter follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., November 12, 1922.

HON. ANDREW W. MELLON,
Secretary United States Treasury Department,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. SECRETARY: I have your letter of November 2 stating that you have received my several letters and that you pointed out in your previous letter: "The declaration of a stock dividend has no significance under section 220, and in any case where the section applies the department can proceed with its enforcement quite as well after as before the declaration of a stock dividend. The Treasury is diligently enforcing section 220, according to its terms, in every case where applicable but can not, of course, extend the law to cover matters beyond its scope."

I thank you for your letter, and will say in no way have I sought to urge that a stock dividend was taxable, but I am presenting to you, based on information not heretofore given to the public, the following statement by the official publication of Standard Oil Co., the Lamp:

"In the years from 1912 to 1921, inclusive, the company (New Jersey Standard Oil subsidiary) has shown net before taxes of $775,163,260. Of this sum $115,517,677 has been paid for taxes, $222,065,226 represents aggregate dividends, and $437,580,357 has been absorbed by the needs of the business."

This shows, if interpreted correctly, that Standard Oil of New Jersey, the subsidiary company under discussion, made in profits for 10 years 775 per cent, or 77½ per cent annually; that after paying taxes it distributed 220 per cent in cash dividends, or 22 per cent annually, to its stockholders, and in addition to this enormous profit it laid by in surpluses $437,580,357, or 44 per cent, additional profits every year.

WHAT MORE EVIDENCE COULD BE ASKED?

On this showing I ask you is it possible that you can find question in your mind regarding the imposition of penalty provided by section 220? And is it not a fact that your commissioner has failed to demand of Standard Oil a statement of its "needs in business" and has refused to enforce the penalty provided in section 220, acting under your advice in the matter? Is it not prima facie evidence that the purpose of setting aside 437 per cent surplus in 10 years by Standard Oil was to prevent the imposition of the individual surtax on its stockholders? If you claim it is not, then, indeed, Congress has a duty to perform in reaching by law the undistributed surplus that thus avoids individual surtaxes.

This evidence of extortion that I am calling your attention to, and when enormous surpluses are placed beyond the reach of individual surtaxes it seems a stretch of imagination to say that all such surpluses are exempted from the provisions of section 220.

You say that after the stock dividends are declared the statute still applies. I ask you frankly why it should not apply before the dividends are declared when the evidence has been submitted? And I further ask you in all sincerity what cases, if any, have been required by you to pay a penalty under section 220? I ask this because the press states that the Commissioner of Internal Revenue has never asked the Standard Oil Co. for a statement of its "needs in business" that would reach 400 per cent surplus accumulated in 10 years. Again, I ask you what companies have been penalized, and I do not make this inquiry out of curiosity, but call your attention to "Investment Opportunities," volume 4, No. 11, November, 1922, published, I believe, in New York, which contains many blank applications for investment in Standard Oil stock, and which states in its introductory paragraph, page 1, as follows:

"Since we were last privileged to address you two dominant factors in world finances have made decisive moves. Andrew Mellon, banker, oil magnate, and capable Secretary of the Treasury, controlling the immensely wealthy Gulf Oil Corporation, inaugurated the stock dividend and melon-cutting era of 1922-23. Gulf Oil led the movement with a 200 per cent stock dividend. The stock jumped from $400 to $800.

"The Rockefellers followed immediately by deciding to distribute the Standard Oil surpluses. The Standard Oils—Kentucky, California, New Jersey, New York, and Vacuum—followed with a distribution of from 100 to 400 per cent. Nearly 30 more Standard Oils are 'possibles.' The American Radiator and National Biscuit Cos. were doubtless influenced, and also declared large stock dividends. Many others will follow.

"Our last issue indicated these possibilities (p. 5, September, 1922). The probable effect on future American markets is not exaggerated. Nothing like it has ever happened before, and is unlikely to happen again in a generation."

SECRETARY MELLON LED THE MELON CUTTING.

This startling statement, made by an investment journal and a reputable house, I take it, in New York, terms you as the very capable Secretary of the Treasury, controlling the immensely wealthy Gulf Oil Corporation that inaugurated the stock-dividend and melon-cutting era of 1922-23, when the stock of your company jumped from $400 to $800 and that Rockefeller companies simply followed your lead.

I recall your letter of October 20 in response to mine of October 16, therein announcing that you did not intend to impose any penalty under section 220 on the New Jersey Standard Oil 400 per cent stock dividend surplus. I now ask your attention to that company's published statement, herein quoted, that in 10 years, on a capitalization of $100,000,000 (Manual Statistics, 1918, p. 456), a net profit was had of $775,000,000, of which $222,000,000 was distributed in cash dividends and $437,580,000 held as surplus, or 437 per cent surplus.

Also that section 220, enacted during your term, provides: "If any corporation is . . . availed of for the purpose of preventing the imposition of the surtax upon its members by permitting its profits to accumulate instead of being divided, there shall be levied and collected for each taxable year upon the net income of such corporations a tax equal to 25 per cent in addition to the tax imposed by section 230." That prior to your own incumbency Treasury Department instructions, article 353, 1918, defined this to mean: "Unreasonable accumulations, if not required for the needs of the business, . . . the needs of the investment of profits is immaterial if they are not in fact needed in the business."

Your attention is next asked to the public statement quoted from "Investment opportunities" that "Andrew Mellon, oil magnate and capable Secretary of the Treasury, controlling the immensely wealthy Gulf Oil Corporation, inaugurated the stock-dividend and melon-cutting era of 1922-23. Gulf Oil led the movement with a 200 per cent stock dividend. The stock jumped from $400 to $800. Rockefellers followed immediately by deciding to distribute the ($1,000,000,000) Standard Oil surpluses," etc.

Also the significant statement, "Nothing has ever happened before—and is unlikely to happen again—in this generation." Standard Oil stock applications were attached and offered for sale with this announcement. If I have incorrectly quoted any fact or the law, I shall be glad to be so informed and will make full corrections.

Your statement to the press that this year's Treasury deficit will reach $670,000,000 (due in large part to the $450,000,000 excess-profits tax repealed, urged by you) is also noted, and while hundreds of millions of dollars in penalties and surtaxes doubtless may be collected under section 220, as intended by Congress, to my mind other factors in the case, heretofore referred to, are of greater importance. Only secret records and secret administration of the law makes this startling situation possible.

In the next letter I may carry coals to Newcastle when indicating the purpose and effect of section 220 as distinguished from the stock dividend decision. Extended editorial comment by the New York Journal of Commerce, Times, Commercial, and a two-column editorial in the Wall Street Journal all speak from the viewpoint of a distinguished New York banker who said he spent 1 month in making up his tax return and 11 months trying to learn how to avoid his taxes. Apparently your solution will be a happy one for him, but I feel sure it is not that contemplated by the average legislator when the law was enacted.

Renewing my observation that it is an incongruous situation that asks you to enforce section 220, but again urging a strict imposition of the penalty therein provided to reach abnormal surpluses, I am,

Very sincerely yours,

JAMES A. FREAR.

WHEN A MELON BECOMES A LEMON.

In addition to this apparently authentic statement that Secretary Mellon and Gulf Oil, his company, started the riot of melon cutting, I have been advised that Secretary Mellon has just closed out a great deal whereby Standard Oil of Indiana has taken over the Mellon Gulf Oil Co. And Standard Oil is the chief culprit with over $1,000,000,000 surplus that followed the Mellon company's "melon cutting" lead. What conclusions must be drawn?

A review of the law and facts disclosed is submitted in the following letter to prove that the celebrated Captain Kidd was "a piker." Jesse James in like manner belonged in the verdant youth class compared with hardened gamblers who squeezed the men and women of the land until the eagles and half eagles shrieked with pain. Now, these interests are getting away with their ill-gotten gains and all the public can do is to shout, "Officer, do your duty." Then we hear the New Yorkers answer, "Why, the officer is the fellow that led us astray." As I have said, somewhere in these letters, it is a sad case when the "melon" to the tax-dodging stockholders by a transposition of letters becomes a "lemon" to the Government Treasury. The following letter to the Treasury custodian explains itself:

WASHINGTON, D. C., November 19, 1922.

Hon. ANDREW W. MELLON,
Secretary United States Treasury Department,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. SECRETARY: In continuation of my discussion of section 220, relating to tax penalties, I call your attention to a remarkable spectacle in our governmental taxing system which occurs when you, the only official empowered by law to impose tax penalties under section 220 on large accumulated surpluses, are charged by reputable New York brokers with being one of the chief beneficiaries of the system. It is stated that Standard Oil, United States Steel, and other great corporations now about to distribute over a billion dollars in stock dividends, thus escaping individual surtaxes, have only followed your lead. In your letters to me you fail to say if any company has been penalized under section 220 of the law. I repeat the inquiry and again ask what accumulations of surplus, if any, in your judgment, should pay a penalty tax under section 220? I renew both inquiries.

One of your own companies, Gulf Oil, is declared by Investment Opportunities to have led the nation-wide mad melon-cutting race. Standard Oil of New Jersey, with 77½ per cent net profit during 10 years, followed Gulf Oil's precedent with a $437,000,000 stock dividend that will escape any penalty tax or any surtax. Why? How can you penalize Standard Oil or any other company when your own company, Gulf Oil, led the way with a 200 per cent stock dividend of accumulated surplus and why should the Government lose possibly hundreds of millions of dollars in penalties and surtaxes because of this anomalous situation? What should Congress do and what is your duty, Mr. Secretary?

SECRET REBATES TO SECRET COMPANIES.

The Internal Revenue Bureau already asks Congress for $42,000,000, only a fraction of the total amount needed, with which to refund taxes rebated in secret to secret companies or individuals. With your own attitude against surtaxes, excess profits, and tax penalties in general and the record of that office, what protection has the Government Treasury when the conflicting claims of big business and strict enforcement of the law meet? Is not the answer found in the way section 220 is now administered?

I repeat two short paragraphs, one from the official Standard Oil publication, The Lamp, as follows:

"In 10 years, from 1912 to 1921, inclusive, the company (New Jersey Standard Oil subsidiary) has shown net earnings before taxes of $775,163,260. Of this sum, $115,517,677 has been paid for tax, $222,065,226 represents aggregate dividends, and $437,580,357 has been absorbed by the needs of the business."

The other from Investment Opportunities carries its own story, as follows:

"Since we were last privileged to address you two dominant factors in world finances have made decisive moves. Andrew Mellon, banker, oil magnate, and capable Secretary of our Treasury, controlling the immensely wealthy Gulf Oil Corporation, inaugurated the stock-dividend and melon-cutting era of 1922-23. Gulf Oil led the movement with a 200 per cent stock dividend. The stock jumped from $400 to $800."

"An extract from section 220 is also repeated to make the case: 'If any corporation is . . . availed of for the purpose of preventing the imposition of the surtax upon its members by permitting its profits to accumulate instead of being divided, there shall be levied and collected for each taxable year upon the net income of such corporation a tax equal to 25 per cent in addition to the tax imposed by section 230.' Prior to your own incumbency article 353 (1918) defined this to mean an 'unreasonable accumulation, if not required for the needs of the business; . . . the needs of the investment of profits is immaterial if they are not in fact needed in the business.'"

The Lamp statement, I take it, means that for a period of 10 years last past in good times and poor the average net profits of this one Standard Oil subsidiary company out of a total of 33 reached the enormous amount of $775,163,260 on a capitalization of $100,000,000, or 77½ per cent net profits annually. After payment of taxes it reports a net profit to the stockholders of $659,645,583, or 66 per cent annually, and of this amount 22 per cent annually was paid in cash on every dollar invested, and it now proposes to place in stock dividends the remaining 44 per cent of its annual profits in round numbers.

WE WALKED THE PLANK.

The "holdup" of 10,000,000 owners of cars and many millions of farmers who use oil and were squeezed for a profit during the last 10 years of 77½ per cent annually by Standard Oil shows clearly, as contended by car users, that Captain Kidd was a piker. While the average farmer with $186 average annual income, according to the agricultural investigating committee, gets 50 cents a day and the Government bonds bring only 4½ (three times oversubscribed), and industrial average around 6 per cent, Standard Oil extorted 77½ per cent net profits annually, or 66 per cent after payment of its taxes, self-assessed.

On this statement editorial writers in New York papers say Congressmen do not understand the tax problems. Unless purposely wrong, it is evident that supposedly learned high-priced men do not know the rudiments of a question of which you, Mr. Secretary, know all the ramfications, and I am only giving an illustration of the effect of Standard Oil stock dividends in order to indicate the necessity for the imposition of section 220 and to reach such unconscionable profits hereafter by adequate legislation.

HOW THE SURTAX WAS DODGED.

The press says your commissioner has not asked for the facts from any Standard Oil company. The "Lamp" confesses, after paying 22 per cent annually in cash dividends, it must go into the market for funds to exploit the world unless it uses the amount belonging to stockholders to exploit Mesopotamia and other foreign fields. How does it work? Mr. Rockefeller, for illustration let us say, holds one-half of the New Jersey Co. subsidiary stock, or $50,000,000. He has then received during the past 10 years $110,000,000, or 22 per cent annually, in cash dividends. If after deduction of all corporation taxes he had been paid all of the 66 per cent net profits in cash remaining, his half of the 44 per cent about to be issued in stock dividends would, in addition to past dividends, be $218,000,000 more in cash, or one-half of $437,580,357, now about to be issued in stock.

The income tax law for 1921 reached 68 per cent for normal and surtax on amounts over $200,000, which Mr. Rockefeller would have paid the Government unless avoided, or $148,000,000 more in taxes in round numbers on $218,000,000 income from the New Jersey Co.'s undistributed dividends alone, which is now going into tax-free stock dividends. Under existing law (1922) the income tax rate on all over $200,000 annual income is 58 per cent, and the amount of tax properly payable can readily be ascertained in like manner. Of course, this amount if spread over 10 years in profits would have received lower tax rates when resting on the New Jersey Co. alone, but if from all his investments Mr. Rockefeller has been receiving $100,000,000 annually, or several times that amount, that he is popularly supposed to receive on his estimated wealth of $2,500,000,000, then the illustration holds good.

STOCK DIVIDENDS V. CASH DIVIDENDS.

By the stock dividend alley all these vast taxes from Mr. Rockefeller, or Mr. Morgan, or Mr. Mellon, apart from corporation taxes payable by all others, are lost to the Government. The stock dividend case by a decision of five justices to four exempts the dividend when once actually declared, but section 220 seeks to reach surplus profits every year not needed for the business. If it is not imposed, then that particular evil must be reached by a law taxing undistributed profits and not left subject to the dissenting action of any official or the decision of any court, however close.

Of course, the New Jersey corporation pays a tax on its stock of possibly one-quarter what Rockefeller would pay on his individual income, but after that tax was paid by the company Rockefeller received his 66 per cent dividend, one-third in cash, and unless you now impose the penalty he will not pay any tax on the 44 per cent, or two-thirds of his income, from this company that will go to him in stock dividends. And what is true in Rockefeller's case is equally true of every other stockholder in the New Jersey Co., and also of every one of the 32 subsidiaries of Standard Oil, and also of every other oil company, because oil prices and profits are largely in harmony, and what is true of oil is true of many other industries, as you well know, Mr. Secretary, through your own connection with 60 or more corporations.

If Standard Oil and Steel were distributing their profits in cash dividends instead of covering up by stock dividends, how long do you suppose it would be before the American public would set up a persistent howl over disclosures of 77½ per cent annual net profits during the past 10 years, and how long before public sentiment would force Congress to grapple with two corporations that now fix the price of gas and steel and extort unconscionable profits from every user in the country?

Under present conditions we know how wealth escapes through stock dividends, but how does the small taxpayer fare who does not receive stock dividends from the Standard Oil or Steel? Possibly you do not remember there are a hundred of these to every large taxpayer or tax evader?

JOHN JONES AND SAM SMITH.

Let us suppose John Jones, an individual, received $10,000 or $20,000 annual income—the smaller amount is many times the general average. If received from professional or personal business work, not corporate, ordinarily he pays over and above his exemption every dollar of tax under the law and does not escape through stock dividends nor through tax-free investments. If he wants more money for his business, he goes into the market for it or uses from his savings after having deducted his personal tax. If Sam Smith, who runs a farm and earns the average 1921 net income received by the farmer of $186, he will not have much left after paying living expenses for himself and family. If he does not pay taxes, however, on his horses, cattle, and farm, along comes the collector and sells Smith's property, including in his execution sale on the tax judgment Smith's horses and cattle and other live stock. Smith must go into the money market like Standard Oil may do to borrow money, not for exploiting his business in foreign countries but for taxes to prevent the loss of his home and stock.

As you well appreciate, Mr. Secretary, out of the wealth of your experience, more financial crimes are committed in the name of "stock dividends" than by all the tax-exempt security transactions which you denounce, past, present, or future. In the case of Standard Oil and United States Steel, I am informed the number of stockholders is rapidly decreasing, with a prospect of having these great monopolies eventually owned and controlled by a handful of men, if, in fact, the latter state has not already been reached. The small stockholder with a small surtax needs and wants his cash dividend. The large surtax payer like Rockefeller or Gary, with a certainty of avoiding individual taxes under the Supreme Court decision, elects to declare a stock dividend and the big fish swallow the little fish who can not hold on because they only receive one-third of the profits in cash dividends.

The Government certainly needs the money, with its $23,000,000,000 debt burden unpaid, so when an enormous corporation surplus of $437,580,357 is placed in stock dividends by one company it invites a humble protest when you say that it is not reached by section 220. The stock-dividend fever encourages tax dodging; it spreads out and furnishes surpluses for gobbling up small competitors, and it freezes out the little stockholders of the same company. Other evils need not be enumerated, but four justices of the Supreme Court had a premonition of its wrongful use by a handful of men who would thereby control all our industries. The fifth justice, on a rehearing of the Macomber case, fell on the other side and opened the door to subsequent frauds, made possible with the passage of the income tax law. Section 220 is not as comprehensive as a tax on undistributed profits nor does it go as far as a tax on excess profits, but it seeks to prevent piling up of surpluses accumulated to avoid individual taxes, and to that extent on behalf of the people whose confidence you have as keeper of their strong box it is your plain duty, as I view it, to impose the penalty provided by section 220. Prima facie Standard Oil and United States Steel are under suspicion when they pile up large surpluses, and it is for them, not you, to prove their case under the statute. If they do so, then curative legislation will certainly follow.

WHO CAN MEASURE THE SHYLOCK TRIBUTE?

It is claimed that the clashing of Germany and Britain in war was due to a "megalomaniac nationalism," or a nationalism made aggressive by prosperity. This country seems to be reaching a megalomaniac money imperialism, in the judgment of many sober, conservative, thinking men—an aggressive financial domination that stops at nothing in its world-wide campaign. Those who believe in the rights of property under the Constitution and the rights of men guaranteed by that same instrument are fearful that the growth of widespread distrust and misgiving is primarily chargeable to men who exact a Shylock's tribute from the public and then seek to shift their tax burdens upon those already fleeced. I am not discussing at length a problem that must squarely be met in the near future beyond expressing the effect of Standard Oil's revelation of profits and tax evasion on the average mind.

Secret diplomacy in international relations is a breeder of war and distrust, and secret administration of the Government's taxing power creates a well-grounded suspicion against the administration of the law. The shifting of tax burdens under existing law can only be ascertained by full publicity, and if you should now fail to enforce the law where the Shylock's tribute has been so clearly exacted by a public confession, how can your department's secret administration of other laws invite confidence?

I am frank to say, Mr. Secretary, if your commissioner failed to do his duty in demanding from Standard Oil a statement under section 220 he is not the man to act in the matter. In a written statement from an ex-official of the Revenue Bureau, supported by personal corroboration from other ex-employees, I am informed refunds to big business and individual taxpayers approaching nine figures have been made since your incumbency; that favoritism exists; that a former chief solicitor of the bureau, now a successful practitioner before it, under the Wilson administration was an usher at the White House without previous legal practice or experience, and that his brother-in-law, appointed to the same high position, had an equally limited tax experience. As the records are all secret, individual favoritism is certain to occur, for secrecy begets such practices.

$42,000,000 MORE TO PAY TAX REFUNDS.

A noisy profession of desire to collect five-year-old back war taxes has been given publicity recently by the Treasury press bureau, accompanied by a demand on November 10 that Congress give the Internal Revenue Bureau $42,000,000 to pay recent secret refunds of taxes. To whom were the refunds given, and why, and what attorneys recovered the refunds for their clients, and were former bureau contesting employees given especial consideration? Why should Congress blindly appropriate $42,000,000 to cover secret adjudications based on secret records made by men whose judgment is of uncertain value to men whose past records in the bureau may also properly be subjected to inquiry? The bureau might easily have collected in taxes and penalties several times the amount demanded if section 220 was imposed. The query arises, Why have you not directed that it be done?

In my next letter, Mr. Secretary, I shall endeavor, however imperfectly, to show by incontrovertible evidence that you have not been in harmony with Congress or the country on some of the most vital and important matters of legislation that have come before that body since your appointment as Secretary of the Treasury, which may account for the attitude of your department on section 220, and that your failure to impress your undoubted great ability on Congress has occurred through a lack of understanding of the sentiment of the country which Congress is chosen to represent.

Trusting in the meantime you will not ignore my efforts to bring to your attention the importance of section 220, and assuring you that a thorough, impartial administration of the law instead of more law frequently solves the problem, I am

Very sincerely,

JAMES A. FREAR.

CONGRESS DIFFERS FROM MR. MELLON OFTEN.

In my letter of November 22 I pointed out specifically why Secretary Mellon, with his enormous wealth and varied business interests, could not understand the viewpoint of Congress or of the people we represent. Time after time he has been checked in his efforts to force his ideas on Congress and the country, and the official record is submitted in order to show the utter hopelessness of expecting any penalty to be imposed in any case by an official who not only led the melon-cutting race but does not believe it right to impose any penalty irrespective of profits, surplus, or needs of business, or of the plain reading of the law.

No Cabinet officer has met with more rebuffs from Congress than Mr. Mellon, and Mellon's Cabinet associates have had many experiences to their credit. But I leave the letter to carry its own story:

WASHINGTON, D. C., November 22, 1922.

HON. ANDREW W. MELLON,

Secretary United States Treasury Department,

Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. SECRETARY: In my last letter of November 19 I promised to point out what I deemed to be your failure to grasp the viewpoint of Congress, not mine personally but the collective view, as I shall endeavor to show. I have discussed the 77½ per cent annual profits of Standard Oil, its billion dollar surplus earnings now waiting stock distribution and avoidance of taxes, and the workings of stock dividends generally, as well as the secrecy clause that cloaks the tax administration of your office. Also your own responsibility, according to New York brokers, for leading the orgie of melon cutting and resulting tax evasions under section 220.

I will not knowingly misstate your position at any time, but feel it has been so repeatedly indicated to Congress that the blind may read. Further, that in tax legislation and tax administration your views are at violent variance with a majority of those on the hill and consistently are ever found in defense of big business whatever the issue.

It may be unnecessary to say I have no motive nor interest, nor have I had in the past, than to perform what I believe to be a plain duty, and whatever the final result the responsibility, of course, rests with you as to the enforcement of section 220. I have ever granted you equal sincerity when we differed on legislative propositions in the past. Because it has a direct bearing on your present action now, may I venture to recall some of these important differences to your attention?

THE DANGEROUS FOREIGN DEBT REFUNDING RESOLUTION.

You presented to the House committee during this Sixty-seventh Congress a resolution for refunding the $11,000,000,000 of foreign war debts, in which resolution you alone would have been granted absolute, unlimited power to make such settlements as you chose; to cancel debts or substitute securities, if you so decided; and all of this unprecedented power to be exercised by you in secret and without time limit were contained by construction in a resolution we were urged to put through committee by the chairman on the same day it was received from you. Several members of the committee supported my successful protest against any such action until your proposal could be considered.

In the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of October 21, 1921, is set forth my statement of protest lodged against this transcendent assumption of power asked for by you and of five amendments then prepared by me and urged upon the committee, which were all adopted with modifications after securing their reluctant acceptance from you before the committee, with alternative of contest in the House. No other amendments were considered by the committee or the House. These five amendments were: First, for a commission instead of for you alone to settle the method and duties of refunding of the $11,000,000,000; second, removing all power by you or the commission to cancel any foreign debts, now seriously and persistently urged by New York banking interests; third, the same restriction on power to substitute any other country's obligation for the debts; and the fourth and fifth amendments relating to publicity and limitation of time in which to act. These, with minor changes in form, were adopted and were embodied in the resolution by the committee, by the House and Senate, and are now law. You and I then differed, as both had a right to do, but I submit, especially in view of your proposed ruling on section 220, that the limitations pressed by me and accepted and eventually adopted by both Houses with the approval of the Executive, were not only desirable limitations on your power proposed in your resolution but from the standpoint of protection of public interests were necessary.

REDUCING THE HIGH SURTAX RATES.

Again, your strenuous efforts to reduce the maximum income surtax rates from 60 per cent to 32 per cent, or practically one-half, which you publicly announce you propose to repeat, are familiar to Congress and to the country, due, presumably, to the same influences that now surround you when the enforcement of penalties, section 220, is considered. In the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of November 17, 1921, is set forth my protest in the House made against the wholesale reduction of surtaxes to 32 per cent, which you supported, as you do now, and you may remember that after a vigorous contest your contention was defeated by a vote of 202 to 173, while the Senate provision, which also defeated your efforts after a lively contest, was approved finally by Senate, House, and your chief and is now the law of the land over your repeated public protests.

A HALF BILLION DOLLAR PROPOSED TAX REBATE.

Again, prior to passage of the 1921 revenue act your contention that the excess profits tax repeal should be made retroactive from January 1, 1921, was forced by you and your supporters to a decision in a Republican House conference with over 180 Republicans present. It was briefly shown there by the undersigned that such action would permit corporations that claimed the tax "had already been collected by them through increased prices" thereafter to pocket $450,000,000 in 1921 so collected and lost to the Treasury that amount in taxes. While the conference was not public—a cause for regret—your proposal was squarely defeated and prevented by a majority of the members of your own political party in party conference. The conference in defeating your proposal saved to the Treasury, in round numbers, a half billion dollars from corporation excess-profits taxes and from reduced surtaxes in 1921, because the House and Senate by law ratified the conference decision. May I suggest such action over your protest again indicates the difference between the collective legislative wisdom of Congress and your own individual judgment, which you say exempts a 400 per cent surplus accumulation from section 220?

THE DYE MONOPOLY FIGHT.

Again, the dye embargo fight, in which you were reputed to have large coal-tar interests involved, was another measure repeatedly defeated by an overwhelmingly Republican House of 169 majority, notwithstanding its support by other Cabinet members and its constant reappearance in the House. It was rejected because of the selfish, unjust proposal to give a dye monopoly unlimited license to fleece the public under the cloak of "national defense." Your own desires were understood and quoted contrary to the action of both Houses in the matter.

Again, after the President had refused to accept the special taxes recommended by both House and Senate committees in joint session to finance the soldiers' bonus bill, you insisted upon a consumption or sales tax as a condition for its passage. The exact reason for the Executive's rejection prior to the bill's passage was not explained, but his written recommendation and yours for a sales tax as the only alternative that would be accepted was an administration ultimatum served on Congress.

We had just repealed the excess-profits tax relieving you and other men with large corporate connections of nearly a half billion dollars aggregate corporate tax annually. A reduction of high individual surtaxes to an estimated amount of $50,000,000—not $90,000,000 as you urged—had also been placed in the 1921 revenue act, or a combined reduction reaching double any reasonable average demand during the 20 years covered by the bonus bill, according to expert testimony offered the committee.

DEFEATING THE VICIOUS SALES TAX.

Both Houses presumably felt that the sales tax urged by you was a vicious tax placed on what both rich and poor ate, wore, and used, not exempted, and that it was an unjust, heavy burden to place on the backs of those who grub to make ends meet, and who were thus asked to bear the rich man's burden of excess profits you had successfully urged for repeal. I refer to the vast army you sought to tax, and who have no income tax to pay, but are glad to eke out a bare existence. All of these would help disproportionately to pay your proposed sales tax, whereas if you contribute the income tax you are popularly supposed to pay, as one of the richest men of the world, you would pay into the Treasury, according to Klein's estimates on $300,000,000 of wealth, an annual tax running well into seven or eight figures. If any evidence of a sales tax failure, due to enforced under-consumption, is desired, then the present French national deficit of 4,000,000,000 francs for 1923 is a warning.

I do not believe in "soaking the rich" because they are rich, but in common with the overwhelming majority who make up the country a belief exists that taxes should be laid according to ability to pay, and this is the teaching of every recognized authority and the history of every prosperous people. Your sales-tax proposal would pinch the poor by taxing their necessities, and was believed to be unjust and vicious in principle and was defeated in committee by a vote of 19 to 5.

Notwithstanding a Republican majority of 167 in the House, I feel sure any vote there would register the same proportion as in the committee against a sales tax, and the same is true of the Senate, notwithstanding your official recommendations to the contrary. Particularly is this true since a would-be sales tax Galilad from Hoosierdom and a genial Canadian sales tax free-excursion conductor from Manhattan will both be absent from our midst next session, due to the vagaries or verdict of voters.

Even letters from the Executive urging several of these measures on Congress failed to sway a membership that, with all due respect to party leaders, still has constitutional duties to perform that can not be abrogated nor responsibility shifted.

Again, another attempted direction of congressional action came on the passage of the so-called soldiers' bonus bill, against which you frequently expressed your violent protest. Five years ago Congress was told by financial interests that the ex-service men now proposed by Congress as beneficiaries were then saving your own hundreds of millions of dollars from German indemnity exactions and that they would never be forgotten.

MISREPRESENTING THE BONUS.

You published a letter at the outset last year as Secretary of the Treasury over your own signature that the bonus bill would involve a Government liability of $185,625,000,000, or eight times the total national debt, and then later explained it was a typographical error of one hundred and eighty-odd billion dollars, which, unfortunately, however, helped prejudice the popular mind against the bill you were so strenuously opposing. Later you gave out statements from your office that the amount involved would be between four and five billion dollars, stated in practically the language later found in the President's veto, and you left an impression with the public mind that it was a present disbursement of that large sum, whereas the amount to be distributed over 20 years was estimated to be a little above $200,000,000 annually, according to testimony of experts before the committee. A strict imposition of section 220 penalties now by you with surtaxes released would probably more than meet any average annual charge on the Treasury from the bonus bill. Every other allied government has extended similar aid to its ex-soldiers, but ours failed largely through your own activities against the bill.

Your advice to the Executive, consistent with your frequently expressed opposition, resulted in the soldiers' bonus veto, but the sentiment of the House was shown by its vote of 258 to 54 in overriding the Presidential veto and in the Senate by a vote in favor of the bill of 44 to 28, lacking only 4 votes of the necessary two-thirds. In other words, you crucified the hopes of 4,000,000 ex-soldiers, but you will now save enormous plundering profits of Standard Oil, reaching 77½ per cent annually, from tax penalties unless section 220 is invoked, an express provision of statute which I again urge upon you.

OPPOSES EXISTING ESTATE TAXES.

Your last statement opposing existing estate taxes was given to the press recently, and your position before our committee frankly opposing the principle of inheritance and gift taxes is well known, notwithstanding Congress long ago enacted an inheritance tax reaching a maximum of 25 per cent, which many Members now believe should be doubled on great fortunes. Again I submit you are opposed to the existing inheritance tax law as a matter of principle, and because of that opposition and prejudice you fail to understand the congressional viewpoint when called on to administer estate tax laws or section 220.

Again your disregard for congressional mandates appears, Mr. Secretary, from my letter of November 13 calling your attention to a published statement in "Investment Opportunities," wherein your official position and private business manipulations were concisely discussed with engaging frankness.

During your own incumbency in office, as stated in other letters, Congress passed the 1921 revenue law, containing section 220, a provision directing your department to impose a penalty of 25 per cent on profits set aside by corporations as surpluses to avoid taxation and not absolutely needed in business. You, and you alone, of all men in the country knew of the enormous surpluses that have been accumulated by great corporations, in some of which you are reputed to have interests, for all these companies were required by law to file secret reports in your office.

OPPOSED TO PENALTY LAW BY EXAMPLE.

Investment Opportunities, in a strong plea to investors for Standard Oil stock subscriptions, states on page 1 of November, 1922, issue (vol. 14, No. 11) as follows:

"Andrew Mellon, banker, oil magnate, and capable Secretary of the Treasury, controlling the immensely wealthy Gulf Oil Corporation, led the movement with a 200 per cent stock dividend. The stock jumped from $400 to $800. The Rockefellers followed immediately by deciding to distribute the Standard Oil surpluses * * *. Nothing like it has ever happened before—and is unlikely to happen again in a generation." (The orgy of melon cutting.)

Instead of enforcing section 220 of the law passed by Congress in 1921, you are credited by this publication with leading a mad race in melon cutting of secret surpluses. It declares you set the pace that was followed by Rockefeller and all the others. The public had been secretly plundered of upward of a billion dollars in surplus, apart from generous cash dividends, and a great oil monopoly apparently squeezed 77½ per cent in net profits annually from its consumers and laid by over $475,000,000 in undistributed profits. Investment Opportunities points out when Gulf Oil said the coast was clear no one could interfere to enforce the penalty in section 220 and a swarm of corporation surpluses began to cut their millions from melons.

If this is true regarding your own position, can any more certain disregard for Congress and opposition to its will as expressed by law be cited? An avalanche of votes a few days ago took from the House 150 of the Republican majority. Prior thereto party campaign subscriptions of $50,000, equally divided between the Mellon family and the Rockefeller family, were announced by the press. If surpluses that in the aggregate might bring to the Treasury in penalties and surtaxes hundreds of millions of dollars are now held immune, the situation presented will be hard for your party associates to explain or defend. Providing you do not care to impose penalties under section 220, you have an easy solution of an embarrassing predicament.

WHAT WILL THE HARVEST BE?

I need not again refer to the administration of the Internal Revenue Bureau, wherein a hundred or more millions of dollars in tax refunds under your direction are progressing. The New York Times has an item that will be of interest to Congress and the country. It reads:

"The Journal of Commerce learns from Washington that the pending deficiency appropriation of $42,000,000 for repaying taxes unlawfully collected is only a beginning * * *. Many times forty millions are undisclosed in tax collections in arrears, which may reach $500,000,000, according to the Journal's information."

Mr. Secretary, I am informed a rebate of $16,000,000 to Standard Oil of New Jersey and large refunds to companies with which you are connected have been made. Can any more serious situation be imagined in our public affairs, if so?

The appeal is renewed that notwithstanding your recognized extreme opposition to Congress that you act in accordance with what I believe is the plainly expressed purpose of the law, and that you exact from the enormous accumulations of corporation surplus recently disclosed all penalties provided by section 220.

Very sincerely yours,

JAMES A. FREAR.

PRESENT CONDITIONS AND PROPOSED REMEDIES.

I have tried to impress Secretary Mellon with the seriousness of his position when he refuses to impose penalties under section 220. Congress can pass laws, but can not administer; and if Secretary Mellon refuses to enforce a plain mandate it is for those who represent the people to pass laws that he can not ignore. Standard Oil and Steel have been principally discussed because they illustrate the far-reaching power of great monopolies that set prices and extort enormous dividends from the helpless public. If further evidence of their power and profiteering of the people is desired I recommend a reading of evidence offered in my remarks against the ship subsidy in Record of November 25 and of statistics found in speech of Representative MICHAELSON of that same day. Both show the consciousnessless tax refunds, proposed primarily for these two monopolies under the ship subsidy bill reaching many millions of dollars to be taken from the Treasury for more refunds annually. In the following letter proposals are set forth, which if passed retroactively will turn into the Treasury more money from those best able to pay, including the vast army of stock-dividend tax dodgers, than would be collected under the penalty clause. Complete publicity of every tax return and administrative activity has been shown to be absolutely necessary, for publicity would have prevented such an enormous accumulation of surpluses.

The following letter suggests remedies that may profitably be adopted, either entire or in modified form:

WASHINGTON, D. C., November 26, 1922.

HON. ANDREW W. MELLON,
Secretary United States Treasury Department,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. SECRETARY: In these letters I have tried to present to your attention a few plain facts that will not down. Necessarily they have been hurriedly written in an effort to save you from error and to suggest laws that will curtail extortion and tax evasion.

It has been shown, first, that for 10 years last past one subsidiary Standard Oil company has squeezed out of the American public without its knowledge $775,000,000 net profits, of which 22 per cent annually was paid in annual cash dividends and 44 per cent annually was covered up in surplus to prevent disclosures, and later by the stock-dividend route escapes the imposition of any Federal tax on individual incomes. The records of your department were not open to the public, but you had full opportunity to know the facts long in advance.

Further, the Standard Oil with its 33 subsidiaries has plundered the American public and laid by approximately a billion dollars in surplus apart from generous 22 per cent annual cash dividends distributed by one company, and that these conditions were known only to the Treasury Department where the records and administration are by law kept secret. Gulf Oil—said to be your own child—aluminum, coal, United States Steel, and doubtless many other melons are also being cut, according to rumor or report, and the public from its own necessities and sacrifices has created every melon for the few who now divide.

You, Mr. Secretary, one of the wealthiest men in the world, identified with many great corporate interests now engaged in the pastime of cutting these melons, are the only man empowered by law to secure any small portion of the Federal tax due from these great surpluses.

A RECORD OF OPPOSITION.

You helped repeal the excess profits law with a loss to the Treasury annually, when added to surtax reductions, of approximately a half billion dollars. You opposed any tax on undistributed profits intended to reach such enormous surpluses; you pressed for passage a reduction of one-half of surtax on great incomes; you opposed any inheritance tax or gift tax that would reach gigantic mushroom estates, never before known in history; and you express no opinion against legalized secrecy or concealment of public records by your department. In fact, during your own administration the corporation excess profits tax law has been repealed and a large reduction secured in individual high surtax rates. Large melons that for some reason have been gathering for a decade are now being cut during your administration, and you are publicly proclaimed by investment journals to be a great stock-dividend beneficiary, and yet you are the only one acquainted with the enormous profits and authorized by law to exact tax penalties under law.

The press gives many columns to a weak New Jersey minister's liaison and only a brief line to a New Jersey monopoly's plundering of millions of people. Those who own and control the press feed a morbid public appetite on things that were but do not reach out against the things that are. A reason may not be hard to find when examining records of press ownership. Your own Treasury press bureau sings your praise nearly every day. Mr. Secretary, generally over a proposed hopeless constitutional amendment you ask Congress and the country to pass, but you ignore present evils that you are alleged to countenance in the melon-cutting field. In other words, a smoke screen, however unintentional, distracts public attention from a live issue in which you have become the central figure.

Recent election returns wiped out nearly all of the 169 Republican majority in the House. The country apparently could see little hope from a party whose officials during and since the war permitted extortionists to plunder or a party whose officials have continued the plundering license and recovered nothing. Knowing a division of power would be hopeless, a Republican majority was returned, but it was manifestly another "vote of protest," like that of two years ago.

I have always been a Republican and, like yourself, have been brought up to believe in certain fundamental principles that my party advocates. My only opponent this year was a Socialist candidate, whose theories do not take into calculation the inherent weakness of human nature. Experience teaches us that the only hope for reformation in official or public evils must come from within the party rather than from without, because greed, selfishness, and money autocracy has ever been bipartisan, and party or partisan lines can not be preserved when coping with such evils.

Parties are political instrumentalities formed to serve the public, but if either branch of Congress or the administration of the law is controlled by a selfish bipartisan, big business combine and no constructive national program is offered to meet the evil, then what party, I ask you, can invite confidence and support in 1922 or 1924?

THE PEOPLE CONTRIBUTE EVERY DOLLAR OF PROFIT.

The people are now confronted with the fact that one great corporation by secret plundering has built up an unlimited financial and individual power second to none in the world, and the people from out their necessities have contributed every dollar to that building. Men in a lifetime connected with Standard Oil have gathered in fortunes beyond comprehension. Other companies, separate or interlocking, have run in that same race for money and power. A small group now controls the industrials, the money, and the fortunes of our Government and of many smaller countries on the Western Continent. Feverishly these interests play the game like gamblers at Monte Carlo, without thought of the future or of those they fleece. A training on the stock exchange is a post-graduate course compared with Europe's gambling resort.

In this game the rest of us are insignificant pawns and contributors, however small, and 10,000,000 farmers, who averaged $186 income in 1921, according to Government reports, have been helpless spectators. They ask why they averaged only $186 income instead of $1,860 or more last year, and it is small consolation to them now to learn their meager income through unconscionable extortions has contributed to the vast accumulated surpluses disclosed by Gulf and Standard Oil, steel, aluminum, coal, and other overgrown monopolies.

Five million laborers or more, ranging from experts to nonexperts, who blindly strike for better conditions and yet are impotent, find their own contributions were exacted by the ever-increasing demands of these great monopolies, now engaged in unprecedented melon cutting, that in war and peace have squeezed persistently and relentlessly. The financial press chortles over a $2,000,000,000 increase in bank deposits, but does not say to whom they belong, nor does it mention how many of the farmers whose average national income reached $186 were among the depositors standing in line.

Millions of people who have no independent vocation status but who also contributed to selfish big business demands are asking why 2 per cent of the people own 60 per cent of the wealth, according to economists, and what will occur when 1 per cent of the same people own 75 per cent of the wealth with a more complete control of the Government in a vicelike grip.

I make no reference to history or the logical end of undisturbed growth of wealth and power. Common sense and reason are no different now than when Rome and Russia were among the great nations of the world. "Americanism," taught by a "National Security" League, is meaningless pastime when those who contribute to a business propaganda and who represent unlimited wealth and power become a greater liability to general contentment or to peaceful, orderly government than a whole fleet of vessels loaded with wild-eyed Bolsheviks.

UNEVEN-HANDED JUSTICE.

I may be old-fashioned concerning notions of even-handed justice, but I wrote you before in letter of October 29 that Justice Stafford, of Washington, had sentenced a boy the day before to 10 years' hard labor for attempting to pick a pocket. In a New York dispatch of November 9, Judge Tuiley is reported to have sentenced Louis Wiley to 15 years' imprisonment for attempting to steal a purse containing 32 cents. Those now trying to escape tax penalties on a $437,000,000 surplus would require many centuries, reaching back to the Stone Age, if Tuiley was keeper of the Treasury and a proportionate term penalty was imposed. Such efforts are not criminal, of course, but I submit Judge Tuiley might well be transferred from his 32-cent job to the larger field on Fifteenth Street if we are to have a strict imposition of section 220 with which to reduce $670,000,000 1922 Treasury deficit.

A Newburgh (N. Y.) dispatch of November 13 says that of 438 tons of coal delivered to Highland Falls in the last three months, 353 tons went to J. P. Morgan's estate and 85 tons to the villagers living in Highland Falls. The Fuel Administrator seized the Morgan coal under his war-time powers for general distribution. This brief dispatch is a text for our existing economic system; but if Perkins, the fuel administrator, was Secretary of the Treasury, I feel sure hundreds of millions of dollars in penalties and released surtaxes would be recovered by the Government under section 220, whereas if you were fuel administrator for Highland Falls, Mr. Morgan's 353 tons of coal would remain in his bins.

It would be presumptuous for me to offer any solution of a problem that has grown up in a half century and is a present menace of unprecedented proportions. Neither would I presume to be more than a private, content to serve in the ranks, without ambition to gratify. Modestly I offer suggestions that may not—I fear will not—meet with your approval; but you could perform no greater service for yourself and your country than to join your great wealth, power, and experience in a movement having for its ultimate aim the equal protection of property and of human rights, and a better, fairer adjustment of conditions that now make for unrest.

I would hold myself blamable if I did not point out what may be a partial remedy for our fiscal troubles, even though you, a great financier, may radically disagree. Ideal government will not be reached until human nature ceases to be selfish, and we will not find any millennium on this earth, but conditions may be improved by a little sacrifice on the part of those who have so enormously profited by the sacrifices of the many, and sooner or later we must all recognize that as parts of the same Government we are all in the same boat.

SECRETARY MELLON INDICTS TAX DODGERS.

You, Mr. Secretary, struck a keynote of the evil when you indicted your financial associates and charged them with tax dodging. Your harmless, homeopathic treatment on tax-free securities, of course, is puerile and hopeless of results for years to come, as I have shown heretofore, but it was inspired by your knowledge of enormous tax dodging to-day by wealth.

You have declared it necessary to pass a constitutional amendment to stop the issue of tax-exempt securities. Why? Because men of wealth, your associates and great financiers of the country, have been dodging taxes and have placed their funds in upward of $10,000,000,000 or more of tax-exempt securities. Billions more are available for investment before any law can check them. They have cleared their decks of all loose cash, and now that they have scuttled the ship you say let us try and stop the holes with a constitutional amendment, which if ever passed and ratified by the States will take many years at the earliest to shape into a plug to stop tax dodging.

Mr. Jules Bache, a New York banker and stockbroker, whose advice through financial journals to Congress and the President is both unsought and unremittant, sums up the tax activities of big business men generally when he stated to the national industrial tax conference: "The taxpayer . . . spends 11 months a year devising schemes by which during the 1 month that he tries to make up his tax statement he can avoid as many of the taxes as is legally possible, and he generally succeeds in avoiding many of them." This confession of universal scheming and tax dodging by such an eminent practitioner and financier as Mr. Bache, supported as it is by your own sweeping indictment of tax-dodging men and methods, presents to Congress its own responsibility for such scandalous tax evasions.

The immediate necessity for adequate legislation is emphasized in order to meet a critical nation-wide general evasion of the income tax law; also to reduce materially an existing Treasury deficit, and finally, in a helpful way, directly to aid big financiers by giving them 11 extra months annually in which to transact legitimate business.

I will say nothing more severe of those who hide behind the Supreme Court stock-dividend decision of 5 to 4 and have consistently dodged taxes in like degree, and possibly to like extent. You defend one under the pretext it is to help business, but why not have a 7½ annual net profit of Standard Oil pay some share of the 44 per cent individual taxes to a Government that has enabled it to make that profit? Why make the American consumer furnish unlimited wealth, that dodges surtaxes, with which to exploit the world?

THESE MEASURES WILL STOP TREASURY LEAKS.

The tax administration of the Treasury should not be left discretionary, even if records are made public. The disease needs more heroic treatment if we would save to posterity a country in which every citizen has a vital interest, notwithstanding all its natural resources have been gobbled up by a few monopolies and money kings. Let us in this rebuilding plan—

First. Reenact the corporation excess-profits tax for 1922, fixing a reasonable graduated tax rate to discourage extortion.

Second. Let us place a retroactive graduated tax on undistributed corporation profits to reach large surpluses heretofore accumulated to avoid taxation.

Third. Increase the inheritance tax after reasonable exemptions, and add a gift tax to prevent a menacing money oligarchy.

Fourth. Enact a stock dividend tax law, making such law retroactive, subject to action on the second proposal.

Fifth. Make all tax returns and all tax proceedings public.

Every proposed tax will afford needed legislation to meet existing tax-dodging evils or dangerous economic conditions. Graduated tax rates will prevent injustice to legitimate business, and the country has been so satiated with big-business tax propaganda that it will not be frightened when motives and methods are disclosed.

First. The excess-profits tax is sound and right in principle according to eminent tax authorities. It taxes according to ability to pay. It grants reasonable exemptions (8 per cent), and then reaches the man who would squeeze humanity because he has the tools. The only pretext for its repeal was a claim it hurt business and removed incentive. This is not a vital objection to the farmers of the country, whose incentive is only a livelihood and who made less than $200 last year on the average. This tax is just and should be reenacted to help reach present profiteering and to compel large profits to pay just taxes because best able to do so.

When Standard Oil on a fictitious capitalization of previous stock dividends exacts 7½ per cent from the 10,000,000 of $200 a year agriculturists and from 10,000,000 of car users, I believe they would all look with equality while the Government exacted three-fourths of that hard-fisted extortion, if need be, for Government use.

Second. The tax on undistributed profits urged by Secretary Houston at 20 per cent was estimated to produce in 1921 $690,000,000 in addition to the excess-profits tax returns, as explained in my letter of October 28. Apart from its value as a Government agency with which gradually to shave away $23,000,000,000 of national indebtedness and a $670,000,000 revenue deficit in 1922, a tax of that kind would do away with tax-dodging stock dividends by forcing a distribution of any unnecessary surplus. No greater need for this tax can be shown than in announcements this year of $437,500,000 stock-dividend melons to be cut by big stockholders of a single company, thereby freezing out the little fellows and avoiding surtaxes on profits that are generally paid by abiding citizens from necessity if not from desire.

A graduated tax of from 5 to 20 per cent, depending on the profits, would permit legitimate laying by of surplus for banking and other business needs, and a maximum 20 per cent rate would release large surpluses accumulated to avoid taxes and would protect small stockholders.

INHERITANCE TAXES.

Third. A graduated inheritance tax reaching 50 per cent on all amounts over $30,000,000, and a gift tax graduated to 25 per cent. This is less than extremists advocate. For many years during their lifetime men have built up private fortunes from a few dollars a week to a surplus reaching hundreds of millions and even billions in a single family. Sometimes it avoids estate taxes by gift distributions before death. A gift tax would reach such evasion. Through consolidations, destruction of competition, railway rebates, profits on fictitious stock, monopoly, and tax evasions they have laid aside more wealth than was conceived to exist in the wildest dreams of a century ago. What is it all for? Only to play the money game, the gamblers declare. They have done this while the vast majority have been struggling for a bare existence. What does it profit that 2 per cent of the men in the country now control 60 per cent of the national wealth? To what purpose is the game played? Every day the world is informed of escapades, divorces, and extravagances of heirs to this wealth; of fortune hunters of foreign titles; American huntresses, whose pot of gold, contributed by the American public, is the price of a title; of inherited wealth that tends to leave arrogance, un-Americanism, and discontent with the heritage, while the concentration of power grows. The country has unwillingly and restlessly accepted a situation that certainly demands correction.

Is it not time, Mr. Secretary, then to do the common-sense thing and say generous exemptions will be allowed to save from want, not work, a chance progeny, but that men who accumulate must after death leave to their Government for its needs an equal share of vast accumulations of wealth over liberal exemptions, of accumulations wrung from their fellow men because of protection by the laws of our Government? Men have avoided tax laws through stock dividends and have invested in tax-free securities, which you denounce. This money or property has been laid away like the miser's gold, sometimes accumulated in a lifetime, often by unscrupulous methods. We can not differentiate with these estates beyond saying a generous exemption free from taxes may first be deducted before the tax applies and then a graduated tax to reach the enormous fortunes that have become all powerful and a menace to the people. Many millions of people have no estate to leave; they fight for existence, and to them this proposal seems liberality personified.

A gift tax to reach gifts made to avoid the inheritance tax, such as was introduced last session in Senate and House, should also be enacted. To the complaint that estates can not be unscrambled in a day it may be answered that is true on the existing maximum 25 per cent tax on estates, and sufficient time to collect the tax should be provided by law.

HOW TO REACH STOCK DIVIDENDS.

Fourth. Enact specifically a stock dividend tax law, making it retroactive. The Macumber decision by the Supreme Court (252 U. S. Repts.) arose under a general statute without any direct expression from Congress relative to stock dividends. Five justices there held that stock dividends were nontaxable, and four justices, the balance of the full court, dissented and held them taxable.

Justices Brandeis and Clarke in their dissenting opinion held that the majority decision "would result in limiting taxation to 'the income of the income.'" All dissenting judges subscribed to the proposition that "most people, not lawyers, would suppose when they voted for it (the amendment) that they put the question (stock dividends) at rest * * * the amendment justifies the tax." Again, the dissenting justices said: "If stock dividends representing profits are held exempt from taxation under the sixteenth amendment, the owner of the most successful businesses in America will be able to escape taxation on a large part of what is actually their income. * * * That such a result was intended by the people of the United States when adopting the sixteenth amendment is inconceivable." This opinion of four justices was based on a Standard Oil stock-dividend melon and the reasoning appears to be eminently sound.

One justice on reargument swung his decision against the above principle and held that the will of the people as expressed in the sixteenth amendment to the Constitution was of no effect, but four able justices dissented from the majority decision. Is it probable that the court which has rendered several unpopular decisions by a bare majority of one vote will declare unconstitutional a direct law by Congress expressing specifically the will of the people to tax stock dividends, as declared by the people in the sixteenth amendment and heretofore found to be the law by four justices of the Supreme Court? If so, sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof, for then it will be the right of Congress to say that no act of the House and Senate approved by the President shall be held unconstitutional by a bare majority of one or two justices, and little doubt will be had of the approval of the people to that proposal.

Fifth. I offer no further argument against the income-tax secrecy clause that was retained by the Senate last session only by a vote of 85 to 33. Your own administration, the record of the Internal Revenue Commissioner, the secret accumulation of $1,000,000,000 surplus by one company known only to your office, the widespread evasion of taxes now disclosed, enormous secret tax refunds reaching hundreds of millions of dollars, also known alone to your office, all are offered without further comment. With these few observations, Mr. Secretary, I leave a subject in which we may differ, but you have no more vital interest than I, because public interest is not measured by dollars. Citizenship and interest in the country's prosperity and perpetuity comes not with wealth. It finds place equally with the humblest citizen, who often is most contented with life if blessed with a mere competence.

It need not be expected that all the proposals, however meritorious, will be enacted into law, nor have I sought to offer any cure-all, but these suggestions if adopted will ultimately reduce the Government's fiscal obligations and will meet a present need for more equitable sharing of tax burdens. Let those who have profited enormously and unduly under our laws give generously (without dodging) from their profits to their Government's support. By so doing they will quiet a growing unrest that can not safely be ignored. There must be proposed a constructive program not found in vague party platform platitudes, and my suggestions are to that end. Other legislation is needed, of course, but after some hesitation I have proposed a means of reducing the evil of high-finance tax dodging that ought also to strengthen and improve our whole fiscal policy.

Very sincerely,

JAMES A. FREAR.

Letters received from Secretary Mellon are offered herewith. In view of an express statute and evidence of stock dividend tax dodging submitted, and of the melon cutting of a 200 per cent Gulf Oil dividend by Mr. Mellon I invite a careful scrutiny of his letters to ascertain what companies he has penalized, what profits he would penalize, or what prospect of law enforcement is suggested by any of his letters which follow. His one plea of "secrecy" does not apply to his own case, which can with his consent be made public, but it is a cry that ought to be prevented hereafter by the enactment of widest publicity measures. His letters are offered herewith:

THE SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY,
Washington, October 20, 1922.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN: I have your letter of October 16 calling attention to the fact that the Standard Oil Co. of New Jersey has declared a 400 per cent stock dividend on its common stock, and that other companies are declaring various stock dividends. You refer to section 220 of the revenue act of 1921, which you say "provides methods for reaching holders of surplus stock when for the purpose of escaping taxation," and you ask whether this statute (section 220) has been invoked by this department or considered "in the case of any corporations, and whether it has been considered in reaching the surplus earnings held by the Standard Oil Co."

It would seem that you are under a misapprehension concerning the situation as to this so-called stock dividend. Taking, for illustration, the Standard Oil Co. of New Jersey, to which you refer, the holder of its stock, after he has received the new certificates or shares, has altogether no more than he had before, and therefore, so far as the holder is concerned, there is no income to tax. This was aptly expressed by the Supreme Court in Elsner v. Macumber (252 U. S. 189) as follows:

"This, however (declaration of a stock dividend), is merely book-keeping that does not affect the aggregate assets of the corporation or its outstanding liabilities; * * * it does not alter the preexisting proportionate interest of any stockholder or increase the intrinsic value of his holding or of the aggregate holdings of the other stockholders as they stood before. The new certificates simply increase the number of the shares with consequent dilution of the value of each share."

Section 220 to which you refer does not apply to the situation relating to these stock increases. It provides that if any corporation is formed or availed of for the purpose of preventing the imposition of the surtax upon its stockholders through the means of permitting its gains and profits to accumulate, there shall be levied a tax of 25 per cent of the amount thereof in addition to the other taxes imposed upon corporations, but it further provides that the fact that the gains and profits are permitted to accumulate and become surplus shall not be considered evidence of the intent to escape the surtax, unless the Commissioner of Internal Revenue certifies that, in his opinion, such accumulation is unreasonable for the purposes of the business. In every case, therefore, it is necessary under the statute that the Commissioner of Internal Revenue determine that the accumulation of the surplus is unreasonable for the purposes of the business before it can be held that the corporation was formed or availed of for the purpose of evading the imposition of surtaxes.

The declaration of a stock dividend is not significant in connection with this section of the statute, nor has it any relation to a determination by the commissioner under section 220. The primary purpose of section 220 is to reach those corporations, the stock of which is usually closely held and the earnings and profits of which are accumulated for the purpose of enabling the shareholders to avoid the payment of surtaxes upon their dividends.

As to the question of the accumulation of surplus by the Standard Oil Co. of New Jersey out of past profits, this company, I believe, had over $200,000,000 of surplus which was accumulated before the passage of the income tax law in 1913, and the accumulations since that time have been accretions from earnings in addition to dividends declared from year to year; but in all of these years the company was subject to full taxes upon its earnings—some of it under the excess-profits tax and war taxes at the then high prevailing rates. It is not practical in any active business to distribute all the net earnings in dividends to the stockholders, and if part of the earnings were not put back into the business there would be no progress or industrial growth. In the case of this company the Commissioner of Internal Revenue has found no evidence of the accumulation of surplus beyond the reasonable needs of the business.

I have gone into this detail as to the Standard Oil Co. of New Jersey as you make that company the example, but the same principles apply generally, and, so far as this department is concerned, there will be no laxity in invoking the application of section 220 wherever there is any basis for so doing.

Sincerely yours,

A. W. MELLON, Secretary.

HON. JAMES A. FREAR,
House of Representatives.

THE SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY,
Washington, November 2, 1922.

HON. JAMES A. FREAR,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN: I have received your several letters of October 23, 26, and 29, 1922, further expressing your views as to the application of section 220 of the revenue act of 1921. I have noted your comments, but find that everything relevant to the issue has already been covered by my letter of October 20, 1922, which stated the attitude of the Treasury toward section 220, particularly as related to the stock dividends declared by the Standard Oil Co. of New Jersey and other companies. As I pointed out there, the declaration of a stock dividend has no significance under section 220, and in any case where the section applies the department can proceed with its enforcement quite as well after as before the declaration of a stock dividend. The Treasury is diligently enforcing section 220, according to its terms, in every case where applicable, but can not, of course, extend the law to cover matters beyond its scope.

Very truly yours,

A. W. MELLON, Secretary.

THE SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY,
Washington, November 17, 1922.

HON. JAMES FREAR,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN: I received your letter of November 12, further commenting on section 220 of the revenue act of 1921 and urging its enforcement to reach surpluses accumulated by the Standard Oil Co. of New Jersey and other corporations.

As I have said before, section 220 applies only to corporations formed or availed of for the purpose of preventing the imposition of the surtax upon the stockholders through the medium of permitting gains and profits to accumulate instead of being divided or distributed, and it expressly provides that the fact that the gains and profits are in any case permitted to accumulate and become surplus shall not be construed as evidence of a purpose to escape the tax unless the Commissioner of Internal Revenue certifies that in his opinion such accumulation is unreasonable for the purposes of the business. The section does not impose a tax on undistributed profits or on accumulated surplus, as you seem to suggest, but rather puts penalties on the accumulation of gains and profits beyond the reasonable needs of the business when made for the purpose of escaping the surtax. As heretofore stated, the Commissioner of Internal Revenue has found no evidence in the case of the Standard Oil Co. of New Jersey of the accumulation of gains and profits for this purpose beyond the reasonable needs of the business, and there are on the other hand many evidences—as, for example, in the dividend reports of the company—that it had for many years, before there was any income tax, been consistently putting a substantial part of the profits back into the business, and that its dividends since the surtax have been maintained at no less rate. I understand that it has also, within a few years, sold about $200,000,000 of preferred stock in order to get additional capital to meet the needs of the business. This does not indicate accumulation of gains and profits beyond the reasonable needs of the business, and the same holds true of other companies actively engaged in business whose capital and accumulated surplus take the form of plant, equipment, and inventory with necessary working capital.

You request information as to cases that may have been penalized, but in view of the restrictions imposed by law on the publication of income tax returns and information derived therefrom, I do not feel at liberty to disclose the status of any cases which have arisen under the section.

You will appreciate, of course, that this section, which for the first time imposed a penalty upon the corporation, did not become effective until the taxable year 1921, and that the Bureau of Internal Revenue did not receive the returns for that year until March, 1922, and is only now in the course of examining them. The Commissioner of Internal Revenue has standing instructions to enforce the provisions of section 220 wherever applicable.

As to the statements put out in Wall Street speculative circles, which you quote in your letter, they were evidently intended for stock market purposes and have no bearing on the question of tax administration. To endeavor to answer questions arising from these statements, based as they are so largely on statements from irresponsible sources, would be impossible.

Very truly yours,

A. W. MELLON.

A PROPOSAL TO PREVENT TAX DODGING AND REGULATE MONOPOLY.

Mr. Chairman, I have sought in the foregoing correspondence with Secretary Mellon to set forth the dismal failure to enforce the income tax law, due largely to inefficiency or deliberate refusal of officials, and have pointed out tax dodging and tax evasion that must be stopped if we are to keep faith with the people. Methods of evading tax provisions through investments in tax-free securities, stock dividends, and other devices are so numerous and dangerous that Congress must act and act fearlessly if we would carry out the purpose of the sixteenth amendment.

To meet some of these evasions and to curb the unlimited power of wealth I have suggested in my letter to Secretary Mellon of November 26, with brief arguments in their support, several proposals as follows:

First. A reenactment of the corporation excess-profits tax for 1922, fixing a reasonable graduated tax rate to discourage extortion.

Second. A retroactive graduated tax on undistributed corporation profits to reach large surpluses heretofore accumulated to avoid taxation.

Third. Increase of the inheritance tax after reasonable exemptions, and a gift tax to prevent a menacing money oligarchy.

Fourth. Enactment of a stock dividend law, making such law retroactive subject to action that may be had on the second proposal.

Fifth. Publicity of tax returns and all tax proceedings.

To these tax proposals a regulatory act will be submitted herewith, designed to curb monopoly. If part of these proposals can be enacted into law, I submit it will be an improvement over existing tax evasions and lax administration.

Frankly, I am seeking so far as I can to persuade legislators in both House and Senate to make independent investigations, because no cure-all can be recommended, particularly when law will ever be administered by men possessed of ordinary human weaknesses. The income tax law can not be made self-administrative, and the men chosen to administer to-day are generally of big business affiliations and large personal interests. This situation did not exist when John Sherman, author of the Sherman antitrust law, translated from the Senate to the Treasury, was in charge of finances and impressing his antitrust policies upon that department.

WHAT POLICY CONTROLS THE TREASURY TO-DAY?

Since the passage of the income tax law it becomes a vital thing for big business or great wealth to control the administration of the tax laws. The extent of this control and its ramifications are far-reaching in and out of the Treasury Department and Internal Revenue Bureau, if statements in my hands are one-half true.

Secretary Mellon, as Secretary of the Treasury, receives $12,000 yearly from the Government in salary. Mr. Mellon, the private individual, with $300,000,000 estimated wealth in the Mellon family, is a different person from the official who acts as Secretary. His annual private income is derived from scores of corporations and presumably reaches in the aggregate many millions of dollars annually and possibly $50,000 daily.

In other words, Mr. Mellon's personal, private income every day presumably is four times the entire annual income he receives from the Government. What naturally will be his decision where any exercise of judgment is required under the statute? Hardly a section of the statute is not protested by some of the ablest attorneys that can be found, and an organized system of securing refunds reaching hundreds of millions from the Treasury is alleged to exist by ex-employees, sustained by startling evidence. The establishment of precedents, the employment of attorneys, the claimed organized combination between outside and inside interests should be investigated by Congress to ascertain how far secrecy has undermined the public service and robbed the Treasury by alleged improper decisions.

Personally, I believe Secretary Mellon is sincere in his judgment when he is called upon to act, but what man, with his own financial interests constantly before him for decision, can act impartially? Would he act differently providing other large businesses were involved? In the final analysis would his policy in such cases be one of extreme laxity or of strict enforcement? If any doubt occurs, it may be removed by the letters I have offered. Why was he put there and by whom?

Should a judge act in any matter where he is personally or financially concerned?

HOW CAN CONGRESS REACH THIS WEAKNESS?

Those who have no political prejudices involved can see little difference in policies of administration between Mr. Mellon or Mr. McAdoo, for illustration. Any President can destroy the effectiveness of the income tax by his Treasury appointee, and, judging results from recent history, there is no possibility of its being strengthened by any gentleman who has been closely connected with big business ventures and has the viewpoint comprehended in Jules Bache's frank statement that the average man of large affairs spends 11 months trying to avoid his income tax and 1 month in preparing his returns to that end.

Not all Secretaries of the Treasury are lax administrators, nor am I assuming to act as a critic excepting to state a tax problem that is serious to-day. Secretary Houston, for illustration, had the public viewpoint. Houston saw large tax evasions through stock dividends and surpluses that section 220 now tries to reach. He took the animal by the horns and asked Congress to pass a tax on undistributed net profits which he estimated would bring $690,000,000 additional Government revenue for 1921, as I stated in my letter to Mr. Mellon of October 23.

Congress was immediately besieged with lobbyists and propaganda against any such law. The secret records of the Treasury Department then disclosed to Secretary Houston the reasons for that propaganda, due in part to the unconscionable profits of Standard Oil and other companies that were being secretly laid away as surpluses, not to be reached by individual surtaxes. Houston could not disclose the situation to Congress but he did tell us how to protect the Treasury to the extent of $690,000,000 at that time and we refused to heed the warning or to indorse the taxing principle he urged.

TAXES RECOMMENDED IN LETTER OF NOVEMBER 26.

I have suggested in my letter of November 26 to Mr. Mellon that such a tax be adopted but it ought to be graduated from a small rate on small surpluses to the maximum rate of 20 per cent, where large percentages are laid aside. In my letter to Mr. Mellon I have presented a departmental failure and refusal to penalize in any case under section 220, and the only alternative is a specific tax.

If the income tax law proves ineffective through refusal by Congress to cure notorious weaknesses or refusal by political parties to place in the Treasury men who will strictly enforce the law, then the continued efforts by men of large means to escape their just proportion of tax may make a direct issue with the people of a capital tax now seriously pressed for passage in England.

Before discussing that tax or any other proposals beyond what have been suggested in my letter of November 26 to Mr. Mellon, I believe in all fairness it is right to set forth the argument of "wealth" that opposes any income tax or an inheritance tax and urges a substitute sales tax. In these tax policies Secretary Mellon quite generally agrees, as I have shown in my letter to him of November 22.

"WEALTH'S" CHAMPION.

Men of large business interests, of wealth, and of "brains," as they sometimes style themselves, find a notable champion in "The Things that are Caesar's," or "A Defense of Wealth," sent to every Congressman by G. M. Walker, whose other books on "Railroad Rates and Rebates"; "Measure of Civilization"; "Can We Escape War with Japan?" and similar contributions give an estimate of the scope of his observations and of his judgment.

Of this "Defense of Wealth," Albert J. Beveridge, a one-time senatorial candidate from Indiana, is quoted as saying:

The ablest, clearest, and most entertaining presentation I have read of the nature and function of wealth. It is sound and convincing, as it is brilliant and engaging.

Beveridge addressed many Hoosier audiences in favor of a sales tax with equal enthusiasm, so his judgment may be measured by his viewpoint and results rather than by superlatives.

C. W. Barron, the economist, rises to heights of eulogy when he says of Walker's "Defense of Wealth," "beside it Adam Smith's Wealth of Nations is mud." A Barron-Beveridge one-half per cent dry test, so to speak, can be determined by a few samples submitted. With these encomiums for wealth's champion I quote several extracts from the "Defense," and I suggest that every farmer whose average yearly wage in 1921 was $186 and every workman whose munificent pay only helps keep the wolf from the door should read this "Defense." Heretofore I had supposed wealth needed no defense, for handsome is as handsome does, and there is wealth and wealth, but this new Galilad defends all wealth with equal vigor.

WALKER'S BOOK "THE THINGS THAT ARE CAESAR'S."

In his defense of wealth under the above title imperfectly cribbed from the scriptures which Walker also misapplies when quoting the familiar advice of the Master, I find my recollection extends to a portion he forgot to give. In like manner the facts surrounding the quotation are recalled. When the coin of the realm representing Caesar's government was offered to trick the Master into an expression against Caesar, the wisest of them all replied: "Render unto Caesar the things that are Caesar's and unto the Lord the things that are the Lord's." The two governments—temporal and spiritual—were comprehended in that reply.

It requires a perverted vision like a perverted title to see in Rockefeller, our Republic, in Carnegie, our Constitution, and in Guggenheimer, our Government. This novel defense of wealth is a reminder of another incident, however, also found in Biblical lore, where the same Master chased the money changers out of the temple. He would need several regiments to accomplish that job during the present period. Caesar's coin of to-day has the imprint of the Goddess of Liberty with the familiar words "In God we trust." This sentiment seems strangely distorted into a notice of "heads I win and tails you lose" when that coin reaches the hands of Walker's clients, from whom once gripped it rarely departs. The modern world has progressed since the day when Rome and the Caesars went out of business because of conditions that are well to recall in this day and age and any efforts of the new champion of wealth to confuse our Government with his clients will find little sympathy from those who play a part, however small.

Walker sums up his conclusions on page 33 of his book when he says:

It has not been "labor" that has produced the wealth of the past 150 years but brains. It is not labor in the physical sense that is producing the wealth to-day but brains, etc.

The capitalization of brains in print and in business is given a conspicuous place in the succeeding pages. "Brains" did the business, he professes to show.

Incidentally he does not waste any time on the hundreds of university presidents and hundreds of thousands of teachers, many of whom are popularly supposed to have brains. Neither does he pause to mention a hundred thousand or more ministers of the Gospel, scientists, and men who have given their lives to humanity, many of whom do not annually draw one-fiftieth part of Secretary Mellon's $50,000 estimated daily income. Yet popularly they are assumed to possess brains.

Remembering Walker is discussing wealth, to the exclusion of labor and of brains that have not accumulated wealth, it is proper to give brief study to some pungent paragraphs that Beveridge says are sound and convincing, and Barron says make Adam's treatise look like "mud"—a substance from which Adam originally was made, according to high authority.

"A WAXING MAMMONISM" A PRESENT MENACE.

Walker proceeds to demolish the president of Cornell University, on page 34 of the defense, and quotes this eminent educator as saying:

To get and to have is not only the motto of the market but of the altar and of the hearth. We are coming to measure man—man with his heart and mind and soul—in terms of mere acquisition and possessions. A waning Christianity and a waxing mammonism are the twin specters of our age.

Concise but inelegantly answering the remarks quoted, Walker says, in effect, "tain't so." And Beveridge says Walker is brilliant, and Barron says all others are "mud."

Again quoting on page 33, Walker's defense says:

A prominent divine recently declared that "One-half of the wealth of the United States is controlled by about 1 per cent of the American people, and that is unjust. * * * There is a just discontent among the people with the present order of things, and the country's great wealth should be distributed more among the many that contributed to make it. * * * This is the question that must be settled by the intelligent men of the country."

Walker's defense says the "crux" of the problem is contained in the last sentence. And from that he deduces that "100,000" who have brains and wealth combined are to settle the matter for the remaining "99,000,000." Several of the latter, it is fair to assume, have "brains," have "education," have practiced "thrift" and "long hours," all of which requisites are noted by Walker to be possessed by wealth.

There are rich honest men, and there are gamblers who make a bare existence playing poker, and there are gamblers of no better education, thrift, or brains who play the stock market and take gamblers' chances who count themselves among Walker's select 100,000 that finally reach the blue-blooded inner circle financial 400. There is a Standard Oil that extorts 77½ per cent annual dividends from helpless men and women—aided by "brains," according to wealth's defense. Captain Kidd or Jesse James also had brains and were temporarily prosperous, but why offer further evidence to aid Walker's ingenuous defense?

HOW UNITED STATES STEEL STOCK WAS WATERED 200 PER CENT.

Mr. Walker defends about every monopoly proposition that has squeezed the American public in the past, but his view of business ethics and his test of brains is illustrated in a defense of the J. P. Morgan steel consolidation. I quote at some length. He says:

It is said that Mr. Carnegie was willing to sell his entire steel business for $100,000,000. This happens to be true. But it is then stated that the option falling through that Mr. Morgan offered to pay Mr. Carnegie $300,000,000 in 5 per cent bonds, and that because of this watering of the Carnegie holding in steel the people of this country must continue to pay $15,000,000 a year to Carnegie and his heirs forever.

Now, this second statement deliberately implies that the people of this country were not paying Mr. Carnegie anything at the time he was willing to sell for $100,000,000, but the truth was that Mr. Carnegie was and had been for some time getting a profit of more than $15,000,000 a year out of his steel business, but because of competition and the danger of overproduction the business was more or less hazardous, so Mr. Carnegie was entirely willing to sell his holdings in the steel business on a 15 per cent basis.

But those who knew Mr. Carnegie very naturally believed that if he had $100,000,000 in cash he would probably go back in the steel business, as it was the only business he knew, and it was then that Mr. Morgan conceived the idea of getting Mr. Carnegie to retire by giving him securities, the income on which would assure him $15,000,000 a year, the same as he had been getting out of the business before, with the distinct understanding that Mr. Carnegie would retire and would not reengage in the steel business. The facts are that Mr. Carnegie has been getting $15,000,000 a year out of the business for years, but the $15,000,000 has not been capitalized. Instead of the United States Steel Corporation imposing one dollar of additional tribute upon the users of steel in the United States, it merely assured to Mr. Carnegie upon his retiring the same income that he had been getting for years.

It has been charged that Andrew Carnegie gave the world nothing in return for $250,000,000 of bonds given him for his development of the steel business, but the truth is that when Carnegie began the development of the steel business iron rails were selling in this country for $130 a ton, and most of them were imported from England at that price. When Carnegie retired from the steel business he had reduced the cost of rails from $130 per ton for iron rails to $22 a ton for steel rails.

Walker's defense of the Carnegie deal that put a $200,000,000 extra steel burden on the American public may be read in connection with a recent report of profits on this kind of a watered capitalization. A $500,000,000 stock dividend is about to be declared, according to the press, by the same steel company, all of which half billion dollars the American public has paid in addition to extortionate profits on watered stock.

The concluding sentence of Walker's defense is worthy of thought when he deduces that the country owes Carnegie its thanks for reducing steel rails from $130 to $22 a ton. Walker does not show how much steel rails were reduced before or after Carnegie had pocketed the extra $200,000,000 to stay out of the business, nor what Carnegie did voluntarily to reduce prices. Nor is it clear that Carnegie was not forced to reduce steel prices to $22 because of home competition then still existing on steel production or because of foreign steel prices that sought American markets after paying a high protective tariff duty.

SHERLOCK WALKER, THE DEFECTIVE DETECTIVE.

Walker, who reflects the views of many others, finds one great cause for poverty lies in the lack of judgment and poor skill in buying. He states this so learnedly that I can but quote from page 48:

The poor do not buy by the ton or even by the half ton, but by the bag, the bushel, the pail, and, thinking to be economical, they buy the very poorest quality of coal and pay the small dealer, who delivers it to them by the bag or pail, at a rate that is often as much as 300 per cent above the ton price.

This is a distressing picture, but it is worthy of notice that the whole penalty of poverty is due to the woeful ignorance of the individuals, who suffer so as the result of their ignorance, and that in nothing that they do in wasting their money do the rich or near-rich profit.

Out of the length and breadth of Walker's experience he thus explains the lack of brains found in the $186 annual income farmer or the 5,000,000 unemployed of last year or the vast army of workmen who find any wage increase remains below its purchasing power before the war. In the face of such a defense of wealth what need be said?

WALKER ON PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT.

Walker's brain, that challenges the admiration of Barron-Beveridge, causes him to say on page 52:

President Roosevelt delivered an address before the students at Harvard, in which he railed at the men who did not do real work. Astonishing, for there was probably no man ever lived who knew less than Roosevelt the meaning of real work. It is doubtful if he ever earned a dollar in his life by physical toil or by the construction of anything. He never earned a dollar in his life in commerce or business of any kind and, dying, there is not a spot on earth that shows a dollar's worth of improvement or betterment that he produced.

If Roosevelt could arise and confront his old Indiana lieutenant Beveridge to-day, what would he say in his frank, terse way?

An advertisement for this unique book in defense of wealth, with recommendations of the Barron-Beveridge combination, will be found in the Evening Star of November 14 in the next column and in immediate juxtaposition to a large advertisement of Gulf Oil, that was charged with leading the melon-cutting contest inaugurated by Secretary Mellon.

WALKER AND WEALTH ON WAGE REDUCTION.

Another gem evolved by this defender of wealth reflects the effervescence of a brain test that gets past. Denouncing a raise of $400 per year to railway employees, which did not meet the average increase in nation-wide living costs, according to reputable authority, Walker says, page 105:

Now, if the $400 a year increased wages to each railroad employee had been made possible by some extra efficiency on the part of these employees or by some increased service to the rest of us, there would be some excuse for the raise of wages, but when it has been clearly shown that the increase in wages was granted to the railroad employees in response to a blackmailing threat on their part that they would deprive us of railroad service and when, as has been demonstrated, the increase in wages has resulted only in additional demands and threats and in decreased efficiency and less train service, then the rest of us have a right not only to demand that the wages be reduced to where they were before, but that they be reduced still lower to the point where they are no more than equivalent for the service that these railroad employees are grudgingly rendering to the rest of us.

Walker makes his demands for a wage reduction in the name of "the rest of us." Again, on page 129, Walker mourns because wealth can not find much to develop longer in this country not already well covered, but he sees hope from the fact that "far from discouraging the creation and accumulation of wealth, we must increase it and turn our surplus, our capital, to the developing of China as our own country has developed; to the development of Australia; to the development of Africa and South America."

From my letters to Secretary Mellon, Walker might also add, send our Army and Navy to protect Standard Oil's exploitations in Mesopotamia and Mexico and Central America and the Fiji Islands, and among the wild tribes of untamed Timbuctoo.

Reading, pipe dreaming, and believing that such stuff will be accepted by the American people, organized wealth continues unconscionable extortion, evidenced by the New Jersey Standard Oil's report of 775 per cent in 10 years. Such brain storms will not be accepted at 100 per cent value by the people who make laws under which wealth finds its protection.

PRESENT-DAY PROFITEERING ON THE GOVERNMENT.

The brains of big business had a hard strain when the Government, on top of a 400 per cent stock dividend and 220 per cent cash dividend to the New Jersey company, on November 14, this year, made an oil contract quoted by the Star of that date as follows:

Contracts for 10,000,000 barrels of fuel oil to be delivered by the Standard Oil Co. of New Jersey and 1,000,000 barrels to be delivered by the Texas company were awarded to-day by the Shipping Board. The prices fixed represent about 50 cents a barrel more than that paid in the last previous purchase. It is understood that the Standard Oil Co. of New Jersey in fulfilling its contract will secure the oil from California fields instead of from Mexico, as in the past.

Does it not seem criminally wrong that after giving away practically all our oil fields to Standard Oil and other oil companies, and on top of their extortionate profits in the past we now note an increase of 30 per cent on the average price to be paid by the Government to that company, or 50 cents more per barrel, with a nest egg of $5,500,000 increased profit paid by a Government Shipping Board, that is the last word in wasted public moneys?

Let me not appear in the rôle of a critic of men whom Roosevelt many years ago termed "malefactors of wealth." I am asking that such men do what Congress decrees by law the rest of the country must do, viz, pay their income taxes. Facts have been presented showing a flagrant violation of law, and the administrative officer, Secretary Mellon, refuses to impose the law.

More serious, Mr. Mellon is charged with starting the whole unprecedented melon-cutting race of surpluses that were secretly piled up for years, which facts were shown by the Treasury files and were known to Secretary Mellon alone.

Walker's "Defense of Wealth," from which I have briefly quoted, answers itself, but others have spoken on the same subject in such a comprehensive way that I rest the case with recognized authorities, headed by Roosevelt, while Walker's specious pleading in his quoted criticism of Roosevelt is a sufficient answer to his whole "Defense." Only one thing was needed to make a well-rounded indictment of the viewpoint of wealth, and that comes with its indorsement by such conspicuous worshippers of wealth as the Barron-Beveridge combination.

INDIVIDUAL WEALTH ONE THOUSAND TIMES THAT OF CROESUS.

Herewith is Klein's published estimate of a hundred or more of the richest families in the country. Its accuracy is not vouched for, but to a large extent it finds some verification in listed investments of these people. Neither is it suggested that possession of money, however large, under existing law or proposed law is improper:

Rockefeller (John D.), $2,500,000,000.
Astor, Du Pont, Guggenheim, Vanderbilt, $500,000,000 each.
Harkness, $400,000,000.
Mellon, Pratt, Weyerhaeuser, $300,000,000 each.
Armour, Ford, Goetz, Morgan, Payne-Whitney, Rockefeller (William), $200,000,000 each.
Baker, Brady, Carnegie, Clark, Field, Frick, Gould, Harriman, Hill, Swift, Taylor-Pyne, $150,000,000 each.
Berwind, Blair, Converse, Dodge, Flagler, Green, Heckscher, Kahn, McCormick, Penfield, Phipps, Ryan, Stotesbury, Widener, $100,000,000 each.
Dodge, Doheny, Drexel-Biddle, Duke, Ehret, Grace, Hearst, Huntington, James, Kennedy-Tod, Mills-Reid, Rogers, Rhineland, Roebing, Schiff, Stephenson, Stillman, Warburg, Warden-Bodine, Wendel, $75,000,000 each.
Agassiz, Altman, Appleby, Arbuckle, Archbold, Bedford, Belmont, Billings, Bingham, Bostwick, Bourne, Brewster, Brokaw, Brown, Busch, Chapin, Childs, Cochran, Colt, Coffin, Corey, Coxe, Crocker, Cudahy, Davis-Elkins, Deering, De Lamar, Doherty, Dolan, Dollar, Durant, Eastman, Edenborn, Elkins, Fair, Gerry, Haggin, Hanna, Havemeyer, Hayden, Higgins, Houston, Iselin, Jennings, Keith, Leeds, Lewisohn, Mackay, Macy, Maderia, McLean-Walsh, Miller, Ledyard, Moore, Morris, Oliver, Pabst, Peabody, Phelps, Pierce, Plant, Pullman, Pulitzer, Ream, Rosenwald, Sage, Schwab, Seranton, Sayles, Sears, Severance, Sewell, Shaw, Sinclair, Smith, Spreckels, Tilford, Untermyer, Walker, Watson, Watt, Whitney, Yawkey, $50,000,000 each.

If half true in fact, does it not seem a proper case for a higher estate tax?

The average small business man would be grateful for a thousandth part of the $50,000,000 average wealth of the last group, and to a majority of the people one ten-thousandth part would be wealth itself. If 100 families can hold this enormous wealth to-day, what will be the record a half century hence unless the Government exercises some control?

I do not express any personal opinion on the subject beyond what appears in my letters to Mr. Mellon, but I quote briefly from several men what they think of unlimited wealth and its menace.

EMINENT AUTHORITY ON NEED TO LIMIT WEALTH.

President Theodore Roosevelt, October, 1906, said:

As a matter of personal conviction, without pretending to discuss the details or formulate a system, I feel that we shall ultimately have to consider the adoption of some such scheme as that of a progressive tax on the fortunes beyond a certain amount, either given in life or devised or bequeathed beyond death to the individual—a tax so framed as to put it out of the power of the owner of one of those enormous fortunes to hand over more than a certain amount to an individual.

Who would the average American follow, the Roosevelt of 1906 or Mellon of 1922?

John Wanamaker, June, 1921, said:

No man ought to pile up money when there is no such need for it in the world. He can not take it with him beyond the grave. We have got to get nearer to God—with less Christianity and more of the real thing.

Take your choice between Wanamaker, the man of wealth, and Walker, the sycophant.

Dr. Frank Crane, a philosopher and man of "brains," says:

Mr. Rockefeller proves that it is possible under modern economic conditions for wealth to concentrate into the hands of a few. Are we going to allow that tendency to go unrestrained? Is Government ever justified in limiting the wealth of its citizens? If one suggests the limiting of private fortunes, is he necessarily an anarchist, an upsetter, or a dangerous radical?

Walker thinks so, Doctor; and Walker says he speaks for "wealth."

Mr. Hearst, in condemning contributions by Rockefeller and Carnegie to the so-called National Security League, said in 1919: "Congress should end this dollar despotism." I am informed Hearst has urged a 50 per cent tax on all inheritances over $20,000,000. Let me modestly recall that the exposition of the $600,000 "league" fund was brought about by my own resolution and its advocacy in the House.

Even Andrew Carnegie is reputed to have said in The Gospel of Wealth:

The almighty dollar bequeathed to children is an almighty curse. No man has a right to handicap his son with such a burden as great wealth.

When conscience gets to work possibly no man has a moral right to exact $200,000,000 from watered steel stock, as defended by Walker, but that is another story.

I could quote reputable authorities to the effect that "A private fortune of $50,000,000 is a menace to the Republic"; that is, if Joseph Pulitzer, whose fortune approached that figure, was a good judge. Why, $50,000,000—and what would Pulitzer say to Rockefeller's fifty times fifty million?

We know how to curb great wealth. Will we do it sanely, justly, intelligently, or will we blindly be afraid of being called what Crane terms "dangerous radicals," only to realize that some day will occur an inevitable smash, in which all, both rich and poor, may be involved?

ENGLAND AND A CAPITAL TAX.

A few days ago in England occurred an election, in which the Labor Party made gains before the British electorate of 85 per cent, or from 76 members to 141 members in the House of Commons. The principal issue there involved the imposition of a capital tax in addition to other heavy taxes now laid on England's wealth, reaching 40 per cent on inheritance alone. They have no sales tax in England, which was urged by our President to finance a soldiers' bonus bill, although England gave a bonus to its soldiers long ago. Labor asks for a capital tax in England, and if space permitted I could quote from F. W. Pethick Lawrence and A. C. Pigeon, M. A., professor of political economy, University of Cambridge, not an anarchist, and others, all tending to show that a capital tax, in their judgment, is both just and workable. It is based on the same principle as the estate tax, and although somewhat drastic in its immediate effect and not easily avoided, it is a final resort where great needs or great emergency demands.

Shaw, the writer and dramatist, says a capital tax is inevitable.

Even the staid New Statesmen (London), volume 19, No. 473, says in a leading editorial:

We have never been very enthusiastic supporters of a capital tax, but the trend of events suggests that it will have to come. The initiative, however, must come not from labor but from capital. A capital levy should promote productivity, and, after all, that is the only true measure of any nation's wealth and prosperity.

Many other reputable authorities could be quoted.

I do not and never have advocated a capital tax, but as between that kind of a tax and a consumption or sales tax there can be no doubt where the people of this country will stand. The capital tax is a taxing measure advocated in England by a considerable number of people, some of whom presumably possess what Walker terms "brains." In this country, with its reputed 20,000 millionaires, many of whom were war profiteering multimillionaires, is it a far cry from an extortionate net profit of 775 per cent by New Jersey Standard Oil in 10 years, or 77½ per cent annual net profit, and a 400 per cent tax-dodging stock dividend, to a stiff capital tax?

Adoption of tax proposals contained in my letter to Secretary Mellon of November 26 will tend to avoid any agitation by "rationals" or "radicals" for a capital tax, but notorious efforts to dodge and evade the present law after throwing every obstacle in the way of its passage will not quiet the present feeling of resentment against tax evasions.

HOW TO CONTROL MONOPOLY.

It is not a far step from the field of taxation of men and corporations to the control of wealth and monopoly urged by some of the authorities I have quoted. Due to a variety of causes, including our corporation laws, patent laws, seizure of natural resources, throttling of competition, railway rebates, and the natural cupidity of men supplemented with what Walker terms "brains," society recognizes monopoly has acquired a strangle hold on many activities of industry, and the only limitation in power and profits depends on a moderate fear of public resentment. Standard Oil of New Jersey, with 10 years' average net profits of 77½ per cent annually, is one example of how "moderate" the fear has become while accumulating $775,000,000 profits for this one company.

The Sherman antitrust law was passed to dissolve the units of that same oil monopoly and restore competition. How far that law was successful is shown by the Supreme Court's decision which supported the law but never "unscrambled the eggs" of the Standard Oil monopoly. Competition, of course, did not result and the 33 Standard Oil units are as much a part of the parent concern to-day as ever, while the monopoly found by the court to exist many years ago still flourishes like a mushroom, unchallenged and unlimited. What are you going to do about it?

The Armour Packing Co. asks the Attorney General if it can combine with other companies that maintain substantially the same production prices. A few days ago the Steel Corporation asked the same question and obtained the Attorney General's sanction, but was refused indorsement by the Federal Trade Commission because it aided monopoly. In other words, big business claims to be battered around from pillar to post in order to maintain a fictitious competition which was destroyed when price agreements became general.

It may be presumptuous to suggest any solution where monopoly notoriously exists and competition has ceased, while we cling to the husks of the Sherman antitrust law. What can be done to stop the squeezing of unconscionable profits by monopolies like the Standard Oil, with its 77½ per cent annual net profits; Atlantic Standard Oil, with 900 per cent surplus profits; United States Steel, with its half billion surplus on watered stock and Pittsburgh plus; packers' combine, and so forth. How protect the little fellow used as a foil, and yet put business on a right basis?

Where the patient's life and health depend on arresting a fatal cancerous growth that destroys all other life within its path, then the surgeon acts, leaving recuperation to sane, intelligent nursing and careful treatment. The patient here is the patient public.

CONTROL MONOPOLIES LIKE RAILWAYS.

Control of railway rates by States and by the Government was vigorously fought and opposed for many years until the doctrine of reasonable freight rates and regulation was enunciated by the courts on every question presented, and thereafter State commissions and the Interstate Commerce Commission took over the duties of rate making and service control. During that period men favoring Government railway control were termed "agitators," "radicals," "socialists," and dangerous to society. The railways then varied largely in earnings, valuation, and other factors considered in rate making, but all these difficulties were met and surmounted by legislation and administration under strict Government regulation of service and profits.

The roads were no more a monopoly then than are many industries to-day, and it is as useless to seek separation or dissolution of a monopoly of one class of business now, as of railroads then, because no competition exists with monopoly. Every situation where competition has disappeared and prices and profits lie in the hands of a central agency should be met by Government price control and regulation, and if any constitutional or statutory authority is required to place monopolies under close control as to profits, service, and needed limitations, it is reasonably certain that the American people who pay the bills that make the profits will afford all needed legislation.

I need not justify by innumerable precedents, but the Ball Rent Act was passed by Congress to control sporadic District profiteering; the fuel, packer, and other similar acts, including control of gas, water, insurance, transportation, and utilities generally, have been comparatively of recent date. We are now faced on every hand by unrestricted profiteering when big business prophesies increasing prices will follow, governed only by the limits of human cupidity. Public interests are involved when Standard Oil, on top of a 77½ per cent annual profit, increases its extortionate profits by charging the Government 30 per cent more in November, 1922, for fuel oil, in the case I have previously cited. To this may be added enormous profits and tax rebates reaching many additional millions if the pending Standard Oil ship subsidy bill becomes a law.

Control of monopoly is founded on a well-grounded principle that can not be nibbled at spasmodically. It is a right that must be firmly fixed for all time by adequate law, and a bill to that end is submitted for consideration.

A MONOPOLY CONTROL COMMISSION.

Commissions of the type of the Interstate Commerce, Federal Trade, and Tariff Commission have paved the way for a comprehensive governmental body that can gradually work out restrictions, limitations, and an assurance of reasonable profits far below 77½ per cent, or, say, nearer one-tenth of that rate, on the capital invested or whatever plan is decided upon. I believe this, briefly stated, is a solution to the monopoly problem that must be solved.

The plan does not contemplate having the Government muddle the business by attempted management nor does it prevent consolidations which might then be permitted where now a prohibitory antitrust law weakly seeks to prevent what we know exists, and will continue to exist, for competition vanishes with monopoly. The fundamental right to control and regulate by the Government exists and it is well to act intelligently—not by smashing industries but by sane, effective regulation.

Briefly and with some diffidence I have sought to point out recognized weaknesses in our economic system and to suggest tax legislation and other means of remedying conditions. Any plan or proposal is certain to provoke opposition and criticism, as ever in the past, but the sooner the problem is squarely faced and justly solved the earlier will we enjoy solid economic prosperity that will be a real and not a reflected benefit to the general public.

WHAT WILL WE DO ABOUT IT?

Wall Street reports say 54 corporations within the last 30 days have declared a distribution of surplus earnings in the form of stock dividends that will escape surtaxes to the amount of $1,200,000,000. More stock dividends are promised, including United States Steel, that is said to have $500,000,000 surplus waiting distribution by the stock-dividend route and based on a watered capitalization. This stupendous amount of profits is in addition to past cash dividends paid on stock.

The evidence of enormous profiteering disclosed within 90 days calls for specific legislation that will control prices and service where a monopoly or price agreement to prevent competition is found to exist and will make all public records public in fact. These exactions by monopoly have occurred under the Sherman antitrust law that is notoriously ineffective.

We can not longer blind ourselves to conditions, and I have offered a proposed control bill that speaks for itself. No corporation and no interest not engaged in open or secret price fixing or monopoly need fear such proposal if enacted into law, and it is offered for the protection of over a hundred million people who to-day are common prey for profiteering interests like those disclosed in the Mellon correspondence.

The proposed bill (H. R. 13091) is as follows:

A BILL TO CONTROL MONOPOLIES.

Be it enacted, etc., That a commission is hereby created, to be known as the monopoly control commission, and hereinafter referred to as the commission. The commission shall be composed of nine commissioners, to be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate; said commission shall annually elect one of its members as chairman and one as vice chairman.

The first commissioners shall continue in office for terms of 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, and 10 years, respectively, from the date of their appointment, the term of each to be designated by the President, but their successors shall be appointed for terms of 10 years, except that any person chosen to fill a vacancy shall be appointed only for the unexpired term of the commissioner whom he succeeds.

The commissioners shall be appointed with due regard to their fitness for the efficient discharge of the duties imposed on them by this act and to a fair representation of the geographical division of the country. Not more than six of the commissioners shall be appointed from the same political party. No commissioner shall engage in any other business, vocation, or employment. Any commissioner may be removed at any time by joint resolution of Congress after notice and hearing when, in the judgment of Congress, such commissioner has become permanently incapacitated or has been inefficient or guilty of neglect of duty or of malfeasance in office or of any felony or conduct involving moral turpitude, and for no other cause and in no other manner except by impeachment: Provided, however, That not more than two removals shall be made by joint resolution during any regular or special session of Congress. A vacancy in the commission shall not impair the right of the remaining members of the commission to exercise all its powers. The commission shall have an official seal, which shall be judicially noticed.

[NOTE.—The above section has been adapted from the Shipping Board act of September 7, 1916 (39 Stat. 729, sec. 3), and the Budget act of June 10, 1921 (42 Stat. 24, sec. 303).]

SEC. 2. That each commissioner shall receive a salary of $10,000 a year, payable in the same manner as the salaries of the judges of the courts of the United States. The commission shall appoint a secretary, who shall receive a salary of $6,000 a year, payable in like manner; and it shall have authority to employ and fix the compensation of such attorneys, special experts, examiners, clerks, and other employees as it may from time to time find necessary for the proper performance of its duties and as may be from time to time appropriated for by Congress.

With the exception of the secretary, a clerk to each commissioner, the attorneys, and such special experts and examiners as the commission may from time to time find necessary for the conduct of its work, all employees of the commission shall be a part of the classified civil service, and shall enter the service under such rules and regulations as may be prescribed by the commission and by the Civil Service Commission.

All of the expenses of the commission, including all necessary expenses for transportation incurred by the commissioners or by their employees under their orders, in making any investigation, or upon official business in any other places than in the city of Washington, shall be allowed and paid on the presentation of itemized vouchers therefor approved by the chairman of the commission.

[NOTE.—The above section has been adapted from the Federal Trade Commission act of September 26, 1914 (38 Stat. 718, sec. 2).]

SEC. 3. (a) That the words "interstate commerce" as used in this act shall be construed to mean commerce between any State, Territory, or possession, or the District of Columbia and any place outside thereof; or between points within the same State, Territory, or possession, or the District of Columbia but through any place outside thereof; or wholly within any Territory or possession or the District of Columbia.

(b) That combinations or conspiracies to monopolize the sale or fix the price of any commodity or commodities in interstate commerce are declared to be affected with a national public interest and subject to regulation as hereinafter provided.

(c) That it shall be the duty of the commission, either on petition by any person, firm, corporation, or other association or organization, or on its own motion, to investigate and determine whether or not any person, firm, or corporation, or any combination or association of persons, firms, or corporations, is engaging or attempting to engage in any of the practices mentioned in subdivision (b) above.

(d) That the commission shall, before making any determination under subdivision (c) above, give notice to each person, firm, corporation, or association whose practices are to be investigated, and shall give a full hearing to all interested parties.

THE MEAT IN THE COCONUT.

(e) That if the commission shall, after a full hearing as provided in subdivision (d) above, determine that any practices investigated constitute a monopoly, or an attempt to create a monopoly, or a fixing of prices, or an attempt to fix prices, with respect to any commodity or commodities in interstate commerce, it shall make public declaration to that effect.

(f) That after a declaration has been made by the commission, as provided in subdivision (e) above, that there is a monopoly or price fixing agreement, or attempt to create a monopoly, or to fix prices by open or secret agreement, with respect to any commodity or commodities in interstate commerce, the commission shall thereupon and thereafter be authorized to issue an order prescribing the maximum price which may be charged for such commodity or commodities in interstate commerce, and may further order any improvement and change in service for the public benefit that may be found to be necessary. Such order may apply to the United States and its possessions as a whole, or within any specified part or parts thereof, according as the commission may determine.

(g) That the commission may at any time, after a hearing similar to that prescribed in subdivision (d) above, determine that conditions of monopoly or attempted price fixing no longer exist with respect to any commodity, and in case of such determination shall rescind its order fixing a maximum price for such commodity; or the commission may, after a like hearing, modify its order by increasing or reducing the maximum price previously fixed by it, or increasing or diminishing the area with respect to which such order shall apply.

(h) That no declaration or order shall be made by the commission, under any provision of this section, unless the same is concurred in by at least five commissioners and at least two-thirds of the commissioners voting. No such order shall take effect until it has been published once a week for three weeks in a newspaper in each of two cities within the area affected, and the commission is hereby authorized and directed to provide for such publication of all its declarations and orders. A majority less than two-thirds may determine what investigations shall be taken up by the commission at any time and may adopt rules and regulations in regard to procedure and the conduct of business not inconsistent with the provisions of this section.

APPEALS.

(i) That every order made by the commission under the provisions of this section shall be final and conclusive, unless within 60 days after the first publication of such order any person, firm, or corporation affected by such order files with the circuit court of appeals for the circuit in which he has his principal place of business a written petition praying that the order be set aside or modified in the manner stated in the petition, together with a bond conditioned that if the finding of the commission is sustained by the final court to which appeal is made that then there shall be paid to the Secretary of the Treasury an amount fixed in the bond of at least double the difference between the price of the commodity or commodities covered by the decision as charged by the corporation or corporations immediately prior to the commission's decision and the price thereafter fixed by the commission, to be based on the total sales of such commodities by such corporation or firm as named in subdivision (c) for one year immediately prior to such decision. And the judgment of the court of the amount to be named in such bond shall not be subject to appeal.

That if final decision by the court is not reached within one year from notice of appeal, then a further and additional bond shall be filed immediately by the appellant of like character and amount, to be determined in like manner by the court, and failure to file any bond at the time provided by law shall automatically place in effect the price schedule theretofore determined by the commission. That if any needless delay in bringing such cause to trial or final hearing is alleged by the commission or any member thereof and on public hearing on 10 days' notice found by the court to be true, then the bond or bonds immediately shall become due and payable and judgment of forfeiture shall be rendered thereon by the court without right of review or appeal, and the price schedule fixed by the commission shall thereupon automatically be in force without further notice. Such bond shall further provide that the petitioner will pay the costs of the proceedings if the court so directs. The clerk of the court shall, upon filing of the bond and petition, immediately cause a copy of the petition to be delivered to the commission, and the commission shall forthwith prepare, certify, and file in the court a full and accurate transcript of the record of the proceedings before the commission. The evidence so certified and filed shall be considered by the court as the evidence in the case. The proceedings in such cases in the circuit court of appeals shall be made a preferred cause and shall be expedited in every way. The court may affirm, modify, or set aside the order of the commission. The decree of the court shall be final, except that it shall be subject to review by the Supreme Court of the United States upon certiorari, as provided in section 240 of the Judicial Code, if such writ is duly applied for within 60 days after entry of the decree. For the purposes of this subsection the term "circuit court of appeals," in case the principal place of business of the petitioner is in the District of Columbia, means the Court of Appeals of the District of Columbia.

PENALTY.

(k) Any person, firm, or corporation who sells or offers for sale in interstate commerce, within the area covered by any subsisting and valid order of the commission, any commodity at a price in excess of the maximum price fixed by such order shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and on conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine of not exceeding $5,000 or (if a natural person) by imprisonment for not exceeding one year, or by both such fine and imprisonment. In the case of such unlawful sale or offer for sale by a firm or corporation, any partner, officer, agent, or other person representing such firm or corporation, who has participated in any way in the attempt to make such unlawful sale or offer for sale, shall be subject to the penalty herein provided, except in the case of an agent or employee acting upon the written direction of a superior within the jurisdiction of the United States, in which case such superior only shall be liable to the penalty. Each sale or offer for sale, and each delivery in the case of one contract of sale requiring delivery at different times, shall constitute a separate offense.

SEC. 4. That for the purposes of this act the commission or its duly authorized agent or agents shall at all reasonable times have access to, for the purpose of examination, and the right to copy, any documentary evidence of any person, firm, or corporation being investigated or proceeded against; and the commission shall have power to require by subpoena the attendance and testimony of witnesses and the production of all such documentary evidence relating to any matter under investigation. Any member of the commission may sign subpoenas, and members and examiners of the commission may administer oaths and affirmations, examine witnesses, and receive evidence.

Such attendance of witnesses and the production of such documentary evidence may be required from any place in the United States, at any designated place of hearing. And in case of disobedience to a subpoena the commission may invoke the aid of any court of the United States in requiring the attendance and testimony of witnesses and the production of documentary evidence.

Any of the district courts of the United States within the jurisdiction of which such inquiry is carried on may, in case of contumacy or refusal to obey a subpoena issued to any person, firm, or corporation, issue an order requiring such person, firm, or corporation to appear before the commission, or to produce documentary evidence if so ordered, or to give evidence touching the matter in question; and any failure to obey such order of the court may be punished by such court as a contempt thereof.

Upon the application of the Attorney General of the United States, at the request of the commission, the district courts of the United States shall have jurisdiction to issue writs of mandamus commanding any person, firm, or corporation to comply with the provisions of this act or any order of the commission made in pursuance thereof.

TESTIMONY AND WITNESSES.

The commission may order testimony to be taken by deposition in any proceeding or investigation pending under this act at any stage of such proceeding or investigation. Such depositions may be taken before any person designated by the commission and having power to administer oaths. Such testimony shall be reduced to writing by the person taking the deposition, or under his direction, and shall then be subscribed by the deponent. Any person may be compelled to appear and depose and to produce documentary evidence in the same manner as witnesses may be compelled to appear and testify and produce documentary evidence before the commission as hereinbefore provided.

Witnesses summoned before the commission shall be paid the same fees and mileage that are paid witnesses in the courts of the United States, and witnesses whose depositions are taken and the persons taking the same shall severally be entitled to the same fees as are paid for like services in the courts of the United States.

No person shall be excused from attending and testifying or from producing documentary evidence before the commission or in obedience to the subpoena of the commission on the ground or for the reason that the testimony or evidence, documentary or otherwise, required of him may tend to criminate him or subject him to a penalty or forfeiture. But no natural person shall be prosecuted or subjected to any penalty or forfeiture for or on account of any transaction, matter, or thing concerning which he may testify or produce evidence, documentary or otherwise, before the commission in obedience to a subpoena issued by it: Provided, That no natural person so testifying shall be exempt from prosecution and punishment for perjury committed in so testifying.

Any officer or employee of the commission who shall make public any information obtained by the commission without its authority, unless directed by a court, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and, upon conviction thereof, shall be punished by a fine of not exceeding $5,000 or by imprisonment not exceeding one year, or by both such fine and imprisonment.

SEC. 6. That the Federal Trade Commission or any other department or agency of the Government having in its possession any records, papers, or information relating to any person or corporation being investigated or proceeded against under the provisions of this act shall, when directed by the President, furnish the commission any such records, papers, or information as it may request. The President may also direct the detail to the commission from time to time of officials and employees from any executive department or independent establishment of the Government.

COMMITTEE SERVICE.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, I desire to have a unanimous-consent order entered making some committee assignments on this side of the Chamber. Since the close of the second session, on account of the death of former Senator Watson, of Georgia, and the election of the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD] to fill a vacancy, there are two Senators on this side without committee assignments. The only committee assignments that we had were those left by the death of Senator Watson, vacancies on the Committee on Civil Service, the Committee on Claims, the Committee on Immigration, and the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads. To help us in the matter, and in order that we might give both new Senators assignments, the senior Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] has very kindly offered to resign from the Committee on the District of Columbia. I therefore ask that the resignation of the Senator from Ohio from the Committee on the District of Columbia may be accepted, and that a unanimous-consent order may be made assigning to the Senator from Georgia [Mr. GEORGE] the vacancies on the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, the Committee on Immigration, and the Committee on Civil Service, and to the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD] the vacancy on the Committee on the District of Columbia caused by the resignation of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] and the vacancy on the Committee on Claims caused by the death of former Senator Watson, of Georgia.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection the order will be entered by unanimous consent.

Mr. POMERENE, on his own request, was excused from further service as a member of the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. UNDERWOOD's order was reduced to writing, as follows:

Ordered, That Mr. GEORGE be assigned to service on the following committees of the Senate, viz, Civil Service, Immigration, and Post Offices and Post Roads, and that Mr. BAYARD be assigned to service on the Committee on Claims and the Committee on the District of Columbia.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. TOWNSEND presented a resolution of the Army and Navy Club, of Detroit, Mich., protesting against any further reduction of the armed forces of the United States, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also presented a resolution of the Michigan Annual Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church, at Albion, Mich.,

favoring the enactment of legislation providing for compulsory Sunday observance in the District of Columbia, which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

He also presented a resolution of the Michigan Annual Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church, at Albion, Mich., favoring an amendment of the Constitution prohibiting polygamy, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a resolution of the Michigan Annual Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church, at Albion, Mich., favoring an amendment of the Constitution providing uniform marriage and divorce laws, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. LADD presented petitions of Carl Lindholm and 3 others, of Lisbon; John Heupel and 27 others, of Medina; Frank Dvorak and 4 others, of Center; John Weber and 31 others, of Temvick; A. L. Smoody and 9 others, of Courtenay; R. I. Emerson and 7 others, of Drady; Jerrie Mezet and 25 others, of Beach; Mrs. J. C. Howden and 6 others, of Sutton; August Widmer, sr., and 20 others, of Crete; Sam Larson and 27 others, of Lankin; Iver Jacobsen and 5 others, of Nome; John Dox and 9 others, of Bindord; George Greatsinger and 23 others, of McHenry; Emil Richter, sr., and 9 others, of New Salem; Peter Kitzinger and 7 others, of Oakes; J. H. N. Schmit and 27 others, of Kenmare; H. A. Kariger and 19 others, of Fessenden; and Millie Volbrecht and 55 others, of Kramer, all in the State of North Dakota, favoring the enactment of legislation stabilizing the price of wheat, which were referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

RETIREMENT OF ASSOCIATE JUSTICE PITNEY.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, from the Committee on the Judiciary, I report back favorably, without amendment the bill (S. 4025) to permit Mahlon Pitney, an Associate Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, to retire, and I ask for its present consideration. I also ask leave to make a brief statement.

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole, and it was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the provisions of the Judicial Code, section 260, as amended by the act of February 25, 1919, chapter 29, section 6, be, and they are hereby, extended and made applicable to Mahlon Pitney, an Associate Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, in consequence of his physical disability, notwithstanding he has not attained the age of 70 years as required by the aforesaid provisions: Provided, however, That the said Mahlon Pitney shall resign the said office of Associate Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States within two months after the passage of this act.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, if the Senator from Minnesota will permit me, personally I understand the case and am favorable to the bill, but it is an important measure and, while I have no objection to it, I think there should be some explanation placed on the record of the Senate before we pass it.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I will make a brief explanation.

The evidence before the committee was submitted in the form of the certificates of four prominent physicians. Those certificates indicate that Justice Pitney is suffering, first, from a hardening of the arteries; second, from Bright's disease; and, third, that he has had a stroke of apoplexy. Everything indicates that he is incapacitated and will be incapacitated for performing any such labor as is required of a Justice of the Supreme Court. I have the original certificates before me, but unless Senators care about it, I shall not take the time to read them.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I think the explanation is entirely satisfactory and I would suggest that the Senator have the certificates printed in the RECORD.

Mr. NELSON. I submit the certificates for printing in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the certificates will be printed in the RECORD.

The certificates are as follows:

MORRISTOWN, N. J., October 27, 1922.

DEAR MR. CHIEF JUSTICE: I have been attending Justice Pitney since August 1. He is suffering from cerebral arterial sclerosis and chronic nephritis, and on August 10 he had a mild attack of cerebral thrombosis from which he has partially rallied.

I believe that any mental effort would aggravate his condition and result seriously.

The consulting physicians agree with this conclusion.

Yours respectfully,

WILLIAM A. MCMURTRIE, M. D.

NEWARK, N. J., October 31, 1922.

MY DEAR MR. CHIEF JUSTICE: Yesterday I saw Mr. Pitney for the third time since August in conjunction with his physician, Doctor McMurtrie.

Mr. Pitney has had at least one light "stroke" due either to thrombus or an embolus. At present his condition is poor. He has, as the fundamental cause of illness, a general arteriosclerosis (hardening of the arteries), affecting in particular those blood vessels which supply the brain.

With this there are (1) a moderate degree of chronic nephritis (Bright's disease, so called) and (2) considerable enlargement of the heart.

The outlook for prolongation of life is uncertain, but fair—for resumption of any physical or mental activity in the immediate or remote future, very poor. There is almost no chance that he can return to any active mental work, nor do I believe that it will ever be advisable for him to attempt it. Even in the highly improbable event of a great improvement over his present condition, the strain of mental activity involving matters of weight and responsibility could only be harmful and dangerous for him.

Very truly yours,

GEORGE H. LATHROPE, M. D.

To CHIEF JUSTICE WILLIAM H. TAFT,
Supreme Court of the United States,
Washington, D. C.

NEW YORK, November 1, 1922.

Mrs. MAHLON PITNEY,
73 Miller Road, Morristown, N. J.

DEAR MRS. PITNEY: In accordance with your request for a statement as to Mr. Justice Pitney's condition, permit me to report as follows:

The justice is afflicted by and is suffering from an advanced and a widespread arteriosclerosis. His blood pressure is very high and is likely to remain so permanently. The heart is considerably hypertrophied and is laboring under an augmented stress by reason of the high blood pressure.

The arterial degeneration has visibly affected the arteries of the retina of each eye; and most unfortunately, certain of the cerebral arteries have also been seriously involved.

These degenerative lesions of the arteries are permanent and largely irreparable.

They can not be revoked or repaired by any known human agency; and yet their progress and subsequent risk may be greatly retarded, reduced, or possibly arrested by long continued and complete rest.

I am heartily sorry to write you that I believe Mr. Justice Pitney to be permanently incapacitated for work of any great responsibility; that it would seem to be utterly impossible for him to resume the serious duties of his judicial office; and that an attempt at the resumption of his judicial tasks might result disastrously.

Very respectfully yours,

EVAN M. EVAN.

WASHINGTON, D. C.

The honorable the CHIEF JUSTICE,
United States Supreme Court, Washington, D. C.:

I hereby certify that I have this day again made a thorough examination of Mr. Justice Pitney, and that I find his mental and physical condition such that I have no hesitation in positively asserting that he will never be competent to resume his former duties on the Supreme Bench.

Mr. Justice Pitney has been under my professional care since April, 1913. At that early date, and when I first saw him, he presented signs of chronic Bright's disease, as evidenced by an elevated blood pressure, slight hardening of his arteries, enlarged heart, urine with low specific gravity, a trace of albumin, and numerous hyaline casts. The disease has been slowly progressive through all these years, during which time I have watched him carefully and frequently. For the past two years his condition has been rather precarious in that his arteries have been very much hardened, his blood pressure very high, his heart very much enlarged, and his kidneys showing deterioration. In March last he had a clot in one of the blood vessels of his brain, which resulted in a marked breakdown together with difficulty in speech. In August last, while he was away from the city, he had another stroke from which he is still invalided. There is a marked residue of mental deterioration as well as physical. The mental deterioration having now lasted for a period of eight months, it is incumbent upon me to assert with positiveness that he can not become mentally competent in the future to undertake responsible duties either on or off the bench.

NOVEMBER 23, 1922.

B. L. HARDIN.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

UNAUTHORIZED MEDALS AND BADGES.

Mr. WADSWORTH. From the Committee on Military Affairs I report back favorably without amendment the bill (S. 4036) to prohibit the unauthorized wearing, manufacture, or sale of medals and badges awarded by the War Department, and I submit a report (No. 930) thereon. I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill.

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole, and it was read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That hereafter the wearing, manufacture, or sale of the congressional medal of honor, distinguished service cross, distinguished service medal, or any of the service medals or badges awarded by the War Department, or the ribbon, button, or rosette thereof of the form as is or may hereafter be prescribed by the Secretary of War, or of any colorable imitation thereof, is prohibited, except when authorized under such regulations as the Secretary of War may prescribe.

Any person who offends against the provisions of this section shall, on conviction, be punished by a fine not exceeding $250 or by imprisonment not exceeding six months, or by both such fine and imprisonment.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I ask that the report of the Committee on Military Affairs in connection with the bill just passed may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the report (No. 930), this day submitted by Mr. WADSWORTH, was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PROHIBITING UNAUTHORIZED WEARING OF DECORATIONS.

The Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 4036) to prohibit the unauthorized wearing, manufacture, or sale of medals and badges awarded by the War Department, having considered the same, report thereon favorably and recommend that the bill do pass.

This measure is recommended by the War Department, and its necessity is fully set forth in a letter from the Secretary which is appended hereto and made a part of this report as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, October 11, 1922.

The CHAIRMAN COMMITTEE ON MILITARY AFFAIRS,
United States Senate.

SIR: I have the honor to invite your attention to the attached draft of a bill to protect the decorations and service medals issued by the War Department, and request, if the provisions of the bill meet the approval of your committee, that it be introduced in the Senate.

The necessity for the proposed legislation is well stated by the Acting Judge Advocate General as follows:

"1. The design of the congressional medal of honor was patented November 22, 1904, under No. 37236, and the patent transferred to the United States December 28, 1904. This patent expired by limitation November 21, 1918, and the design is now subject to public use.

"2. The designs of the distinguished service cross, distinguished service medal, and the service medals awarded for service in various wars are not protected by patent.

"3. In a recent case on this subject, which was referred to this office for opinion, it was necessary to hold that the only legal means of protection against the unauthorized use of the design of the congressional medal of honor as the basis of a design for the badge of a society of ex-soldiers was by recourse to the provisions of section 125 of the act of June 3, 1916, and the regulation promulgated in Army Regulations 600-45, as amended by changes No. 1, July 17, 1922. Such indirect means of protecting the unauthorized use of the decorations mentioned herein is of doubtful efficacy, because it involves extending the law to lengths not contemplated when the law in question was passed. Such means are further objectionable because, even if successful in a particular case, they would block only one of several avenues that lead inevitably to cheapening the decorations in question.

"4. If the decorations of honor and the service medals awarded by the War Department are to continue to serve the high purpose for which they are intended, they are worthy of being protected. Since there is no provision of law applicable for the further patent protection of the design of the congressional medal of honor, and since such patent protection of the design of the distinguished service cross, distinguished service medal, and service medals would afford only temporary relief, it is suggested that suitable legislative action be initiated for the protection of the design of the decorations in question."

A copy of the inclosed bill has been forwarded to the chairman Committee on Military Affairs of the House of Representatives, requesting that it be introduced in the House.

Respectfully,

JOHN W. WEEKS,
Secretary of War.

BILLS AND A JOINT RESOLUTION INTRODUCED.

Bills and a joint resolution were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. SHORTRIDGE:

A bill (S. 4069) to authorize the construction of a railroad bridge across the Colorado River near Yuma, Ariz.; to the Committee on Commerce.

By Mr. TOWNSEND:

A bill (S. 4070) for the relief of Henry T. Shafer; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. POMERENE:

A bill (S. 4071) for the relief of David C. Van Voorhis; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. BALL:

A bill (S. 4072) to establish a board of indeterminate sentence and parole for the District of Columbia and to determine its functions, and for other purposes; to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

By Mr. McCUMBER:

A bill (S. 4073) to amend section 2238 of the Revised Statutes (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys.

By Mr. HARRISON:

A bill (S. 4074) conferring jurisdiction upon the Court of Claims to hear and determine the claim of Mary Ella Webster; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. McKELLAR:

A bill (S. 4075) to amend an act entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act for making further and more effectual provision for the national defense, and for other purposes,' approved June 3, 1916, and to establish military justice," approved June 4, 1920; and

A bill (S. 4076) to amend an act entitled "An act making appropriations for military and nonmilitary activities of the War Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923, and for other purposes," approved June 30, 1922; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

DELAWARE RIVER MEMORIAL BRIDGE.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, the National Washington Crossing Commission, an organization created for the purpose of memorializing the historical event of Washington crossing the Delaware, have devised a plan for a memorial bridge at that point. I introduce a joint resolution providing that the United States Government shall make an appropriation to share in the project and ask that it be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 249) providing for the construction of a memorial bridge across the Delaware River at the point where Washington and his troops crossed said stream on the night of December 25 and the day of December 26, 1776, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

MARY M. BREWER.

Mr. LODGE. I submit a resolution to be referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

The resolution (S. Res. 369) was read as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to pay, out of the contingent fund of the Senate, to Mary M. Brewer, widow of Hiram H. Brewer, late foreman in the Senate folding room, a sum equal to one year's compensation at the rate he was receiving by law at the time of his death; said sum to be considered as including funeral expenses and all other allowances.

Mr. LODGE. I wish to say before the resolution goes to the committee that it proposes to pay one year's salary as compensation to the widow. Mr. Brewer was 39 years in the service of the Senate. He was a soldier of the Civil War, and I think that his very long service, as in one or two other cases, entitles the widow to a year's salary instead of six months, as is usually given to the family of a deceased employee of the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

ADDRESS BY EX-SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY M'ADOO.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, on Armistice Day last a most interesting address was delivered by the late Secretary of the Treasury, Hon. William G. McAdoo, upon the subject of legislation affecting the ex-service men. Mr. McAdoo was intimately connected with the work of the World War in many of its most important phases. I ask that this address may be printed in the Record in 8-point type.

Mr. SMOOT. I ask the Senator from Montana whether the address refers to any subject matter other than soldiers of the late World War?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. It does not. The meeting at which the address was delivered was under the auspices of the American Legion.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the Record in 8-point type, as follows:

SPEECH DELIVERED BY HON. WM. G. M'ADOO ON ARMISTICE DAY, NOVEMBER 11, 1922, AT FULLERTON, CALIF., UNDER THE AUSPICES OF THE AMERICAN LEGION POSTS OF ORANGE COUNTY.

This is the fourth anniversary of a memorable day in human history. November 11, 1918, signalized not alone the ending of the greatest war in the annals of mankind, but it marked the beginning of a new era in civilization.

The European war had its origin in causes which were distinctly alien to American ideals and traditions. Conflicting national interests and ambitions, secret alliances and counter-alliances which sought to gain political, economic, and military advantages to those concerned, racial and national hatreds engendered by centuries of strife, resulted in a final death grapple between two opposing principles of government—autocracy on the one hand and democracy on the other. For generations all Europe had been an armed camp. England, the greatest military power on the high seas; Germany, the greatest military power on land; and France, Italy, Belgium, Russia, Austria, Turkey, and the Balkan States, all armed to the teeth, awaited only the explosive to set in motion the mightiest machine for human slaughter ever operated in the history of mankind. The explosion came in August, 1914, and the world was thrown into a colossal convulsion from which it has now only partially emerged.

ISOLATION COULD NOT KEEP AMERICA OUT OF WORLD WAR.

America had nothing to do with the controversies or causes which lead up to this great disaster. By tradition and by consistent policy we had never been a military power. We had never maintained a large standing army, but with the growth of powerful foreign navies and because of our extended coast line, we had gradually built up a formidable modern navy of our own. But its primary purpose was self-defense and not aggression. We believed that our remoteness from the fields of foreign wars rendered us immune from embroilment or attack. But we had not taken into consideration the fact that our growth as a nation had necessarily made us a powerful factor in world commerce, and that our security and prosperity were dependent upon the maintenance of our rights upon the high seas and upon uninterrupted intercourse with all parts of the world. When the European clash came, we declared our neutrality and sought, by every peaceful means, to maintain it. But the most powerful of the European belligerents began to encroach upon our neutral rights whenever they found that it was to their advantage to do so. We quickly discovered that it was impossible to isolate America. She was an integral part of world economy, her products were in demand by all the nations; she had a right as a neutral to trade with them; and she refused to yield any of her vital rights to escape collision with any challenger or upon the behest of any despot. She was one of the most important members of the family of nations, and she could neither shirk her responsibilities nor avoid the consequences. Disregard of America's rights by all of the belligerents produced a continuing tension which finally culminated in the destruction by one of the great powers of the lives and property of American citizens on the high seas in violation of the accepted rules of international warfare, and no alternative was left except to draw the sword.

AMERICA'S ACTION AN INSPIRING SPECTACLE.

April 6, 1917, Congress passed the fateful resolution that threw America into the World War and made her a party belligerent in the greatest conflict of all time on a field of action more than 3,000 miles from the Atlantic seaboard. With characteristic patriotism and energy the Nation sprang to arms. One of the most inspiring spectacles of all history was presented when the most powerful and peaceful democracy of all the ages transformed itself, with incredible celerity and efficiency, into an irresistible military machine. The young David of democracy was matched in mortal combat with the mailed Goliath of autocracy. Democracy won the battle, and we to-day celebrate the victory.

ARE WE UNEQUAL TO OUR IDEALS?

But have we realized the thing for which we fought primarily; the thing which lit the crusaders' fire in the hearts of our people; the thing which has been the Christian dream of centuries; the thing without which civilization is still imperiled; the thing which, above all things, would bring the greatest blessings to the human race—the destruction of war itself and the enthronement of enduring peace? We have not. America failed to follow up the victory. The greatest tragedy of human hopes was written when she refused to march onward to the goal which, for the first time since Christ, seemed almost within the Christian grasp. The 4,000,000 who sprang to the defense of their country with the determination to end war for all time found themselves cheated of their prey in the very hour of their victory. Mars, the repulsive god of war, escaped, and again sits omnipotent upon his throne ready to hurl new disasters upon the world. The peace of the world was destroyed by partisan politics. Selfishness and intolerance regained the day. We seek an isolation we can not find, and we suffer the consequences, moral, spiritual, and economic, of our failure to live up to our responsibilities and maintain the noble ideals which made us unconquerable on the field of battle.

In this reversion from the sublime heights of Christian purpose and glorious achievement to the debased level of partisan politics and ignoble shirking our sense of justice and gratitude to the 4,000,000 men who fought the war and won the victory seems to have been destroyed. We have failed them. We have, thus far, proven ourselves unequal to the ideals for which they fought and incapable of appreciating the heroic services they rendered in the hour of national peril.

ALLIES WERE FACING DEFEAT.

What was the situation in the spring of 1917 when America entered the war? A gloomier outlook for the allied cause could not be painted. The submarine was doing its deadly work at sea, rapidly destroying the means of communication between Great Britain, France, Italy, and the United States, upon the maintenance of which depended their supplies of food, munitions, and war materials. The ghastly prospect of starvation stared the Allies in the face. Quick relief could be obtained only from America. But the credit of the Allies was exhausted. This was a graver danger than the immediate effects of the submarine, because without money or credit they could not buy essential supplies in America. At that time Great Britain had demand obligations in American banks amounting to $400,000,000 which she could not meet. France and Italy were in financial extremity. What the Allies needed immediately to save them from irretrievable disaster was, first, American money, and, second, American men.

By act of Congress the Secretary of the Treasury was armed with authority to meet the credit situation. The Treasury of the United States immediately extended first aid to Great Britain, France, and Italy by lending them money to buy the food and munitions necessary to keep them on the fighting line until American men could arrive upon the field of battle.

THE DOUGHBOY WON THE VICTORY.

American men quickly followed American money, and what a colossal task it was to prepare untrained Young America to fight the veteran legions of the most powerful military nations of the earth! But this was not all; to transport them across 3,000 miles of sea infested with treacherous submarines and to put them in the battle line on foreign soil in strange surroundings amid a jargon of foreign tongues, equipped to fight the experienced veterans of the enemy, seemed an impossible task. But in an incredibly short space of time our raw recruits were transformed into a militant and irresistible fighting force. Three thousand miles of ocean were annihilated. The submarine was overcome. The mighty legions of the trained enemy were met and conquered, and in 18 months after America entered the war victory had been torn from the hands of defeat and the American doughboy was acclaimed as the protector of the Nation and the savior of liberty and democracy in the world. For these heroic achievements and in the flush of victory the lips of a grateful people in a grand chorus of praise and gratitude said that nothing was too good for him.

How was this mighty deed accomplished? By the organized might of America! The crisis was so grave that we could not rely upon our traditional policy of waiting for the volunteer to come forward and undertake this perilous and prodigious task. Swift measures were imperative. The Congress had provided the necessary money and credit to sustain the allied cause until American troops could take the field, and now Congress took the next great step and passed a law establishing a fundamental principle of war-making in a democracy—a universal draft law—that required every eligible young man, the sons of the rich and the sons of the poor alike, to go into training and fight without discrimination or favoritism for the cause of their country.

Under this law the strong arm of Uncle Sam stretched out into every home in the land where there was an eligible boy of military age and took him, without the sanction and regardless of the feelings of parents and loved ones, before selective service boards which chose those who were physically fit and sent them into training camps throughout the country. Four millions of America's finest young effectives were taken in this manner and molded into an unconquerable fighting force.

OUR SOLDIERS DRAFTED, NOT CONSULTED.

We did not ask these young men if they wanted to go into the trenches and give their lives for their country. We did not, nor could we in time of national peril, consult their wishes in the matter. We took them and sent them out to perform the supreme duty of patriotism. The life of the Nation was at stake and it was they who had to save it. We did not ask these men what compensation would be acceptable for the hazardous work we thrust upon them. There was neither individual nor collective bargaining as, of course, there could not be. The Congress arbitrarily fixed their pay and said that a soldier should receive while fighting on the bloody fields of France the sum of $1.10 per day, and while in reserve on American soil, awaiting the call to Europe, $1 per day. In the judgment of Congress it was worth 10 cents more per day to face the enemy's shot and shell and poison gas on the battle fields of Europe than to be in reserve in America. Of this meager compensation the soldier paid almost one-fourth for the life insurance which a grateful Nation permitted him to buy at minimum rates. If he was a married man, he was required by law to pay in addition another half of his compensation for the support of his dependent family. The little that was left—about $10 per month—the soldier was permitted to dispose of as he saw fit. There was, of course, no chance for the men and women in the Army and Navy to effect savings. After payments for life insurance and allowance for the support of families and loved ones barely enough was left for their ordinary needs.

The war was ended and, by their valor, a year sooner than expected.

The victorious heroes returned. With justified pride and deep emotion they trod again the soil of their native land amid the plaudits of the multitude. Then they were mustered out. Their swords were sheathed, their guns stacked, their uniforms laid aside, and the undramatic and crowded fields of civil life stretched before them. These young heroes had come from the farms, the villages, the towns, and the cities of every part of the land. They had given up their jobs and occupations. They had exchanged their environments for something new, something different, something uplifting. Their horizons had been widened. They had fought for great ideals and for noble objects. They had been reformed in a crucible of fire and remade in the grim school of discipline and danger. They were bigger men; they were broader men than the unsophisticated youths who entered the Army as raw recruits from the farms, the plains, the mountains, and the cities of a great Nation. They had to start life anew with enlarged vision, with new and finer conceptions of duty, with higher aims and ambitions. Thousands of them could not look with patience upon the narrow and provincial life from which they had been drawn. They wanted larger opportunity to make themselves useful citizens of the greatest Republic of all time. They wanted a chance at a larger and more fruitful life.

RETURNING VETERANS DISILLUSIONED.

But what was there to begin with except character, enlarged experience, and bright hope? They had emerged from the warm atmosphere of national welcome to find themselves in the cold atmosphere of practical, unsympathetic, indifferent civil life. Where were the jobs they had been led to believe were awaiting with warm welcome their return? Where were the opportunities which they had been told that a grateful Nation would shower upon them for their heroic services, for their priceless contribution to the cause of liberty and democracy? They were gone. Jobs and opportunity had been conquered by those who stayed at home and faced no peril while the conquerors of the Nation's foe were engaged on the field of battle. Life stretched before them, but what was there to start with? Not even a paltry fund which, if promptly available, would have opened up to the returned soldier the opportunity for a new and prosperous career.

It was the very need of this assistance, resulting from the inadequate pay granted the soldiers, that prompted the suggestion that a grateful Nation recognize their inestimable services by increasing the compensation paid to them during the war. This is familiarly known as "adjusted compensation" or "soldiers' bonus," and since it has been under consideration for the past four years and is an important public question it does not seem inappropriate to discuss it on this occasion.

BONUS IS JUSTICE.

What is "adjusted compensation" or "soldiers' bonus"?

It is a proposal that the men who fought in France and received but $1.10 per day therefor be paid an additional $1.25 per day for the period of actual service, and that the men who were held in reserve in camps in the United States and received but $1 per day therefor be paid an additional $1 per day for the period of actual service; but that in no case should the soldier in foreign service receive a total additional payment of more than $600 nor the soldier in home service a total of more than $500.

Is this an unreasonable request? Is $2.35 per day, or $70.50 per month, too much to pay to the men who endured all the dangers and horrors and sufferings of the trenches and of bloody battles? Is $2 per day too much to pay to the men who were kept in reserve awaiting orders to go to the front and fill the gaps caused by those who died in battle?

As adequate compensation for service performed, it is, of course, too little; but as evidence of gratitude and appreciation of a great duty nobly performed, it is something. As a genuine help to the 4,000,000 men and women who saved the Nation from grave peril, it is much. As a matter of justice, it is everything.

GOVERNMENT CIVIL EMPLOYEES RECOGNIZED.

While these men were fighting and sacrificing for country, every class in America, protected by their valor and sacrifice, was living in safety and earning more money and making larger profits than ever before in our history. Even the civil employees of the Government, more than 500,000 in number, who were receiving salaries of $2,500 or less per annum, were granted a bonus of $240 per year. For the past five years these civil employees have already received a total bonus of $1,200 each—twice the maximum proposed for the soldiers, and the bonus is still continuing.

The great manufacturing interests, which produced war munitions and supplies, and the great trusts and combinations in control of vital necessities for the Army and the Navy and the people made fabulous profits during the war because the valor of our heroes in the field made them secure in life, liberty, property, and the pursuit of profit. By contrast, how can this great Nation fail to grant the claim of the men who saved the Nation from disaster to the comparatively small recognition involved in the allowance of their request for a readjustment of compensation for the actual time they were in the service of their country?

A committee of the Senate, after exhaustive investigation, reported that it would require only about $1,600,000,000 to pay in cash the entire amount of the adjusted compensation or bonus to the enlisted men and women of the United States.

But immediately a cry arose from the very interests which had profited most by the valor of the soldiers, that to pay adjusted compensation would impose a greater burden upon the American people than they could bear, and that the credit of the Government would be destroyed if such payment should be undertaken.

Never was there a more fallacious and unsupportable claim, and never was there an exhibition of baser ingratitude.

ADJUSTED COMPENSATION NOT A BURDEN.

The Nation could have paid the claims for adjusted compensation without hurt to the national credit and without imposing serious burdens upon the people. The additional compensation should be treated as a part of the cost of the war and should, like other burdens of the war, be funded into long-time obligations and the payment spread over several generations, so that the present generation should not be required to pay an undue share of it, and succeeding generations should be required to pay a just share of it. We could issue 50-year Government bonds in sufficient amount to pay the bonus in cash and thus not only discharge creditably and promptly an obligation the country justly owes but remove the question from the hands of partisan and tricky politicians who have made use of the issue for base and ignoble ends. By this method another desirable result is accomplished: Additional onerous burdens would not be imposed on the present generation, which is already staggering under a heavy load of taxation. Only the annual interest and sinking fund would have to be paid. This would not exceed a total of 5 per cent, or about $80,000,000 per annum, to take care of the interest on the bonds and the payment of the principal at maturity.

A HUGE TARIFF SUBSIDY GRANTED GREED.

It is sheer hypocrisy to say that the Nation can not bear this relatively insignificant burden when great subsidies are granted to private interests at the expense of the people and for purposes which can not be successfully defended. The Fordney-McCumber tariff bill was recently passed by Congress and approved by the President. It is estimated that the trusts, monopolies, combinations in restraint of trade, and other beneficiaries of this measure will be able to take from the pockets of the American people $3,600,000,000 per annum while the law is on the statute books.

In the three years that remain before this colossal subsidy can be repealed its beneficiaries will receive an estimated total of $10,800,000,000. How can such conscienceless misuse of the powers of government, such indefensible exploitation of the masses of the people, be justified when the soldiers and sailors who saved our institutions are denied a just recognition of $1,600,000,000 on the ground that to grant it would impose excessive burdens on the American people? Ten billion eight hundred million dollars for trusts and monopolies, and not one cent for the heroic defenders of their country.

WHY NOT TARIFF BENEFICIARIES PAY THE BONUS?

But if the frank and direct method of issuing Government bonds for the payment of adjusted compensation in cash should not be adopted, why should not the beneficiaries of the tariff bill be required to divide their subsidy with the Nation's defenders? In this way adjusted compensation could be paid without imposing new burdens upon the American people; in this way those who received the greatest material benefit from the valor of our soldiers will be required to share with them the undue profits and advantages which a complacent Congress has so generously conferred upon them. How can it be done? Let an average of the net earnings of every trust, monopoly, corporation, or beneficiary of the Fordney-McCumber tariff bill be ascertained for five years, or for some reasonable period preceding the enactment of that law. Then take each year 50 per cent of all net earnings of these tariff beneficiaries in excess of this average, while the Fordney-McCumber bill is in effect, and apply it to the payment of the soldiers' bonus.

It would be peculiarly appropriate to make these tariff beneficiaries divide with the men and women who went to France when the black clouds of disaster overhung civilization and American liberty and dispelled them with the sunshine of their heroism and sacrifice.

This is not an impractical idea. It can be formulated into a law that can be administered. The plan is analogous to that adopted by the British Government for raising revenue to carry on the war. An average of the net earnings of all forms of business in Great Britain was ascertained for a period preceding the outbreak of the war, and all profits in excess of that average were treated as war profits and taxed 80 per cent. By this practical and simple plan the British Government repressed the war profiteer and forced those who profited by the war to contribute 80 per cent of those profits to the national defense fund instead of permitting excessive profits arising from abnormal conditions created by the war to be retained for private ends.

NO EXCUSE FOR INJUSTICE OR INGRATITUDE.

There are those who say that our enlisted men and women should not be paid additional compensation because they will waste the money—that no benefits will, therefore, be conferred upon them. This is, of course, mere assertion based neither upon fact nor reason. Arguing from human experience and the natural tendency of most men and women to save money and not to waste it, to use it wisely and not to lose it, it is more reasonable to assume that the great majority will use the money beneficially. But assuming, for the sake of argument, that justice demands that the claims of the soldiers be paid, or that the gratitude of a saved Nation prompts the payment, it is no answer to say that justice should be denied or gratitude stifled upon the mere assumption that those entitled to justice or those who should be the recipients of the Nation's gratitude may not use the rewards wisely or beneficially. We can not satisfy the demands of justice by being unjust nor manifest gratitude by refusing to be grateful. If the soldiers are entitled to the bonus either because justice demands it or gratitude prompts it, it should be paid to them no matter what they may do with it. In its final analysis it is an affront to enlisted men and women to assume that they are so worthless and incompetent that they will not make proper use of a payment to which they are in justice entitled.

NOT COMMERCIALIZING PATRIOTISM.

There are others who say that the bonus should not be paid because it will "commercialize patriotism." This is merely trying to satisfy conscience with a phrase. If it be commercializing patriotism to increase the pay of the soldier for the dangerous work he did in the war, then why was it not equally commercializing patriotism to pay him anything whatever for serving in the war? The argument must be carried to its logical conclusion. Either he should be paid within reasonable limits to the full extent of the Nation's ability to pay, or he should not be paid at all. If patriotism is to be exacted of the soldier without cost, then in time of war all civilian effort should be drafted without cost, and no profit should be allowed to private enterprise or service as a contribution to the war effort. The most unfair and unjust thing that the opponents of the soldiers' bonus have done to the 4,000,000 gallant men and women who fought the war is this attempt to impeach their patriotism. A greater wrong could not be done. If it would commercialize patriotism to increase the pay of the soldier for the service he rendered in the war, then what can be said of the gross commercializing of patriotism indulged in by every firm, corporation, and individual who turned to the utmost profit the opportunities the war gave them?

It is not unnatural that the people should hesitate to assume new tax burdens at a time when they already are overloaded with State, local, and national taxation. Certainly these burdens ought not to be increased without convincing reasons. The opposition to the soldiers' bonus is grounded largely upon the fear that it will inevitably impose new tax burdens. But this objection is met if the bonus can be paid without increasing existing burdens through a division of the tariff subsidies already imposed upon the people or through the issuance of long-time Government bonds which will distribute the burden lightly over several generations. But in no circumstances can any nation take the position that justice to any great class of its citizens shall be denied because it will cost something to do justice.

JUSTICE, LIBERTY, DEMOCRACY NOT TO BE MEASURED IN DOLLARS.

There are some things which can not be measured in dollars. Justice is one of them. Liberty is another. Democracy is still another. Liberty and democracy are founded upon justice, and the Nation must stand for justice and do justice no matter what the cost may be in blood or treasure. If we refuse to do justice to the great army of men and women who saved the Nation in its hour of extremity; if we leave in the hearts of the 4,000,000 defenders of the Nation and in the hearts of their families and friends the feeling that the Nation is not only unjust but ungrateful, may we not do a graver injury to the spirit and morale and patriotism of our people than any savings in taxation could ever compensate?

In the wave of materialism which has swept over the land since the war was fought our higher ideals seem to have been obscured. What armistice day ought to celebrate instead of merely signify has not yet been secured. Perhaps these things are only in eclipse. The triumph over war, injustice, and oppression has not yet come. It may never come in full perfection, but it is our duty to fight unflinchingly for this noble end.

Let us pray God that that day of triumph may come, and while we pray God and press on with unconquerable determination let us make sure that we preserve the soul of the Nation from the corroding influences of injustice, materialism, and selfishness. Let us on this day made glorious by the valorous deeds of our sons and daughters resolve that this great Nation, fashioned by our forefathers in the spirit of the Christian God and dedicated by them to the service of humanity, shall be preserved for all time.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVAL.

A message from the President, by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries, announced that on November 22, 1922, the President approved and signed the act (S. 3300) granting a pension to Marie Doughty Gorgas.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Overhulse, its enrolling clerk, returned to the Senate, in compliance with its request, the bill (S. 3855) to ascertain and settle land claims of persons not Indian within pueblo Indian land, land grants, and reservations in the State of New Mexico.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (H. R. 12859) to provide for certain expenses incident to the third session of the Sixty-seventh Congress, and it was thereupon signed by the Vice President.

LIBERIAN LOAN.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Morning business is closed.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, this is Calendar Day, but we had a call of the calendar just before the close of the last session. Therefore I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business be laid before the Senate. The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] has informed me that he desires to address the Senate this morning.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I think we ought to have a quorum before that is done. Therefore I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The reading clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Gooding	Myers	Smoot
Ball	Hale	Nelson	Spencer
Bayard	Harrell	New	Stanfield
Borah	Harris	Nicholson	Stanley
Brandeggee	Harrison	Norris	Sterling
Broussard	Hefflin	Overman	Sutherland
Calder	Hitchcock	Owen	Swanson
Capper	Jones, N. Mex.	Page	Townsend
Caraway	Jones, Wash.	Phipps	Underwood
Cuberson	Keyes	Pomerene	Wadsworth
Cummins	Ladd	Ransdell	Walsh, Mass.
Curtis	La Follette	Rawson	Walsh, Mont.
Dial	Lodge	Reed, Mo.	Warren
Edge	McCumber	Reed, Pa.	Watson
Fernald	McKellar	Sheppard	Weller
Fletcher	McKinley	Shortridge	Willis
Frelinghuysen	McLean	Simmons
George	McNary	Smith

The VICE PRESIDENT. Seventy Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present.

The question is on the request by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS] for unanimous consent that the unfinished business be immediately laid before the Senate.

Mr. HARRISON. I understood that the unanimous-consent request was to take up the calendar.

Mr. CURTIS. No; the unanimous-consent request was that the Chair lay before the Senate the unfinished business. The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] desires to speak; and under the unanimous-consent agreement already entered into the unfinished business should now be laid before the Senate anyway.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I think that should be done; but the regular order is the calendar, and I think we ought to be able to agree that the unfinished business be now laid before the Senate, as it is to be voted on at 2 o'clock, and when it shall have been concluded, that the calendar shall then be taken up.

Mr. CURTIS. I could not consent to enter into that agreement, Mr. President.

Mr. HEFLIN. What is the request, Mr. President?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The request of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS] is for unanimous consent that the unfinished business may now be laid before the Senate. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which is House Joint Resolution 270.

REPLY TO M. CLEMENCEAU—FRANCE AND GERMANY.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, a few days ago I sought to accept the invitation given by former prime minister Clemenceau, of France, when he suggested in his first address delivered in New York City that we exchange criticisms. M. Clemenceau has come to this country for the purpose, apparently, of persuading the American people to cooperate at the present time with the policy of France; and in my comments upon his attitude I sought to show that it would be impossible for the people of the United States to cooperate with France so long as the French Republic pursues the policy toward Germany which it has been pursuing for some time. I endeavored to show, Mr. President, that that policy would inevitably lead to war, and, in support of that, I sought to introduce some features of that policy indicating that fact. I ask to have inserted in the Record, without reading, the comments made by M. Clemenceau on my first speech.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

TIGER DENIES HITCHCOCK'S CHARGES OF MILITARISM—REFERS TO SENATOR'S DEFEAT AT POLLS—DARES HIM TO SEEK "TRUTH" IN FRANCE.

BOSTON, November 24 (Associated Press).—Georges Clemenceau lashed back at his Senate critics to-day in his first American interview granted to the Associated Press, replying particularly to the criticisms of Senators HITCHCOCK and BORAH.

"Senator HITCHCOCK calls me a militarist," Clemenceau said. "Well, I am glad to tell Mr. HITCHCOCK he is in the Senate, owing to the vote, for only a few more days. When he is free, I dare him to go to France and learn the facts."

He declared Senator HITCHCOCK had been misled by German propaganda and that to-day there was not a single black soldier in German territory.

To Senator BORAH's recent assertion that Clemenceau was primarily responsible for conditions in Europe because of his great influence in the drafting of the Versailles treaty the aged statesman declared his situation was "particularly distressing," since in France he had been most bitterly criticized "for having asked from the Germans less than I ought to."

TO MAKE HIMSELF CLEAR.

When he was told that some of the Senators at Washington had said they were not able to understand clearly from his speeches just what he wanted of America, the Tiger said, with a gleam in his eyes, that he thought they would know after his address this afternoon in Tremont Temple, the second formal speech of his American tour.

Clemenceau received his interviewers in his big bedroom at the home of F. L. Higginson, Jr., where he is staying while in this city.

He wore his usual gray cutaway suit, and his gray skull cap was perched on his bald head. Seating himself in a huge easy chair, he said:

"Now, put any questions you like and I will answer them."

The interviewers went at once to the subject of the Washington criticisms. Clemenceau smiled and shrugged his shoulders.

"I had made it a point not to discuss with official people in America," he said. "But I have said I will answer all, so I must answer."

"I am glad to tell Mr. HITCHCOCK he is in the Senate only for a few days, owing to the vote," he began, referring to the Senator's recent defeat for reelection. "Therefore, I think I'll be excused if I dare him to go to Europe, and if he finds anyone in my country or elsewhere who says I have been a militarist, then I'll own it."

TURNED MILITARIST WITH WAR.

"I have suffered much from 1871 to 1917 for not being a militarist. I turned militarist when the war broke out—before, I had been militarist to the extent of extending the length of military service in France."

"But that wasn't too bad, if it allowed us to oppose the German front until England and America appeared."

Asked to answer HITCHCOCK's question about black troops, the Tiger said "bon" and waded in.

"In the first place, there are no black troops of occupation in the area of occupation of the enemy. In the second place, I have seen black American troops at the front, and they stood the fire with bravery, too."

"Of course, this has nothing to do with the question of whether we are militarists or not. It is an attempt of German propaganda to oppose France and America and obscure what is really the great question."

"The Germans and all of our foes had been killing enough of our white men, and 100,000 black men fell gallantly fighting on 'the frontiers of liberty,' as Woodrow Wilson called them. We are not going to deny them a place in history."

"Now those black soldiers were always more or less occupying towns in France and always got along perfectly with the white French people. Even, I should say, their discipline is stricter than any white troops."

"So—I have seen papers of German propaganda which I suppose inspired Mr. HITCHCOCK's sayings, and I can plainly say they are so many lies."

"The day before I left Paris I heard these stories would be employed to prove we were a militaristic people. So I asked the official people to give me plain information."

"The answer was that there had been only one established case of a Senegalese having mistreated a German woman. He was cashiered and sentenced by a military tribunal."

SENT TO RELIEVE WHITE TROOPS.

The reason black troops were sent into the occupation zone at first, Clemenceau said, was to provide a few months of home leave for the white troops "that had stood the fire for years until America could come, and were rather exhausted."

"We couldn't foresee," he said, "that it would be more objectionable to the Germans than to the French in whose towns they had been garrisoned. When we learned it was, they were withdrawn."

"The German objection was more of a surprise because they employed black troops, and if they did not bring them to the front it was because no means of bringing them could be found. They did find means to invade Belgian Congo with blacks."

Then Clemenceau came to Senator BORAH's statement that he, Clemenceau, was responsible for most of Europe's woes, because of the treaty of Versailles. Declaring that the criticism was exactly the opposite in his own country, where he was assailed for not demanding enough, he continued:

"Let those who say I asked too much go to Europe; let them bring their German friends, and let us settle it there where it can be seen."

"Moreover, if too much was asked at Versailles—which I do not believe—yet 57 per cent of it has been taken out without my assent and out of my power."

Ending the interview, Clemenceau declared his reception in America had been "greater than I was entitled to expect."

"I was received as a friend, as a son," he said. "Whatever happens in the end, I shall never forget it. But while expressing my deep gratitude to all, I dare say I'd like to have a little more plain assent to some of my arguments."

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, first of all, in those remarks M. Clemenceau quotes me as charging that he is a militarist. As a matter of fact, I sought in what I said to avoid any personal criticism of this French statesman, and endeavored to direct my criticism against the policy now being pursued by France. I did suggest that at the conference in the negotiation of the Versailles treaty M. Clemenceau showed himself disposed to drive a very harsh stipulation with regard to Germany, and that he, as the representative of France, was largely responsible for the exaction of indemnities or reparations which had turned out to be entirely impossible. At the same time I said that, compared to the present French Government, M. Clemenceau is mild; and the facts, as I view them, sustain that statement.

M. Clemenceau also says that, as the result of the recent election, I shall only be in the Senate for a few days, and he "dares" me to come to Paris at the expiration of my term and learn the real facts of the case. Well, Mr. President, there are several defects in this invitation. In the first place, M. Clemenceau is himself out of office, as the result of a decision of the French people, and is in no position to tender an official invitation to anyone to visit France; and, in the second place, his suggestion conveys to my mind too much of the idea represented in the story of the bucolic young man who had dramatic ambitions. He left his country town and joined a barnstorming dramatic company, being under the impression that he was to become a dramatic star. After he had been absent some time he returned in a somewhat crestfallen manner to his native town. His friends began to ask him how successful his dramatic trip had been. He said it had been pretty good; but his friends insisted on knowing what sort of a reception he had had from the audiences. "Well," he said, "pretty fair." He was asked, "Did the audiences encore you?" "Encore!" he exclaimed, "what is encore?" "Why," his friends explained, "did the audiences call you before the curtain?" "Well," he said, "they did not exactly call me before the curtain, but they dared me to come before the curtain." [Laughter.] So this invitation from M. Clemenceau partakes a little too much of that character to appeal to me with great strength.

Now, Mr. President, as to what M. Clemenceau says in his comment upon my address, in the first place, he states that there are no black troops in the army of occupation of the enemy—he still refers to the German people as "the enemy." There we have an issue of fact. M. Clemenceau, who is rather noted for reckless statements, makes the bald declaration that there are no black troops in the army of occupation. I hold in my hand, Mr. President, an authentic list of the French colored troops in Germany in October of the present year. At this time it appeared that the Senegalese troops have been withdrawn, but there are still quartered upon the German people, according to this statement, some 23,000 colored men. The statement says:

The average number comprising the regiments amounts to from 1,900 to 2,000, the total amount of the regiments mentioned above thus being approximately 23,000 men. Apart from the regiments enumerated above, there are, particularly with the white artillery regiments and the automobile corps, small units of Indo-Chinese (Anamites) and Senegalese, the total amount of which, however, hardly supersedes 1,000 men. The amount of Senegalese, the only real negro troops in the occupied territory, amounts to some 200 men.

Without reading, I shall insert this in the RECORD. It shows that there are Algerian commands located in the town of Ems, Diez, Boppard, Wiesbaden, the environs of Idstein, Kreuznach, Bingen, Langenschwalbach, Biebrich, Kostheim, Griesheim, Sweibrücken, Landau, Mainz (Mayence), Juelich, Dueren, and Eschweiler; that there are Moroccan troops quartered in Speyer, Gernersheim, Kastell, Weiseman, Hoechst, and Ludwigshafen, and Tunisian soldiers stationed in Euskirchen, Siegburg, Wahn, and Bonn.

I ask unanimous consent to insert this compilation in the RECORD, and I can vouch for its reliability as a statement of the colored troops in the army of occupation on German territory in the month of October, this year.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The statement referred to is as follows:

Algerian Riflemen Regiment No. 16, staff and one battalion in Ems, one battalion in Diez, and one battalion in Boppard.

Algerian Riflemen Regiment No. 23, staff and two battalions in Wiesbaden, one battalion in the environs of Idstein.

Algerian Riflemen Regiment No. 125, staff and one battalion in Kreuznach, one battalion in Bingen, one battalion in Langenschwalbach.

Algerian Riflemen Regiment No. 33, staff and one battalion in Biebrich, one battalion in Kostheim, one battalion in Griesheim.

Algerian Riflemen Regiment No. 35, staff and two battalions in Zweibrücken, one battalion in Landau.

Algerian Riflemen Regiment No. 39, the whole regiment in Mainz (Mayence).

Algerian Riflemen Regiment No. 43, staff and one battalion in Juelich, one battalion in Dueren, one battalion in Eschweiler.

Moroccan Riflemen Regiment No. 64, staff and one battalion in Speyer, two battalions in Gernersheim.

Moroccan Riflemen Regiment No. 66, staff and one battalion in Kastell, one battalion in Weiseman, one battalion in Hoechst.

Moroccan Colonial Infantry Regiment, staff and two battalions in Ludwigshafen, one battalion in Speyer.

Tunesian Riflemen Regiment No. 20, the whole regiment in Euskirchen.

Tunesian Riflemen Regiment No. 28, staff and one battalion in Siegburg, one battalion in Wahn, one battalion in Bonn.

The average number comprising the regiments amounts to 1,900 to 2,000 men. The total amount of the regiments mentioned above thus being approximately 23,000 men. Apart from the regiments enumerated above there are particularly with the white artillery regiments and the automobile corps small units of Indo-Chinese (Anamites) and Senegalese, the total amount of which, however, hardly supersedes 1,000 men. The amount of Senegalese, the only real negro troops, in occupied territory amounts to some 200 men.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I may say that in addition to that I am in receipt of a large number of telegrams and letters from various parts of the United States, some of them denouncing M. Clemenceau in language so vigorous that I shall not reproduce it, but all testifying to the fact that the individuals writing the letters saw black troops in German territory upon the occasion of very recent visits to Germany.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question for information?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I yield.

Mr. McCUMBER. Does the Senator designate the Sudanese as blacks in the general acceptance of that term?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Well, Mr. President, I am not color blind entirely, but have here—

Mr. McCUMBER. What I should like to get at is really whether they are of the Aryan race practically or whether they are of the Negro race.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I have not mentioned any Sudanese. This list contains none; it contains a statement that there are 200 negroes, and that there are Moroccans, the Algerians, and the Tunisians.

Mr. McCUMBER. I will apply the question to the Moroccans. They are not negroes, are they?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I have not said they were, although I have some pictures here which make them look very much like it. But that is not the question.

Mr. McCUMBER. I was simply trying to get information as to whether there are negro troops quartered at present in German territory.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. There are 200 negroes there, according to this official statement which I put in the RECORD, and in addition to that there are over 23,000 of an inferior race. Now, I am not making an attack on the negroes. The American negro is far above these half-barbaric, half-civilized representatives of African tribes who have been conquered by the French arms, and are now incorporated in the French Army. The American negro is a far different character as he associates in our country with his own kind, and in close contact also with the white race. The gist of my charge is that France has quartered over 20,000 men of inferior, half-savage races upon white people; that those men are quartered not only in barracks but in the very houses of German citizens along the Rhine. That is the essence of my charge, and I do not want to have it diverted to a discussion of the race question in the United States.

These Moroccan riflemen and these Algerian riflemen are called Moroccans and Algerians because of the neighborhood they come from; but, as every one knows, there are large proportions of the peoples in those territories who are inferior to the high Arab or to the high Moroccan.

Here in this French book which I have, "La Panorama de la Guerre de 1914," Senators, if they wish, can see illustrated the type of men in colors there. I am glad the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] comes to my desk as an expert and views the pictures representative of the Senegalese, Algerians, and Moroccans; so that any one by viewing them can decide whether or not they are men of an inferior race, and whether they are proper individuals to be quartered upon white people, and in the houses of white people.

Mr. REED of Missouri. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. REED of Missouri. I should like to ask the Senator if he does not think we need a few savages from Africa to save civilization and make the world perfectly safe for democracy?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. There are 23,000 there at the present time, as I have shown by that statement, which is official.

Now I want to read a letter which is written by a recent captain in the United States Army. It comes from Boston, Mass., under date of November 25:

DEAR SIR: I have just read in the Boston papers where M. Clemenceau denies your statement about there being negro troops on German soil.

I left Germany on October 3, 1922. I was an officer in the American Army of Occupation for three years and up to the time I left there. When M. Clemenceau says there are no negro troops on German soil he makes a statement that is absolutely untrue. There are between 15,000 and 25,000 negro troops stationed in the German towns of Kreuznach, on the Lahn River, and Bad Ems and Nassau, on the Lahn, and at other places. I have seen negro troops on German soil every day for the past three years.

Mr. President, this captain in the Army, when he says "negro," does not distinguish between the Senegalese and the Algerian and the Moroccan, and there is no need to make a distinction. They are men of an inferior, half-civilized race. They are brutes when stationed among white people, as the evidence shows beyond any controversy; and there is not any use to make a quibble, as M. Clemenceau made when he said they are not black men. It would require a fine degree of color astuteness for an individual to express a preference for one or the other.

Mr. President, running over a few of these telegrams and letters which I have received—and I shall not undertake to cumber the RECORD with many of them—here is a letter from Gonzales, La., dated November 23. This is from a former soldier in our Army. He says:

I was over there and served in our Army, and I saw those black troops myself, and it was a common report to hear of the outrages that those black troops committed on German women and girls.

I send you a paper which my brother and myself started, together with W. Gautreau, and all of us saw service—my brother and myself in the Army and our partner Gautreau in the Navy—and you will notice in our issue of November 18 we denounce this cowardly act on the part of France. All three of us are of French descent and proud of it, but we are not at all proud of any act of brutal cowardice by the French nation, and we wish you would take action about this. All three of us are also members of the American Legion.

I read that because that comes not from a German, nor from a German-American, but from a man of French descent who served in the Army and saw the things of which he speaks.

I am not going to—I can not, from the very nature of the case—undertake to give a list of the horrors over there, but later on I am going to put into the RECORD some statistics on that subject.

I have here a telegram from Boston, from Dr. Philip S. Sumner, who says:

While in Germany during the month of August, saw French colored troops at Mainz and Ludwigshafen on duty.

I have here a letter from Chicago, part of which reads as follows. This is written by a woman:

I beg to say that I was in Euskirchen, Rhineland, Germany, all last summer, and it was crowded with blacks in the French Army. It was not safe for a woman to be alone on the streets even in the daytime when there were not many people on the streets. When indignities were reported to the officers they would grant no relief and inflict no punishment; in fact, in certain instances they ordered complaining Germans to leave the land of occupation.

Then she makes certain charges against French officers, to which I will not give publicity.

I have here a letter from a man in St. Louis, written on the 24th, who says:

In looking through this evening's newspaper, I note that M. Clemenceau made the statement that there were no black troops in Germany. This is absolutely false. I was in Germany myself this summer and saw the Rhine district literally black with them. A brown population is rapidly springing up as the result of their being there.

Then I have here a letter written from Atlantic City, in which the writer says:

Regarding not having any African-colored troops in Germany, the court records of the city of Landau, under date of September of this year, all of whom are under French jurisdiction, are before me, where rape had been committed repeatedly, where names are mentioned which I will be glad to send to you. I came in possession of same through my sister, who lives in a city called Neustadt, Bavaria, in the heart of the occupied territory, and who herself does not dare to speak of these outrages.

I have here a letter from Asher Mayer, of New York City, in which he says:

I am not prepared to say that the so-called colored troops have not been withdrawn from the occupied area in the last 30 days, but I can tell you without equivocation that in the months of July, August, and September there were hundreds and hundreds of colored troops in that area. I saw them myself. It will interest you to know that at Wiesbaden in the depot there is a colored soldier standing at each end, fully armed. There is hardly a railroad station along the Rhine where a number of colored troopers are not stationed.

Mr. President, I can read a good many of these letters. They mention dates.

Here is one which mentions seeing colored troops at Bonn, on the Rhine, October 3 and 4 of the present year.

Here is a very recent letter from a business man in Philadelphia, who states:

I returned from a visit to Germany on November 11 via steamship Resolute and am therefore in position to say that Clemenceau deliberately lied when he stated there were no colored troops along the Rhine, for I personally saw them at Oberlappstein, Mainz, Schierstein, Weisbaden, Biebrich, and Worms, while fellow passengers testified to their presence in the Pfalz—Palatinate.

I do not believe that M. Clemenceau deliberately lied. I think M. Clemenceau has habitually in his public life made reckless statements, as he did in this case when he declared that there were no black troops there, and as he did when he further stated that hundreds of cannon were being made in Germany at the present time in preparation for war, although we all know that Germany is combed constantly by commissions of French and other allied officers who have seen to it that there shall be no cannon made in Germany for use there or elsewhere.

Mr. President, I believe that all this shows pretty clearly that the colored troops are there. Let me make some reference to what those colored troops are doing and what they have been doing there.

I have in my hand a quotation from a noted English authoress, Lady Frances Evelyn Warwick, who recently addressed a most emphatic appeal to the women of England, requesting them to rise in protest against the black horror on the Rhine. Lady Frances writes:

When the Frenchmen moved to the Rhine they took with them a considerable force of colored troops from the Senegal and other parts of northern Africa. These uncivilized people were quartered upon one of the highest civilized parts of Europe. That in itself is terrible enough. It was a disgrace for all Europe. But soon came that which was much more terrible. The German authorities were urged, aye, they were simply ordered to establish brothels for the black troops. And for these brothels white women had to be furnished. This happened in the year 1922 after Christ! But, judging from reliable information I received, that was not all. A great number of German women have been outraged by colored soldiers. The newspapers in the occupied territory are not allowed to report these cases; in some instances the press has been ordered to report that such things never happened. It would be an easy matter for me to report shocking details, but I have too much self-respect, and these lines may suffice to indicate what monstrosities our German sisters have been subjected to.

I do not dispute for a moment the right of the French to use colored troops when their country was in danger. That was deplorable, but it was necessary. But as soon as the war was over these troops should have been sent back. By quartering them upon a defenseless country in the midst of highly civilized people the French have committed a crime against Europe. When we were informed recently that the Bolsheviks used Chinese soldiers who committed the most terrible atrocities a cry of horror swept all through western Europe, but when the French sent thousands of colored troops into the Rhineland one keeps silent.

In discussing this matter I set aside all other considerations. I want to forget how tragical the war was and how hard peace is. I look upon this matter as every civilized woman would look upon it, even as a French mother who has suffered so unspeakably would look upon it, when it is submitted to her in all its monstrousness, without any comment. I have discussed it with men who refuse to forgive under any considerations. I told them, "I can understand your attitude toward Germany, but how can you justify it that the French have colored troops on the Rhine." I have not met a single one who justified it. The mildest criticism was, "It is a mistake."

With the phrase, "For the sake of peace and quiet"—to quote a person of high rank—little or nothing is said. I also know that when America entered an emphatic protest the French authorities did everything to make the crimes appear as trifles. The following report, which I received just now, is proof to the contrary. It comes from a person who is thoroughly familiar with conditions: "Despite the protests of foreign governments, the International Women's League, and such excellent men as Romain Rolland, Henri Barbusse, and others the horror continues. The British representative to the supreme war council in Versailles, General Thompson, has stated himself that it is the truth, that it is impossible to keep under control the primitive passion of African troops. It is still worse that the brothels are not sufficient, and that therefore cruelties and atrocities are frequent. Almost 20,000 colored soldiers are still on the Rhine. Formerly there were 25,000. Then their number was reduced because of the difficulty to furnish quarters for them in the winter. And the horror continues."

That is one side of the matter which ought to be taken into consideration by our French friends. They ought to ask themselves how they would feel if their mothers, sisters, and daughters were subjected to the same abuse. Would they not feel that the memory of such outrages would survive two or three generations and that it ought to be washed off with blood.

France's population is decreasing while Germany's is increasing. Both countries are indispensable for the welfare of Europe. Their disputes may become the source of serious trouble for the whole world. In theory we had approximately four years of peace, but in fact a condition still exists that makes peace impossible. Therefore English women must rise in protest, not only for their German sisters but for the cause of world peace. The protest is to be submitted to Parliament. Every woman in England must get busy to support this action. If France fails to put an end to the black horror, we women must instigate a boycott of French goods, clothes, and wine; to be short, we must not buy anything exported by France. I believe this threat would be sufficient, and if the women of England would demand that these crimes be stopped they would be a thing of the past in a very short time.

Mr. REED of Missouri. What is the date of that?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I do not know the date of it. The Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] gave it to me, and I am not advised of the date. What Lady Francis says there is true, Mr. President. This issue is not limited to the abuse of women and girls in Germany. This action is going to lead to war, and it is intended to lead to war. It is provocative. It is done for the purpose of arousing Germany to resent it. It can not be for any military purpose. France with her 700,000 men has no need to keep 25,000 men of an inferior race there, whether they are Moroccans or Senegalese or Tunesians, or whatever they may be. There is no military excuse for it, and it is not done for a military purpose. These men are housed there sometimes in German families, sometimes in barracks, and sometimes in public institutions, evidently for the purpose of provoking and exasperating the Germans to resistance in order that France may have an excuse to enter with military force and possess herself of German territory, because this is not the only thing France has been doing which can be interpreted in only one way, and that is toward exciting resistance and giving an excuse for the entry of French soldiers into territory not yet occupied.

Mr. President, I have shown that the colored troops are there, and when I say "colored troops" I ought to say half-civilized troops, because I am not reflecting on the colored men of this country. Those men over there are half-civilized troops. They are far away from home, and they are installed in German families, as I said, as well as in barracks of their own, and they are given police power. They are in the attitude of conquerors. As Clemenceau says, they are in the enemy's country.

I hold in my hand what I feel justified in vouching for as reliable information concerning the establishment of houses of prostitution for the use of these men, not for the use of white men but for the use of these half-civilized black men. Evidently the need is appreciated for something of that sort, and, as stated, white women are taken and put into these houses of prostitution for the use of these half-civilized blacks. I read from the first part of this document:

The establishment of brothels upon official demand of the army of occupation is confined to the territory occupied by the French troops. Nineteen brothels were originally kept in 16 places, of which 12 are still being maintained in 12 places. Moreover, the establishment of a brothel was demanded at Treves a short time ago. Information about brothels for the occupation troops established upon demand in the occupied territory on the Rhine follows.

The names of those brothels no longer maintained since November 1, 1921, are underlined.

I would like to have them so indicated in the RECORD, and I ask to have the balance of this document printed.

There being no objection, the matter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD as follows:

The total costs incurred to the German Government by the enforced establishment of brothels till the end of October, 1921, amounts to $02,000 marks; e. g., at the rate of exchange in 1919-20 about $50,000.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, these 19 brothels, of which some have been discontinued, are listed here in towns ranging in size from small places, like Bad Ems, to the larger places, like Wiesbaden, with 100,000 population. The street number of the brothel is given, and it is specified in another column who demanded their establishment, and when they were established. The cost of each is given. This cost has had to be paid by the German Government, or by the localities when the German Government so required. The people of Germany have been taxed, in other words, to maintain those institutions in those towns and to keep white women in them.

Such demands come from the French, from French officers in the various districts, and it is most conclusive admission that those French officers realize the character of the men with whom they have to deal. There has not been anything required in any other territory except the territory occupied by these half savage men. I have no doubt that the German authorities were glad to have them established, in a feeble effort to protect their women.

M. Clemenceau said in his statement that there was only one case of criminal assault. He said that before leaving Paris, anticipating something of this sort, he asked officials in Paris for information, and was told that there had been only one established case of a Senegalese having mistreated a German woman, and he was punished. If anything, that statement by M. Clemenceau is even more preposterous and more inaccurate than his other statement that there were no black troops in Germany at this time. I hold in my hand here a book entitled "Outrages Committed by Colored Troops on the Rhine. Authentic Report." It is translated into English. Originally it was published in Germany. It specifies, in its seventy-odd pages, something like a hundred cases. In some instances the case is represented by the statement of the victim, giving only her initials, but the dates, and the name of the town. In other cases the statement is the statement of the police officer in the town who investigated the case. In other cases it is the father or other relative of the victim. But they are given in a detail so disgusting that it is impossible to put them into the RECORD.

They are given evidently for the purpose of establishing the facts. It is not possible that all of that can be fraud. Anyone is at liberty to examine this pamphlet which I have here, and there is no possibility of a fair man reading those statements, in different languages, by different victims, without coming to the conclusion that in the main, at least, they tell the truth.

That is not all, Mr. President. Not only is M. Clemenceau contradicted by such detailed statements as that, but he is contradicted by the apologists for France. Mr. J. Ellis Barker, in an article published in the New York Times Current History recently, was apologizing for France and defending the practice and doing what he could to justify France for keeping colored troops on the Rhine. But he was compelled to admit that the number of the accusations brought for the violation of women and crimes of violence were 227. But he said that the number found justified on an examination amounted to only 72.

That may possibly be accurate. It happens time and time again, when crimes of that sort are committed against women, even in this country the women are not able to identify the men who commit the crimes; and so undoubtedly over there, with thousands of these half-civilized troops quartered in a town, the girl victim or the woman victim in many cases no doubt is unable to identify the cause of her distress. It is not possible, with men of that type, for white people to tell them apart, and no doubt there are many complaints and many failures to identify. But the fact, as this apologist for France admits, that there were 227 cases is very good evidence that there was a very large number of offenses, even in the best phase that can be put upon it.

This writer also gives, fortunately, the figures of colored troop occupation. From December, 1918, to May, 1919, there were 10,000 colored troops in Germany, he says. From May, 1919, to March, 1920, there were 35,000. From March, 1920, to June, 1920, there were 25,000. From June, 1920, to January, 1921, there were 20,000, and, as I have shown by the exhibit which I presented a few moments ago, there are at the present time 23,000. So that there has been a steady policy of keeping these troops unnecessarily in German territory, without any military reason whatever.

The sentences imposed upon men who were convicted, according to the statement of Mr. Barker in apologizing for the policy, were penal servitude for life for 1, five years' imprisonment for 5, less than five years for 23, disciplinary punishment for 23, trial pending or adjourned for 20.

One of the complaints the German women have made is that they can not get justice in the French tribunals; and very obviously they can not get justice, because the whole attitude of the military establishment there is one of justification. The poor woman who comes in to make the complaint is at every possible disadvantage. She is not in a position to prove her case—she lacks witnesses; she has only her own testimony; she has difficulty in identifying—but the fact that only comparatively few have been convicted is no excuse whatever for a continuation of the policy.

Mr. President, very recently, in fact just a few moments ago, there was placed in my hands an additional list of offenses committed against women by these half-civilized soldiers—not last year, not the year before, but this year, almost up to date. Here is one, with the names mentioned, on June 21, 1922; another on July 2, 1922; another on July 6, 1922; another one on July 10, 1922; another on the 25th day of July this year; another on the 30th day of July; another one on August 14, 1922.

I am not going to put the details in the RECORD, because they are unfit for publication, but I cite them to show that these crimes are going on now and that M. Clemenceau, when he said there are no black troops in France, was evidently misinformed, to say the very least. It does not make any difference whether we call them black troops or brown troops or Moroccans. Whatever color designation should be given, they are committing these crimes and it does not matter whether we call them black or brown or how we designate them.

I am going to give one instance here, because it has already been published in a New York paper and vouched for by a man who has been on the ground. With the consent of the Senate I shall read it, as follows:

One more incident in relation to the injury inflicted upon a defeated people. Imagine the vine-covered banks of the Rhine. Let us take the old city of Boppard. It nestles there, in a curve of the Rhine. There are the quaint streets, the Old World dwellings, places of business, public houses, squares, markets, inns, and the little station, with its beers and wines and sandwiches, always the little creature comforts, all typical of the Rhineland.

Away on a hillside, far above the quiet village, stands an old convent. It is one of the secluded seminaries where young women are educated. In the summer of 1921 all of Germany was aflame over the Boppard case—

That is only a year ago, Mr. President—

Two ladies had gone to Boppard to visit their respective daughters, young and pure, pupils in this convent. In the afternoon the two ladies and the two young girls went for a walk out into the shady forest of the Tannus Mountains, through which here the old Rhine flows on its way to the northern flatlands.

On that sunny afternoon, in their homeland, near a cloister and in the presence of distracted mothers these two young girls were set upon by black men, assaulted and outraged. This is a matter of record. It happened while I was within a few miles of Boppard. I have seen the convent and I know the story is true. I have set forth a few reasons why we white people here should demand an answer now of M. Clemenceau the reason why France still maintains a guard of black men over white people on the Rhine.

Respectfully,

P. PAULI,

2211 Broadway, New York City.

That is only one case of hundreds and, as the former prime minister of Italy, Nitti, said, it is a moral crime against Europe, it is lowering the moral standard of Europe, it is reverting to the conditions of the Middle Ages in this century of ours.

Now, Mr. President, I want to leave that subject. I believe I have established the fact that Clemenceau was mistaken when he said there are no black troops of that kind in Germany. I believe I have demonstrated he was mistaken and was making a preposterous statement in saying that there is only one case of abuse of German women by Senegalese soldiers, and I think I have established the fact that France herself has recognized the character of these men when she has required Germany at large expense to establish brothels by taxing the people to put white women in there for the use of these men.

I want to go to another provoking attitude of France toward Germany, the attitude of demanding impossible reparations. It is a story which was rather interesting when it occurred that at the peace conference in Paris the American delegation strove in vain and the British delegation in a lesser degree strove in vain to prevent the incorporation in the treaty of impossible reparations against Germany. At that time they were left vague and undefined. Later on the amount has been fixed at $33,000,000,000 which Germany is required to pay within practically 30 years. My position is, and it is the position of many other people in all parts of the world, that the attempt to demand such enormous reparations, which are impossible, indicates that the purpose of France is not to get the reparations, but to keep Germany in subjection and, if possible, cause a dismemberment of Germany in order that the German people may go to smash. France needs the reparations, I admit that. France ought to have all the reparations that Germany can be forced to pay. But when impossible reparations are demanded, no good is accomplished for France, no good is accomplished for any part of the world, and the only thing that is accomplished is to keep things in a condition which inevitably is going to result in war and possibly in the crash of Germany.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SUTHERLAND in the chair). Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. Will the Senator state about how much Germany has already paid in the way of reparations?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I doubt whether I can give that very satisfactorily. It is not a large amount in cash.

Mr. McKELLAR. I think she has paid a good deal in kind, in cattle and various kinds of merchandise.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Yes; that is true. The Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] has just indicated to me that $33,000,000,000 would be an amount of damage which France could not possibly have suffered, but I do not know anything about that and therefore I do not discuss it.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, the suggestion which I made to the Senator from Nebraska was that 5 per cent of the area of France was devastated by the war. If $33,000,000,000 represents the value of that 5 per cent, then the value of France would be $660,000,000,000, which, I think, is very much larger than anyone has ever estimated it to be.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I am willing for the sake of the argument to say that France needs all of the $33,000,000,000, willing even to say that she has suffered to that extent, but we all know, and it is pretty generally conceded everywhere and has been conceded at every international conference, that there is no possibility of Germany ever paying anything like that amount. At the present time France is utterly unable to begin paying to the United States the $3,000,000,000 that she owes us. That is less than 10 per cent of what is being demanded from Germany. The allied countries are claiming from Germany $33,000,000,000, and France has the lion's share, and yet France confesses to us that she is utterly unable to pay us $3,000,000,000, and we believe it. We know that French finances are in such shape that she is not even able to pay the operating expenses of her Government. She has a deficit every year. She is sinking deeper and deeper into the morass of debt. What is true of France is true of Germany. The idea of demanding $33,000,000,000 of Germany even in 30 years constitutes an impossible demand.

Now, Mr. President, I want to read a few words from an independent source. It is the Outlook of England, published in London. Under the heading "The dance of death," a writer has this to say:

[From the Outlook, August 12, 1922.]

EUROPE'S DANCE TO DEATH.

M. Poincaré's proposals to grant Germany a moratorium, and at the same time by "productive guarantees" to exact from Germany during the duration of the moratorium more reparations than if the moratorium were not in effect, are more than impossible. They are incredible. They are insane. Every non-Frenchman at the conference thought so, even the Belgians, who alone found themselves compelled at times by political considerations to lend France qualified support. The expert committee, asked to decide whether the French program would produce cash, fairly thundered a negative. English, Italians, and Japanese agreed that the proposed allied control of German mines and forests would yield no reparations, while even Belgium could not stick the French plan for a customs barrier around the Ruhr and between the occupied areas and the rest of the Reich, or the suggestion that the Allies take over a 60 per cent share in factories on the left bank of the Rhine.

Another writer in the same British publication has this to say concerning the purpose of France in demanding these impossible reparations. Speaking of Poincaré, the present French prime minister, this writer in the London Outlook says:

He knows, like every other sensible man in Europe, that Germany can not pay the astronomical indemnities. He nevertheless stated categorically that France intends to exact them, and, if necessary, by force. All the protestations of good will and fairness that he made ring as hollow as the fair words about the "will to peace" of the German people with which the Kaiser from time to time used to cozen the world.

Later in the article, in referring to a French paper, this same writer says:

Le Temps has suggested that the German indemnity be reduced from £6,600,000,000 to £2,500,000,000. (The latter is the figure we ourselves put forward early in 1921, with the result that we were accused, not only in France but in England, of fattening on German gold.)

A little later in the same article this British author says:

There are politicians and soldiers in France, and we fear M. Poincaré is in their camp, who believe that the true safety of France lies in the destruction of Germany and the glory and the destiny of France in the elevation of their country to the position to which her preeminence in war, in art, and science, and civilization manifestly entitles her. France, according to this doctrine, must destroy Germany or in time Germany, with her greater population and industrial power, will annihilate France; moreover, if France does irrevocably ruin her ancient enemy she thereby attains the hegemony of Europe and for generations to come can rule the Continent. Her armies of blacks will supply her lack of young men and her missions of control prevent other nations from preparing matériel for modern war by threats against any country that appears restive to launch la guerre préventive.

All this is very horrible, but observe how it corresponds with the facts of French policy. If those conceptions are in M. Poincaré's mind, he is no madman seeking a will-o'-the-wisp of reparations in the German swamp, but a cold-blooded, infinitely dangerous political anarchist attempting, for the sake of la gloire, to plunge Europe back into the Middle Ages. Every time M. Poincaré opens his mouth in public he increases panic and ruin in Germany, and he has the satisfaction of accurately registering the damage he has caused by watching the mark plunge down a thousand, two thousand points in response to his threats. All the drumfire of 2,000 allied cannon on the battle front in France never did half the damage to Germany that M. Poincaré has learned can be inflicted out of his own mouth by 2,000 words. Why does he pursue his present course? Any other rational explanation of his policy than those we have indicated is, indeed, difficult to discover.

Mr. President, the world is coming to that conclusion, and it would be wise for M. Clemenceau, if he wants to get the state of public opinion in the United States, to take it back to his people that the public opinion of the United States, as well as of the rest of the world, condemns the present policy of France which looks to using the existing treaty as a means of continuing the war which ended in November, 1918. That is the indictment brought against France at this time; that she is using the present treaty and her existing power to continue her war on Germany, and that the result of that policy will inevitably be to plunge Europe into another war, and, perhaps, to plunge the whole world into another war. I have not any doubt that it is the overwhelming public opinion of the United States to-day that France should be condemned for this policy.

I hope that when M. Clemenceau goes back to his country he will convey to the people of France the very distinct impression that America resents the present policy of France and will not enter into any form of cooperation with France with regard to Germany until that policy is discontinued. When the United States signed the treaty of peace with Germany it was to be a real peace; it was to end the war. The American people can not tolerate the idea that the war to destroy Germany is to go on.

The American people have a material interest as well as a sentimental interest in this matter. We in the United States can not get out of the depression in which we are now involved until a start is made toward the rehabilitation of Europe. We have our great surpluses to sell; we can not sell them except to Europe; and Europe can not buy them so long as this policy of destruction continues between two of the great nations of Europe. We have a right, and I hope the American people will make that right evident, to complain when a policy is pursued in Europe of continuing war along the lines that France is now continuing it.

Mr. President, France stands in her own light by a policy of this sort. When France requires Germany to pay $400,000,000 a year toward maintaining an army of occupation on her own soil, France is making it impossible for Germany to pay reparations. When France indulges in a constant pressure on the German Government to make a republic impossible, France is bringing about directly the inevitable cause of Germany going either into militarism or into Bolshevism, in either of which events further destruction in Europe is inevitable.

Mr. President, there is a great sympathy in the United States for France. I realize it, and I share it. I should like to see France procure what reparations are possible to restore the devastated region of France, so far as they may be restored, but it can not be done by this method. This is a method which will prevent it; this is a method which makes reparations impossible. The only sane way is for France to counsel with the other countries of the world and ascertain what reparations Germany can pay, and when that sum is determined to accept that amount.

Mr. President, why is it that Germany to-day has no credit and can borrow no money? It is because of the French policy. So long as France pursues her present policy toward Germany the bankers of the world will loan Germany no money, and there can be no relief until German credit is reestablished. When France names a reasonable figure for reparations, one which it is possible to pay, the financiers of the world will finance Germany and give her credit. Then Germany will be able to pay France; then, perhaps, France will be able to pay the United States; and then, perhaps, the work of rehabilitating the world may begin; but so long as France, the very center of the world situation, insists on demanding reparations which are impossible and continues her policy of seeking to dismember Germany there can be absolutely no rehabilitation of Europe. Germany can not get credit; loans can not be made; Germany can not pay France; France can not pay the United States; France can not pay Great Britain; every nation in Europe is going to sink into debt deeper year by year, and we are going on with the mad dance of death to a destination that none of us can as yet foresee.

So I say that it is time that some one, some friend—and the United States is a friend of France—should notify the French Government and the French people that they can look for no form of cooperation from the United States so long as this destructive policy is followed, and that such a policy meets with nothing but condemnation from the people of the United States.

If M. Clemenceau came to this country with a desire to find what the real opinion was here, I have done my part toward giving it, and I doubt whether there will be any responsible man in public life who, knowing the facts which I have brought into the Record here, will justify France in the attitude which she has taken. I hope that M. Clemenceau when he returns to France will use his great influence to convince the French people that the way of salvation is moderation, and that peace on earth and good will toward men will do more to rehabilitate France than another great European war, which will result in ruin and destruction not only to Germany but to France as well.

INTERRUPTIONS FROM THE PUBLIC GALLERY.

During Mr. HITCHCOCK's address a colored occupant of the public gallery rose and said, "Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator a moment?"

At the conclusion of Mr. HITCHCOCK's remarks,

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I rise to a point of order. A moment ago, when the Senator from Nebraska was speaking, he was interrupted by a negro in the gallery on my left. This is the first time that I have ever seen such a thing occur when the person interrupting was not removed from the gallery. I once saw a white woman ejected from the gallery in the House of Representatives for interrupting a speaker on the floor of the House; I have seen white persons ejected from the gallery of this body for interrupting the proceedings of the Senate. This is the first time that I have ever seen such an indignity and insult offered the Senate when the person offering it was not ejected from the gallery or even reprimanded by the Chair. I now demand that the person who interrupted be removed from the gallery for this insult and indignity offered to a United States Senator while discussing a question on this floor. He sits up in the gallery now; he has not been removed; he has been permitted to remain sitting there; and I am unwilling, as a Member of the Senate, to permit such an incident to pass unnoticed. I challenge his right to sit in the gallery and demand that he be removed as a punishment for the insult and indignity offered to a United States Senator upon this floor and to the Senate itself.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, as I understand, the man in the gallery rose and asked if it would be in order for him to ask a question of the Senator speaking. That is all he did. He at once was called upon by the doorkeeper—at least I saw the doorkeeper speak to him—and I judge that he was told he could not interrupt a Senator or speak from the gallery. Since that time he has not said anything. I do not think the man intended any harm. As I understand, he asked a question such as a man might ask if he knew nothing about the rules and practice of the Senate. He has been informed that he can not interrupt. I am sorry the Chair did not tell him so, but I think the better way to do is to let the matter alone. No doubt the man will not again interrupt a Senator or the Senate.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, the Republican Party is in the majority here and therefore has control of the situation. I protest against the failure to act in this instance, and I bring it to the attention of the Senate. I am powerless, of course, to go beyond that. If this negro does not know any better, he needs to be taught better sense than to stand up in the gallery and to interrupt a United States Senator while he is discussing a question on the floor of the Senate. He has no business to sit in the gallery. We have seen white women removed from the gallery of the House and white men and women removed from the gallery of the Senate, and yet a negro is permitted under Republican rule to retain a seat in the gallery when he has interrupted the deliberations of the Senate and violated the rules of this body.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, so far as I am concerned I take the same view of the matter that is taken by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS]. I think it was through ignorance that the young man made the mistake.

Mr. HEFLIN. I do not think it was through ignorance at all; I think it was through impudence.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Well, Mr. President, whatever it was, he at once subsided, and, while it would have been proper for the Presiding Officer to have had him put out of the gallery, so far as I am personally concerned I hope he will not be interfered with or reflected on. I know there are many people who come here not realizing the fact that they are not allowed to speak from the gallery.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, there are very few such people. If we are going to eject the white women from the gallery when they seek to interrupt a Senator on the floor and white men are to be ejected, why shall a negro be permitted to do the same thing and then remain unmolested in the gallery? We had just as well settle this question now. Shall people be permitted to interrupt a Senator, I do not care what he is talking about, by "hollering" at him from the gallery? Evidently something was being said that this negro objected to and he boldly blurted out an interruption to the Senator. He was not even reprimanded for his act, and still occupies his seat in the gallery. I protest against it, and I demand that he be put out.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HEFLIN. I yield.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. The man against whom the Senator is protesting is a wounded colored soldier. If it gratifies the Senator, he may know that the man has been removed, and the Senator may have the satisfaction of having driven from the gallery of the Senate a man who was wounded in the service of his country.

Mr. HEFLIN. I do not care how many uniforms he has on; he has no business to stand in the gallery and interrupt a United States Senator on this floor. He was not removed until I demanded that he be removed. We are not going to make the Senate Chamber a place where anybody can stand in the gallery and interrupt a Senator and seek to heckle or intimidate him. We will have that some day if we permit such a thing as this.

This sort of interruption is not going to be carried on while I am here; and I protest against this kind of discrimination against the white people in favor of the negro who was sitting in the gallery.

LIBERIAN LOAN.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 270) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to establish a credit with the United States for the Government of Liberia.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President, I wish to detain the Senate but for a few moments to invite their attention to the joint resolution which is before us for consideration and which is to be disposed of within a very short time.

I very earnestly ask Senators to pay heed to the facts which are involved in this proposition. I venture to say that the preamble of this joint resolution sets forth historic facts which do honor to America and reflect credit upon Liberia. I must assume that Senators are familiar with these historic facts. It ought not to be forgotten that this little Republic had the earnest, heartfelt sympathy and encouragement of one of the early great men of this Republic. It ought not to be forgotten that Thomas Jefferson was largely instrumental in bringing about the establishment of this little Republic in the then dark continent. It ought not to be forgotten that this little Republic has had the earnest and sympathetic assistance of this great Republic from the day Liberia was founded, and that our Government in various and sundry ways has manifested its interest in that little, struggling country.

I repeat that the preamble sets forth briefly historic facts, which do honor to our country and reflect credit upon little Liberia.

Moreover, it should not be forgotten by us, if by others, that this little country became an associate or an ally of ours in the Great War; nor should it be forgotten by any Senator on this floor that that little country imperiled its very existence when it joined with us.

Mr. REED of Missouri. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Certainly.

Mr. REED of Missouri. What did Liberia contribute to the war?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I will answer the Senator in this way: She declared war on August 4, 1917. I repeat, she imperiled her very existence. She was weak; she is weak; she was exposed. She was in a position where her independence could have been absolutely destroyed and would have been destroyed if Germany had triumphed in the war. She sent no army into the field. She had none. She sent no navy into hostile waters. She had none. But her position was such, her resources were such, as to be of service to the Allies or associates, and she was willing to give all in her power to aid the common cause.

Mr. REED of Missouri. Will the Senator tell us what resources she contributed?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. In a moment.

Mr. REED of Missouri. The Senator says she did not give us any army; she did not give us any navy. What resources did she have that she contributed?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I will answer the Senator and will approach the matter in a moment more in detail. I have answered. Her assistance was sought. She was induced to join with us, and she stood ready and willing to furnish men if called upon. She was not called upon; they did not enter the battle line; but she became an ally and an associate.

Mr. REED of Missouri rose.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Pardon me a moment, for I do not purpose speaking long. I also assume that Senators have some definite knowledge in respect to the extent of this little country. It is about the size of Ohio or New York. It has a population of, say, 1,050,000. Ten thousand of those people are called Americo-Africans. They are emigrants from this country, or descendants of emigrants; and it should not be forgotten by the learned Senator from Missouri that every statesman from Jefferson to this hour has encouraged that country and, along with that view of public policy, has urged emigration to that country from America. That is a collateral thought, and yet it enters into my mind.

Of those occupying the towns along the coast some 10,000 are so-called Americo-Africans. There are probably 40,000 people occupying the coast towns; and right there let it be not forgotten, either, that out of reverence for this Republic they named their town Monrovia, after the great man that we all revere, President Monroe; also, that they have modeled their constitution after ours, that they have always looked to this country as their friend, and that this country up to this hour has always been the friend of that little Republic.

It is true that there are 1,050,000 of these people, and they are colored men; they are negroes. I do not choose to call them "niggers." They are colored men, and they were willing to do what other colored men did—shed their blood in the forefront of battle in order that this Republic might triumph. In addition to the 40,000 living in the coast towns there are a million more of them, divided into many tribes, living in the interior, making in all practically 1,050,000 people.

Mr. REED of Missouri. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for another question?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. If the Senator will pardon me for a moment, I wish to finish. When I have concluded, and covered brief notes that I have, I shall be very glad to join in any colloquy.

Liberia became our ally on August 4, 1917. I necessarily repeat when I say that by so doing she showed her friendship for us and for others, for it is manifest that had the battle gone otherwise her little territory, her independence, all would have been swept away. There may be those who attach no importance to that. I am not one of that class. I appreciate it, I praise it, and it enters into my views as to what we should do in respect to this joint resolution.

Liberia does not come here asking a gift. She does not ask us to give her anything. She does come, however, asking for a loan of $5,000,000. Have not other nations of Europe come in the same guise? Have we not loaned money to great empires and great republics? Have we not loaned in the aggregate over $10,000,000,000 to the different nations of Europe? And do not those nations of Europe to-day owe us over $11,000,000,000, principal and interest?

When did we loan that money? I invite the attention of my friend from Missouri to that question. When did we loan these $11,000,000,000 to European countries or peoples or nations?

Let me answer my own question. I read from an address by Mr. Eliot Wadsworth, Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, delivered on November 24. Four years ago, Mr. President, the armistice was signed. From the signing of the armistice we have loaned to European nations over 30 per cent of the total amount now due us from those countries—a fact with which, I frankly confess, I was not familiar until so advised by the Assistant Secretary.

He said:

After the armistice the United States continued its financial support to Europe on a liberal scale, not alone to clean up war liabilities but to help meet the needs of old and new nations precipitately changing from a war to a peace basis. Loans of two and a half billion under the Liberty loan acts, eighty-four million under the relief acts, were made, while much-needed supplies were sold on credit by the Army and Navy to an amount of $575,000,000, a total of $3,154,000,000, or over 30 per cent of the total loans which we are now discussing.

The Secretary was discussing the proposition advanced by many European diplomats and propagandists and by some strangely constituted Americans that we should cancel these debts, that we should wipe them off, forgetting the while that we are burdened with a national debt of some twenty-three or twenty-four billion dollars, much of which was incurred in order that we might loan to these European nations the full $10,000,000,000. But since the armistice, entered into full four years ago, this Nation has loaned to these nations of Europe the large, the colossal, sum of $3,154,000,000, or over 30 per cent of the total loans which we are now discussing. I invite attention to this fact—to these loans made after the armistice—in order to add that if it was wise, if it was proper, if it was just, if it was right for us after the armistice to loan these vast sums of money to the different nations of Europe who had suffered by the Great War, is it not at least defensible now to assist the little nation of Liberia, which also suffered as the result of the war? Is it not worthy of America, commendable, for us to listen respectfully to the appeal of that little struggling nation, which was willing to risk its very existence along with our allies or associates?

I invite the attention of thoughtful Senators to the facts that we loaned to Armenia some $11,000,000; to Austria, $24,000,000; to Belgium, $377,000,000; to Cuba, $7,000,000; to Czechoslovakia, $91,000,000; to Estonia, the new little country of Europe, $13,000,000; to Finland, $8,000,000; to France, almost $3,500,000,000; to Great Britain, $4,000,000,000; to Greece, $15,000,000; to Hungary, nearly $2,000,000; to Italy, one and three-quarter billions in round numbers. To Latvia—do all Senators know just where Latvia is?—we have loaned that little newborn country $5,000,000. To Lithuania, another new country born out of the Great World War, we have loaned $5,000,000; to Poland, $135,000,000; to Rumania, $36,000,000; to Russia, $192,000,000; to Serbia, $51,000,000; and we are told here authoritatively that of these large loans full 30 per cent have been made after the armistice four years ago.

I do not criticize the making of those loans. I am assuming, for the purposes of my remarks, that they were wisely made, and that they reflected credit upon us; that they enabled those several nations to rehabilitate themselves; and if all this be true, then, in perfect candor and without any passion, I ask, Senators, will it not be proper, is it not right, that we should now endeavor to help the little country of Liberia by a loan of $5,000,000?

My friend from Missouri asked me directly, and in such form as would call for a direct answer. What did Liberia do? I answer, as I did before, that so far as I am at present advised none of her people were called to the battle front. She had no navy, but she was willing to give any and all assistance within her power, and in that connection I am indebted to this article, written by Bishop W. H. Overs, appearing in the Current History magazine, published by the New York Times Co., for some very interesting information concerning this little Republic of Liberia. I take the time of Senators to read one brief paragraph:

During the submarine activity of Germany a German submarine visited Liberia.

Liberia has a coast line of some 350 or 360 miles. There are no harbors, but she is so situated as to expose her to the enemy at sea. I continue reading:

The commander sent a message to the Government at Monrovia, stating that the French wireless station must be destroyed, or Monrovia suffer the consequences of an attack by the submarine, which lay in the sea close to the Liberian coast. The people were absolutely at the mercy of the German submarine. They were called together by the President of the Republic.

Who, by the way, happened to be Mr. C. B. D. King, at the present time the President.

The whole facts of the case were placed before them. There were a few who, in a cowardly way, advised the Government to destroy the French wireless station, but the majority of the people declared, "We must be true to our allies, regardless of the consequences to us," and they sent a message to the commander of the submarine refusing his request. Many buildings were destroyed by the submarine shells, and one does not know what the consequences would have been had not an English merchant vessel appeared on the horizon and driven the German submarine from the Liberian waters.

I must assume that the wireless station there was of value, doubtless of military value. A demand was made that it be destroyed. They refused. The town was shelled, and probably would have been destroyed with great loss but for the merchant vessel which appeared and drove off the submarine.

Many things run through my mind, but I can not detain the Senate to express them. There is one thing, however, to which I wish to call the attention of Senators. We have not only loaned vast sums of money to the nations of Europe since the armistice and since the peace; we have, either through governmental agencies or private channels, fed the hungry and sent medicine to the sick, clothing to the naked, and words of cheer and comfort. According to figures which I have here, we have expended in that way probably over seventy-odd million dollars. Up to December 31, 1921, the Near East Relief Association, made up of American men and women from all the States of our Union, advanced over $51,000,000 in cash, and during this year over $7,000,000 in cash, to help the weak and the feeble and the sick and the dying peoples of Europe.

In addition to that, Senators will remember the discussion which occurred here on December 6 of last year, when our Government, through a resolution passed, decided to furnish medicines and various other articles either on long-time credit or, if necessary, by way of gift to those in sore need in Europe and Asia. Indeed, we particularly relieved the Russian people, the starving people in China, and many of the hungry and naked and dying people of the Balkan States. What have we not done, what has not this Nation, to its honor eternal, to its glory undimmed, done for Armenia, and what are we now asked to do for that struggling people, which has kept the light on God's altar shining since the fourth century, surrounded by enemies, oppressed by barbaric people?

It is not the hour to pay tribute to my country, though I glory in what we have done, and I shall join with others here or elsewhere in doing more along the same line for the struggling peoples of the world. We are rich, we are great, we are powerful, and in all our relations with foreign nations we have been righteous. What I want is that in this hour Senators here, regardless of partisanship, shall rise and do something for a little country made up of colored men and colored women, which is in form of government a Republic; to aid them in their hard struggle; to loan them some money to build roads, to erect schoolhouses, to assist the churches of Liberia, to assist in their public activities in developing agriculture in that country, help them to develop their many natural resources. I want my country to help the feeble even as we have helped the strong.

Why, when the poor cried, Caesar wept, but here on this floor when this little country, made up, if you please, of colored men and women, when this little country, rich in resources and able to give us ample security, comes asking for a loan, she is met with scoff and sneer and ridicule. One, and I was not pleased to hear it, thought it timely and seemly and worthy of the American Senate to heap ridicule and irony upon the little republic. It did not cause me to smile, but rather to grieve that any American Senator could forget our own humble beginning and early struggles.

What I am saying now is that we are asked to loan $5,000,000. The negotiations toward the loan were commenced by a former President of the United States. There is no man born of woman who has ever heard me say one word personally disrespectful to the former President of the United States. In private station and far away I have opposed the policies advocated by him, but never have I questioned his patriotism, never have I had any doubt of the purity of the motives which animated him. He, the former President, his Cabinet, and his administration set on foot the movement for the loan, and the present administration, speaking through the Secretary of State, has informed us that the administration thinks we are morally bound to go forward and consummate the loan. No one argues that we are legally bound to do so, but it is stated here that we are morally bound to do so. Be that as it may, my position is this, and let it be recorded, that whether we are morally bound or legally bound in this present moment, I think we should assist the little Liberian Republic, and I do earnestly believe that that is the wish of the American people. I think that if Jefferson, if Lincoln and all the great Presidents who have favored this republic and assisted it in times gone by could rise in this chamber and speak to us, they would say to you and say to me, "Let us now further help this little country to live and to develop. We watched over it in our day; assist it now."

Nor need we fear to lose by so doing. The plan outlined will safeguard the loan. The resources of that country are ample to pay. We loaned to other countries and they come here, some of them, whining and asking to be relieved from their obligations. I venture to predict that little Liberia will never seek to have canceled nor will she ever attempt to repudiate this loan. Her resources are ample, her administration will be guarded, and we can safely advance the amount.

Mr. President, I have poorly and in an illogical manner presented my views, but I earnestly hope that the Senate will consummate the loan for the honor of our country and the benefit of the Republic of Liberia.

Mr. REED of Missouri. Mr. President, my throat is in no condition to reply to the remarks just made, but there are two or three things to which I wish to call attention as best I may be able.

The Senator from California [Mr. SHORTRIDGE] in advocating the loan of $5,000,000 to Liberia said that we have loaned money to other countries, hence we should loan money to Liberia. That argument amounts to this, taken by itself, that because we loaned money to great countries engaged with us in a war we should hereafter loan money to every nation that asks for money. Such reasoning arrives nowhere except at an absurd conclusion.

The Senator tells us that the money will be safely loaned. Upon what kind of security? There are 2,000,000 people in Liberia. It is claimed that only 1 out of 500 is civilized. I read from the Encyclopædia Britannica:

Many of the indigenous races of Liberia in the forest beyond 40 miles from the coast still practice cannibalism.

If we go 40 miles from the coast we are among the cannibals. I wonder if the security they give us will be the heads of the missionaries or if it will be the heads of their fellows whom they take in battle and upon whom they feast? Poor little Liberia, over which the tall sycamore of the western coast weeps tears!

But "we should clothe the naked," said my distinguished friend. I read further from the Encyclopædia:

In some of the forest tribes the women still go quite naked.

I presume the Senator is going over there first to lasso them, capture them, and then "clothe the naked." I wonder how long they would be in eating the Senator from California if he went over on that mission, and what a beautiful roast he would make. [Laughter.] With what delight the naked women would dance around the philanthropist from California who proposes to capture them and force them to wear clothes! [Laughter.]

Security? Good security? By a people 1 out of 500 of whom can lay any claim to being civilized? The other 499 are savages. How many of them are cannibals we are not informed, but they still practice cannibalism, and the Liberian Government, to which it is proposed to loan the money, has not had enough influence or power to stop the roasting and eating of human beings among their own population.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. REED of Missouri. I yield.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Assuming all that to be so, which I do not believe to be a fact, but assuming it all to be so, why not let us proceed to civilize them?

Mr. REED of Missouri. Yes; let us take some money and go over and build some roads, but let us do something else. Let us make mighty sure that about $600,000 of that money will not ultimately get into the hands of five or six American grafters. Let us make mighty sure that we are taking care of the loan.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. That is made sure by the Harrison amendment to the resolution.

Mr. REED of Missouri. Nothing is made sure. When the money goes into the hands of the Liberian Government, it simply means that they can divert such other funds as they have for the purpose of paying the grafters who put this graft through with the assistance of the Senator from California.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. They could not be as big grafters as have been and are now in this country, and which this administration proposes to throw into jail.

Mr. REED of Missouri. Again the Senator makes the argument, "There were other loans, hence this one must be made. There are other grafters, hence I join with the grafters." It is a great argument to be made from the floor of the Senate, that there were other grafts, hence we should encourage this graft; there were other horse thieves, hence everybody can steal horses; there were other murderers unhung, hence let these men go free; there were other grafters, therefore let this graft be sanctified. What an argument! I would not have made that argument when I was ten years old.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. If the Senator will pardon me, I have not made any such argument. I do not claim that. The Senator ought to know that I cited the case of other loans to show what the Nation had done since the armistice.

Mr. REED of Missouri. Well, the RECORD will show what the Senator said and what I said, and we will let it go at that. There are only a few minutes left in which to discuss the matter.

Build roads in Liberia when we can not build roads in our own country! There are good roads in California. The people of California had to pay for them. Any nation that is worth anything can build roads over which to travel, but we have not enough money to build good roads everywhere. We have not enough money to build good roads in many places. Let us build some good roads in our own country. We have not enough money to build roads all over Africa for cannibals to lead the missionaries and other victims over as they take them out to roast them alive.

We could take this $5,000,000 and complete the dams that are in process of construction on the Ohio River and which would turn the commerce of that great section of country into the Mississippi. We have held down our appropriations and have been some 10 or 15 years completing that series of dams. We were told when we were appropriating money for our own internal improvements that the Government could not afford it; that it could not afford it because the taxpayers were too much burdened; and yet if we devoted this money to that purpose in two years' time we could turn into the Mississippi more commerce than will be created by Liberia in 500 years. We could take this money and improve the channel of the Mississippi River from Cairo to St. Louis so that great fleets of boats could ply those waters.

We tried to get the money last year, but the provision for that purpose was stricken out of the bill, because the country, it was said, was too poor and the burden upon our taxpayers would be too great. It is proposed, however, that we shall take an equal sum now to a distant country and build roads where only 40,000 people, it is even pretended, are civilized.

There are more than 40,000 negroes in the city of St. Louis alone. There are only 10,000 negroes in Liberia who, it is claimed, came from the United States. They were sent over there and given land and ought to take care of themselves. It is now proposed, however, that we take this money, which we ought to be expending at home on our own internal improvements, and go over and build roads for a people not 1 of 500 of whom is not a savage.

Oh, it is said, "they helped us in the World War." What a pitiable plea! What did they do in that war? Four or five colored gentlemen, or it may be fifteen or twenty of them, got together and passed a resolution that war is hereby declared. What a silly performance! They never sent a man to Europe; they never contributed a gun; they never contributed a pound of material; they never contributed an ounce of energy. They merely passed a resolution. The only time they ever sent a man to Europe was when a delegate was sent to the Versailles conference; and we had to pay his fare for the round trip. The whole Government of Liberia could not raise enough money to send two or three delegates to the peace conference unless we paid their fare. They have one gunboat. I read a description of it a few years ago. It was stated that this gunboat would run out, intercept a steamer coming in, and would commandeer enough coal to get back to port.

This proposition would never have been heard of in the world but for the graft that is in it; but for the fact that some speculative gentlemen have bought the bonds of Liberia. That country was being financed chiefly by an English and a French bank before the World War. They practically had it in receivership, with the United States acting as amicus curiæ in the receivership proceedings. Now they are going to unload this debt on Uncle Sam. It is now proposed to take this money, which belongs to the people of the United States and does not belong to Congress, and give it to a foreign country.

I challenge the right of Congress to appropriate a penny of the money of the people of the United States for the benefit of any foreign nation. I boldly make that challenge. In war the reason we had a right to loan money to the nations who were fighting by our side was that they and we were engaged in a common enterprise. When we loaned that money we were assisting ourselves and we were loaning it for the benefit of this country by helping other countries to help us as we were helping them. It was a war measure and was constitutional. But I challenge the right of this Government to appropriate a single dollar of the taxpayers' money for any other enterprise than one for the benefit of the American Republic. If Congress has a right to loan Liberia this money, which is collected from the taxpayers of this land, then it has the right in time of peace to loot the Treasury and to continue to loan money to France, to England, to Russia, and to all the other countries of the world; to take the taxpayers' money, which was wrong from them for the purpose of supporting this Government, and establish a national pawnbroker's institution, hang up three balls over it, and go into the business of loaning money.

That, however, is a bad illustration which I have used, for no pawnbroker on this earth and no other man with any sense would ever make this loan with the expectation of ever getting it back. Nobody expects to get it back. It is a graft, pure and simple.

There are two motives back of it. I boldly make the charge. One of them is the force of capitalists who want the bonds which they hold to be redeemed. There has never yet been one of them in modern days, of whom I have any knowledge, who has not been perfectly willing to loot the Treasury of the United States for his own personal benefit. When you encounter an international financier you find a man who is trying to get money from both sides at the same time. All of them would compel the United States, if they could, to redeem at a hundred cents every obligation they bought at a tremendous discount. That is one motive. The other motive is the political ambition of gentlemen to secure the colored vote and to pay for it out of the United States Treasury. I have no doubt that many copies of the Senator's speech will be printed and circulated among the colored brethren of his State when the next election comes around, and they will say, "See what a champion he was of our people; he not only loved the American negro but his heart expanded so that he embraced within it all of the colored folk, even of Africa."

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President—

Mr. REED of Missouri. I will yield in a moment. "His tender soul was tortured by the thought of the naked women over there in the forests, and he wanted to see them clothed; and so, my colored brethren, we ought to vote for this great friend of ours who so nobly defended us in the Senate of the United States." That is the motive back of this joint resolution.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a moment?

Mr. REED of Missouri. I have only four minutes left, but I will yield to the Senator.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Such is not my motive; but I wish to say to the Senator from Missouri that I am the friend and, if necessary, here or elsewhere will become the champion of the negro, whether he be in America or in Africa, as I will be the champion of any poor, lowly, struggling man.

Mr. REED of Missouri. That is just what I said.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I am not saying this for the people of California, because every colored man, woman, and child in California knows my life and knows the sentiments of my life, which I adhere to and here proclaim.

Mr. REED of Missouri. I gave the Senator an excellent opportunity to reiterate and reaffirm his affectionate regard for the colored race. I believe that the colored man is entitled to decent treatment in this country, but I do not believe that in order to get his vote we ought to take $5,000,000, wrung from the taxpayers of this country, and send it 7,000 miles from here to be expended building roads in a country which is inhabited by barbarians, savages, and cannibals. That is too expensive a way to get votes. It would be better to get them by direct action here. The only difference is that to obtain such votes by direct action here the political committee would have to pay for them, whereas if the funds can be had out of the Treasury of the United States it is a mighty cheap way of campaigning.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me just one further observation?

Mr. REED of Missouri. I have only three minutes left now, but I will give the Senator a part of my time. I wish to be fair.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I merely wish to say that I do not think the eloquent Senator from Missouri would have uttered such sentiments when the same colored men were fighting for us and shedding their blood on the battle fields of Europe.

Mr. REED of Missouri. I said that I wanted the American negro to be treated decently—

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. But he is not being so treated.

Mr. REED of Missouri. And he will be treated decently by me. He fought and he shed his blood, but it is not proposed to give him this money; it is proposed to give money to some cannibals in Africa. Who has reflected on the American negro? I have not. The only reflection that is made on the American negro is by the man who thinks he can fool the American negro into voting for him by voting away $5,000,000 of other people's money, to be sent six or seven thousand miles from the place where the American negro can not even get a sight of it. That is the reflection, and it is the only reflection that is cast on the negro here to-day, and it is cast by those who think that he can be purchased in that way. There are many American negroes who have risen to a point of intelligence and patriotism where they will resent just such action as this. There are many of them who are beginning to take broad and big views of life. My hand has never struck a blow and my voice has never uttered a syllable against the negro in America who tried to make a good citizen of himself, who improved his opportunity as best he may.

The Senator from California says America is rich. How long will America remain rich with statesmen who propose to vote money away in this reckless fashion? Where shall we place the limit upon the waste of the money of our people? I would rather take this $5,000,000 and establish great hospitals for the negroes in this country, if it is desired to get the negro vote by giving him special attention; I would rather take it to feed some people who are hungry; I would rather take it to build some great public works that would be of benefit; I would rather keep it in the Treasury where it belongs and where we can devote it to proper purposes.

It is said that there is a moral obligation involved. I affirm to the Senate there is no such thing as a moral obligation that can be connected with any appropriation of this kind. If the Government of the United States, acting within its due authority, committed itself to the proposition, it is a legal obligation, and if it went outside of its authority, then it was guilty of an attempted usurpation, and usurpation is about the worst crime that can be committed. I do not believe there has been an act of usurpation. We, the Congress, do not own this money; we act merely as agents. When we act within the purview of our authority we create a binding legal obligation; but when we go outside of our authority we are usurpers; we violate our oaths of office and our duty to our constituencies. Hence, when you talk to me about a moral obligation in connection with a thing of this kind I reject it and repudiate it, because it is the most immoral thing in the world to claim that any man can commit the American people to any obligation.

It is time we ceased this miserable wasting of the people's money. It is time we took such bills as this and put them forever in the wastebasket and let them remain there.

The VICE PRESIDENT (at 2 o'clock and 30 minutes p. m.). The time for debate under the unanimous-consent agreement has expired.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.
The roll was called, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	George	McNary	Simmons

Mr. FLETCHER. My colleague [Mr. TRAMMELL] is unavoidably absent. He is paired with the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. COLT].

The VICE PRESIDENT. Seventy-five Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, on Friday last I lodged a motion, but did not offer it. I will not at present offer the motion which I then lodged. I move that the joint resolution be recommitted to the Committee on Finance.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion to recommit.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I move to amend the motion made by the Senator from North Carolina by inserting that the joint resolution be recommitted to the Committee on Finance with instructions to report the same back to the Senate with all matter stricken therefrom except the amendment offered by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] appropriating $20,000,000 for reclamation purposes and the amendment offered by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] providing for additional inspectors to carry out the railway inspection service.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. SIMMONS. Upon the amendment to my motion I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state his inquiry.

Mr. FLETCHER. I take it that if the motion to recommit with instructions should not prevail, the question would then arise on the motion to recommit generally, without instructions.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That is correct. The Secretary will call the roll.

The reading clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BROUSSARD (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. MOSES], who is absent. Not being able to secure a transfer, I withhold my vote.

Mr. HALE (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS] to the junior Senator from Nevada [Mr. ODDIE] and will vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. McCUMBER (when his name was called). I transfer my general pair with the junior Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] to the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PEPPER] and will vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. STANLEY (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. ERNST]. In his absence I withhold my vote.

Mr. SUTHERLAND (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON]. As he is absent, and I do not know how he would vote if present, I withhold my vote.

Mr. WATSON (when his name was called). My general pair with the senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] I transfer to the junior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS], and will vote. I vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. CURTIS. I desire to announce that if the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. MOSES] were present, he would vote in the negative on this question.

I have been requested to announce the following general pairs:

The Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM] with the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS];

The Senator from Illinois [Mr. McCORMICK] with the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. KENDRICK]; and

The Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. COLT] with the Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL].

Mr. FLETCHER. My colleague [Mr. TRAMMELL] is necessarily absent. If present, he would vote "yea" on this question.

Mr. SWANSON. My colleague [Mr. GLASS] is necessarily absent. If present, he would vote "yea" on this question.

The result was announced—yeas 34, nays 38, as follows:

So Mr. McNARY's amendment to Mr. SIMMONS's motion was rejected.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question recurs on the motion made by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] to recommit the joint resolution to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. SIMMONS. Upon that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the reading clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BROUSSARD (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. MOSES]. On this question I am informed he would vote as I expect to vote, and therefore I shall vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. McCUMBER (when his name was called). Transferring my pair as on the previous vote, I vote "nay."

Mr. SUTHERLAND (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON]. I understand that if he were present he would vote "yea" on the pending motion. I therefore feel at liberty to vote, and I vote "yea."

Mr. WATSON (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS], but he would vote as I expect to vote, I am informed, and therefore I vote "yea."

Mr. STANLEY. I transfer my pair with the junior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. ERNST] to the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], and vote "yea."

So the joint resolution was recommitted to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. CURTIS. I ask unanimous consent to have printed, in connection with the Liberian joint resolution loan, letters from two of the gentlemen referred to by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] the other day, denying they had anything to do with the commission.

There being no objection, the letters were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., November 27, 1922.

HON. CHARLES CURTIS,
Senator, United States Senate,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR CURTIS: When the Liberian loan bill was up for consideration in the United States Senate on November 24 Senator PAT HARRISON, of Mississippi, made the charge that I was one of five persons who had a contract to obtain $650,000 if the Liberian loan bill should pass the Senate.

I was amazed that such a statement should be made by the honorable Senator for the reason that it is absolutely without foundation in fact.

I had no connection with the matter, directly or indirectly. I was never approached by any person or persons seeking to enlist my services in the matter of furthering the interest of the bill. During the whole of the time that the Liberian commission was present in the United States no member thereof, in conversation with me, ever referred to the loan and no other person representing Liberia has ever approached me concerning the matter. I have never been promised one cent nor contracted to receive any fee or part of any commission in the event that the bill should be passed by the United States Senate.

I emphatically deny the charge made by the Senator and am sending this letter in order that you and other Senators may know that no promise has ever been made to me nor have I contracted nor sought to contract for the payment to me of any money in connection with the passage of the bill.

I have never spoken nor written to any Senator or Representative one word concerning or in behalf of the proposed bill.

In justice to truth, I would be glad if this denial could be made in the same forum where Senator HARRISON, relying upon misinformation received by him, made the charge on last Friday.

Yours with great respect,

WM. L. HOUSTON.

HOWARD UNIVERSITY,
Washington, D. C., November 27, 1922.

HON. CHARLES CURTIS,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR CURTIS: On the floor of the United States Senate Friday, November 24, the junior Senator from Mississippi, Mr. PAT HARRISON, in the course of his remarks opposing the passage of the Liberian loan bill, said:

"It is pretty generally understood, I think, that certain persons have a contract with the Government of Liberia that in the event this loan is made they are to receive a fee or commission of $650,000. It is not a secret that the five persons who have this contract with the Government of Liberia are members of the colored race. They have been very conspicuous around the corridors of the Capitol buttonholing Senators and using every influence in order to obtain the passage of this legislation."

In the further course of the Senator's statement naming the five persons he mentioned my name as one of the "five persons" who are to receive a fee or commission from the Liberian Government in case the Liberian loan bill is passed.

No matter by whom inspired, no matter through whom the information reached the Senator, I wish most emphatically to deny the truthfulness of these charges.

I have no claim against the Liberian Government.

I have no contract of any kind or character whatsoever with the Liberian Government, or with any agent or official of the Liberian Government.

I am to receive no fee of any character from the Liberian Government.

I have "buttonholed" no Senator nor have I sought to influence any Senator to secure the passage of this legislation.

I do, of course, favor the passage of the Liberian loan bill; I think most thoughtful colored Americans favor it. I hope a majority of the Senate Members will. Only a small coterie of colored politicians, upon whom the Senator doubtless depended for information in this matter, do not favor it. I shall not undertake to characterize their motives.

My interest in Liberia dates back to 1909, when I went to Liberia by appointment of President William H. Taft as a member of the American Commission to Liberia. It was through the efforts of this commission that Liberia's difficulties at that time were adjusted and its debts refunded.

My interest was also shown in 1918, when I was one of a group of persons who met President Wilson at the White House for a discussion of this Liberian credit, the meeting having been arranged by Maj. Robert R. Moton, the principal of Tuskegee Institute, Alabama, who enjoyed the confidence and good will of the former President. In this group at the time also were Dr. Thomas Jesse Jones, secretary of the Phelps-Stokes Fund, and Dr. James H. Dillard, president of the John F. Slater and Anna T. Jeanes Funds, both white men of high character and devotion to the best interests of white and colored people alike.

Also, in 1919, when President-elect King, of Liberia, came to America, and again in 1921, when he came as President of the Republic of Liberia, I was personally requested by officials of the State Department to cooperate with them in working out plans for the entertainment of these guests of the United States. I did so.

For years I have been deeply interested in the welfare of Liberia. I have been actuated, however, solely by a genuine interest in the struggles of the little Republic on the West Coast of Africa. I have never at any time sustained to the Liberian Government or Liberian officials any relationship based upon contracts or understandings to the effect that I am to receive money from the Liberian Government.

It is therefore exceedingly unfair for the junior Senator from Mississippi to publicly make a statement manifestly intended to unfavorably reflect upon me when he could most easily have been directly and correctly informed as to the facts in the matter.

It is also most unfair to the junior Senator from Mississippi for him to have been made the dupe of certain negro politicians from his own State, who are seeking to feed personal grudges rather than to furnish the truth, and whose false representations have caused the Senator to make statements on the floor of the Senate which he, himself, confesses he is unable to prove.

Sincerely yours,

EMMETT J. SCOTT.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, there were extensive hearings on the Liberian loan joint resolution before the House committee, and the print of those hearings has been exhausted. There is one very serious question which has come up in connection with the joint resolution, as to whether or not there is a moral obligation on the part of the Government of the United States to make the loan. I feel, at least, that it is necessary that I have an opportunity to read those hearings in order that I may be able to determine that question for myself, and I believe there are other Senators who feel similarly about it. So I suggest that those hearings be reprinted so that we can have the benefit of them before the joint resolution comes up again for further consideration.

Mr. CURTIS. I think the committee has full authority to have those hearings printed, and the request will be presented to the committee at the first meeting.

Mr. POMERENE. Very well.

SUPPRESSION OF MOR VIOLENCE.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 13) to assure to persons within the jurisdiction of every State equal protection of the laws, and to punish the crime of lynching.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state his inquiry.

Mr. HARRISON. The motion, of course, is debatable.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair understands that the motion is debatable. The question is on the motion of the Senator from California.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, understanding that the motion is debatable, I desire to make some remarks upon the criticism that has been directed in this Chamber toward the distinguished visitor to this country, Monsieur Clemenceau.

Mr. BORAH. Will the Senator yield while I make a request for unanimous consent? I think it will take only a moment.

Mr. MYERS. I yield with pleasure for that purpose.

LAND TITLES IN NEW MEXICO.

Mr. BORAH. A few days since I moved to have returned to the Senate from the House the bill (S. 3855) to ascertain and settle land claims of persons not Indians within Pueblo Indian land, land grants, and reservations in the State of New Mexico. That bill has now been returned, and I ask unanimous consent that the votes by which the bill was ordered to a third reading and passed be reconsidered.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. A parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state his inquiry.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I made a motion, after having been recognized by the Chair, that the Senate take up and proceed immediately with the consideration of House bill 13.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That motion is before the Senate.

Mr. BORAH. This will not interfere with the Senator's motion. This is a request for unanimous consent. I do not desire to interfere with that bill.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I ask for a ruling from the Presiding Officer as to whether the matter now suggested by the Senator from Idaho will in any wise disturb my motion, which is before the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will not, if the unanimous consent asked shall be given. The question is on the request for unanimous consent to reconsider the votes by which Senate bill 3855 was read the third time and passed. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the votes are reconsidered.

Mr. BORAH. I ask that the bill be referred back to the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys, which is the committee whence it came, I understand.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so referred.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Montana has the floor.

Mr. HARRISON. Will the Senator from Montana yield?

Mr. MYERS. I yield.

Mr. HARRISON. Is it not in order now to move to take up another bill?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is not. There is a motion pending to take up House bill No. 13.

VISIT OF M. CLEMENCEAU—FRANCE AND GERMANY.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I desire at this time to make a few remarks upon the criticisms which have been directed in this Chamber toward our distinguished visitor in this country from France, M. Clemenceau. I do not intend to enter into any personal controversy between the distinguished Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] and our distinguished visitor, M. Clemenceau. I can not be satisfied, though, to let this occasion pass without uttering my dissent from the manner in which M. Clemenceau has been criticized and assailed from this Chamber. I can not let the opportunity pass by without some note of dissent being expressed on that criticism, and I emphatically dissent from it in a number of particulars. I would not be satisfied to let this day pass without some utterance in this Chamber in behalf of our distinguished visitor, M. Clemenceau, and the country from which he comes, France, even though it has to come from me and be expressed in my feeble way.

As I read the utterances of M. Clemenceau in this country up to the time that he was taunted by the Senator from Nebraska upon the fact that black troops are quartered by France upon German territory; until that time, as I read M. Clemenceau's utterances, the sum and substance of what he said was simply this: That we withdrew from Europe too soon; that we should have gone into the League of Nations and should be there now, taking part in the settlement of European affairs and the administration of justice in that section of the world. That is what it amounted to. He said we withdrew too soon. If we withdrew too soon, to which I assent, the only way we could have done it was by refusing to go into the League of Nations. We had no right to stay there after having failed to ratify the Versailles treaty and thereby enter into the League of Nations; and he said that we should be there now taking part in the settlement of European controversial affairs and seeing that justice is done there. The only way we could be there at this time engaged in that undertaking would be as a party to the Versailles treaty.

When M. Clemenceau says we withdrew from Europe too soon, that we should have gone into the League of Nations, and should now be in Europe taking part in affairs over there, I emphatically agree with him. I think he is right. I believe this country made the greatest mistake in its history when it refused to go into the League of Nations, and I believe it is every day becoming more and more apparent that it was a monumental mistake.

I voted to have the United States enter the League of Nations, both with and without reservations. I voted both ways—any way to get in. I think now that we should have gone in, either with or without reservations, one way or the other. I am still of the same opinion that I held when I registered my vote in favor of going into the League of Nations, either with or without reservations. I am amazed that a Senator who made so noble, gallant, and valiant a fight to have us go into the League of Nations as did the distinguished Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] should now assail M. Clemenceau for uttering the opinion to which I have referred. I can not understand it. It seems to me inconsistent, and I, for one, as one of the supporters of the League of Nations at that time and yet a supporter of it, wish to dissent from the criticism which was leveled at the utterances of M. Clemenceau.

M. Clemenceau said further that having withdrawn from Europe too soon we should now return there and take part in the settlement of European affairs, and in that statement I agree most emphatically. The only way we could return would be to apply to enter the League of Nations, and I am in favor of doing that. I am in hearty accord with M. Clemenceau when he expresses that sentiment. I see no hope at present of that being done. I can see no encouragement to hope that it will be done in the near future. Nevertheless, that is my opinion, and I shall continue to hold it.

M. Clemenceau said that Germany was preparing for another war, and in that utterance I believe he is eminently right and correct. I do not think there is any doubt about it. I think there are many indications which prove it, and I think that France is justified in looking forward to that day and being prepared for it.

There is a good deal of criticism in this country, and some of it has been voiced on the floor of this Chamber, against France for maintaining a standing army of the size she now maintains. I contend that if we had gone into the League of Nations with all of our great power and prestige and were now a party to it, then if we had gone a step further, as President Wilson recommended and urged, and had become a party to a tripartite agreement between Great Britain, the United States, and France to resist any unjustified aggression upon France by Germany, then there would be no excuse for France maintaining an army of the size she now maintains. I believe undoubtedly that she would not in that event be maintaining it. There would then be no cause for it, no necessity for it, no justification for it. With the United States, with her great force and power and resources and prestige and commanding position, a party to the League of Nations, and with the tripartite agreement between Great Britain, the United States, and France, as urged by President Wilson, that all three should unitedly resist any unjustified aggression by Germany toward France, I do not suppose France would think of going to the expense of keeping up a standing army of the size that she now maintains. It is unreasonable to suppose she would.

Those things were intended to be a protection to France against aggression from Germany, but they were not done and, as M. Clemenceau said, I think we did not do our duty toward France and toward the nations of the world; we did not do our duty toward maintaining the peace of the world; and, having not done that, having not entered into the League of Nations, and having not entered into the tripartite agreement recommended by President Wilson, which I think, from the standpoint of France, was even more important than the League of Nations, and which I was quite as anxious to see entered into as I was to see us enter into the League of Nations, what is France to do besides prepare to protect herself from the day which inevitably must come and which I believe everybody thinks is coming when a rehabilitated and revived Germany will renew her age-long war against France and have France at her mercy? That is the reason, I have no doubt, why France maintains a standing army of the size of her present army. I believe she is justified in her fears, in her expectations, and in her preparation. If France does not help herself, she can not expect anybody else to help her.

I think that up to the time M. Clemenceau was taunted about the quartering of colored troops in Germany he was substantially right in what he said, and I am glad to have him come here and glad to have him say it. I welcome him to this country. I am not content to see him and his country, the historic friend of our country, assailed and to hear expressions of sympathy with Germany on the floor of the Senate without uttering my humble dissent therefrom. Nobody can wring out of me one particle of sympathy for Germany. I have no sympathy for Germany. It grieves me beyond expression to hear sympathy for Germany expressed on the floor of this Chamber and to hear France condemned. France has been our historic friend. If it had not been for France we might now be a subject province of Great Britain. It is not unlikely. At least it is safe to say that if France had not come to our rescue during the Revolutionary War that war would not have been successful; George Washington, John Adams, and John Hancock would doubtless have been hung as traitors and the day of deliverance of the Colonies of America from British subjugation must at least have been delayed for many years. If that revolution had been crushed—and I believe it would have been crushed had it not been for the friendly intervention of France—it would have been many years, and doubtless generations, before we, with our added growth and increase of population and power, could have worked up another revolution against Great Britain. It would have been many years before the spirit of the colonists would have been sufficiently revived to stage another revolution against the dominion of Great Britain. It is safe to say that had it not been for the friendship of France it would have been many years before the Colonies would have been free from British rule, and possibly would not now be free. We might to-day be British subjects, subject to taxation without representation, and that debt of gratitude to France can never be wiped out by the lapse of any length of time.

On the other hand, what did Germany do during the Revolutionary War? She sent her hired Hessian troops here to fight the struggling colonists in their uneven conflict with Great Britain. She sent her hired Hessian troops here to fight us, and they fought for blood money, for pay, to try to keep us under the continued domination of Great Britain. France was our friend. France was the first nation in all the world to recognize the struggling Colonies in their revolution against Great Britain. France came to our succor at a time when the little handful of bleeding, starving, desperate colonial troops under George Washington were struggling against the heavy weight of the superior numbers of British soldiers. France made possible by that act our independence from Great Britain, and at the same time Germany was furnishing her hired Hessians for blood money to try to keep us under the British yoke. Those Hessians who came over here were not volunteers. They came at the behest and by the order of their Government. It was an official act of their Government which sent them here, and their Government was to get, and did get, the blood money which was paid for their coming over here to try to thwart the struggles of the colonists to free themselves from the dominion of Great Britain. There you have the records of the two countries, France and Germany.

So it has ever been. France has been the friend of this country. We have always maintained friendly relations with France. During the World War France threw herself across the bloody pathway of Germany and took a heroic part in the determined effort to keep Germany from conquering the world and destroying civilization, while Germany was engaged in sinking the Lusitania and various American vessels, contrary to the rules of international law, thus virtually waging war upon noncombatants of this country.

It saddens me to hear on the floor of this Chamber sympathy expressed with Germany and the German people and condemnation for France and the French people, whom M. Clemenceau comes here to represent. In any controversy between Germany and France my sympathies are wholly with France.

I am not, either, going to let the opportunity pass of expressing that sympathy when I hear France condemned on the floor of this Chamber, and hear her distinguished citizen, who is within our borders, assailed.

As to the charge which has been made that France is quartering negro troops on German soil, I do not see that that is any of our concern. We refused to go into the League of Nations, where we might have had a voice in all of those details. If we were now a member of that league, and thought that was wrong, which I do not, we would have had an opportunity of bringing attention to it, and uttering a dissent, if this country wished to do so. So far as I am concerned, I would not; but we refused to go into the League of Nations, and I can not see that it is any of our business now what troops France keeps quartered on German soil. That is an affair between Germany and France and with nations which are in the League of Nations, if they wish to take cognizance of it. I can not see that we have any right to take part in any quarrel now between Germany and France. I am certainly not going to countenance our taking part in it on the side of Germany. I can not see that we have any justification for dragging into this Chamber quarrels between France and Germany and virtually taking the part of Germany in those quarrels. I do not think we have any right to be heard in reference to any such matter.

So far as that is concerned, I do not see any great indignity in the action of France in keeping Algerian, Moroccan, or negro troops on German soil; at least I do not see anything in it to cause any indignation within my breast; it does not start any flame of indignation or resentment in my bosom. I do not feel called upon to rebuke it; and I do not believe anybody in this country has any cause to rebuke it.

It appears that there are about 400 negro troops quartered in Germany. Well, we have had negro companies and negro regiments quartered on the people of this country. We have quartered them on the Mexican border; we have had them stationed in Montana; we have had them stationed at various other places in this country. Are we to be more tender of the sensitive feelings of Germany than we are of those of our own people? Are we by our assent to say that it is all right to quarter colored troops in this country and yet that it is an unspeakable outrage to quarter them on Germany? Are we to hold the people of Germany in higher esteem and to give them greater consideration than we do the people of our own country?

I say that Germany is in no position to make a protest about colored troops being quartered on her soil, whether they be Moroccans, Algerians, or negro troops. In view of the shockingly fiendish, the unspeakable and almost unimaginable horrors and atrocities wantonly and continually perpetrated by German troops upon noncombatant men, women, and children in Belgium and France during the World War, atrocities which sicken the human heart when one reads about them, I say that Germany is in no position to whine and to whimper and play the baby act about 400 negro troops and some Moroccan and Algerian troops being quartered on German territory. So far as I am concerned, I would have no objection if all the troops quartered on German soil by the Entente Allies were the blackest negroes from the jungles of Africa. Germany would not then be getting what she deserves. There is such a thing as just retribution and punishment. Germany willfully, deliberately, and premeditatedly brought on this world the greatest calamity that has occurred since the days of the flood; a calamity which resulted in the destruction of more life and caused more misery and more suffering than any other calamity since the days of the flood; and Germany deserves adequate punishment for that offense.

As to the question of whether or not the reparations which have been imposed upon Germany by the League of Nations are too great, I do not know that they are; I do not say that they are too great. They may be greater than it is practicable or workable to impose right now or to collect in the next few years, but Germany should be required to pay them if it may take the next hundred years to make her do so. If she has to work for the next hundred years and devote all of the profits of her labor to pay those reparations, she would not then pay what ought to be collected from her. Probably they can not be collected within the next few years, but every dollar of those reparations should be ultimately collected; and whether they are more than can be collected or not they are not nearly what Germany deserves to have to pay. I have no sympathy with her in her whining plea that her burden is greater than she can bear. She had time to think about that when she was plunging the world into a catastrophic maelstrom of death and destruction and was engaged in her fiendish work of ravaging, ravishing, burning, destroying, demolishing, in a mad frenzy of hate, in France and Belgium; when she was sinking the Lusitania and waging war on noncombatants of this country; when she was waging her devilish ruthless submarine warfare.

There are terms that should have been imposed upon Germany which have not been imposed upon her. Every dollar of the German Kaiser's fortune should be taken away from him by the Entente Allies; he should be stripped of every dollar that he has and rendered penniless and required to go out and work at hard manual labor the remainder of his life for the necessities of life. Every dollar of the fortune of Hugo Stinness should be taken away from him and applied to the reparations that are due France, Belgium, Great Britain, Italy, and other countries of the entente. The German Kaiser is marrying, making merry, eating, drinking, feasting, and dancing, while his victims writhe in torture or suffer the pangs of hunger and untold want. He is reputed to be one of the richest men in the world. I repeat that every dollar of his money should be taken away from him; he should be stripped of every penny of his fortune, and it should be applied to the reparations due France and other countries wronged by Germany and to the payment of damages to this country for the sinking of the Lusitania and various other indignities and losses inflicted unlawfully upon our people by Germany. Every dollar of the fortunes of the sons-in-law and relatives of the entire royal family of Germany should be taken away from them and they should all be applied to indemnities. Until that is done there will not be justice meted out. Every dollar owned by the war lords of Germany should be taken away from them and applied to reparations. While the terms imposed upon Germany may not be workable for the present, I think, if she can not pay now those terms should be held over her and she should be required to pay them in time, if it takes her a hundred years in which to do so.

No, Mr. President, I have no manner of sympathy with Germany, and I have no sympathy with the criticism which has been leveled against M. Clemenceau's remarks in this country to the effect that the United States should be in Europe to-day in the League of Nations, taking part in the settlement of affairs over there, and to the effect that Germany is preparing to wage another war on France.

I do not think there is any manner of doubt that Germany is preparing to wage another war on France. I think that her children are being taught now that when they grow up their highest and first duty will be to renew the war of extermination upon their ancient and hated enemy, the people of France. They are being "fed up" on it and educated on it. Everything goes to indicate that to be the intention, and, if this country remains out of the League of Nations and remains out of the tripartite agreement which President Wilson urged us to enter into for the protection of France, I do not believe it will be 20 years until Germany renews her war with France. I think Germany is hoping that we will stay out of the League of Nations and out of the proposed tripartite agreement and out of European affairs, in order that she may be all the more free to renew the war against France. If we were in the League of Nations and in the tripartite agreement which President Wilson recommended, I do not believe there would be any danger of Germany renewing the war against France for an untold length of time, for the next hundred years, or so long as those arrangements might last. But we are not in the League of Nations; we are not in any tripartite agreement with France and Great Britain, and I think that gives Germany hope in her preparations to wage the next war against France.

When she shall again declare war against France—and I am satisfied she will—I think she will be very careful to try not to draw us into it and to avoid treading upon our rights or giving any offense to this country, in order that she may exterminate France. I believe Germany realizes that she made a mistake in her ruthless submarine warfare on the merchant vessels of peaceful nations. I believe she realizes if she had not done that and had not drawn us into the World War the Central Powers would have won the war. I do not think there is any doubt that they would, and I think that Germany believes that, had it not been for the United States, she would at this time have the people of Europe under her feet, and, probably, having conquered and subjugated them, would next turn her guns upon the United States and hope to subjugate this Nation, and then realize her dreams for the subjugation of the world. I think she is preparing to avoid that mistake this time, preparing slyly, craftily, and in an underhand way.

As to the plea about France's quartering 400 negro troops and some Moroccan and Algerian troops on German soil, and as to the alleged facts, the reported facts, which the Senator from Nebraska read about keeping brothels there for the benefit of those troops, that is not so bad as was the action of the German soldiers in forcibly raping young women and married women in France and Belgium by wholesale during the war; capturing and carrying around with them as captives companies of Belgian and French young women for the purpose of being forced to submit further to their carnal desires and fiendishness. I say it is not so bad as the atrocities which the German troops perpetrated upon their helpless victims during the war.

Yes; I suppose it is too bad that black troops should be quartered upon such refined, cultured, esthetic people as are the German people; people who were so refined during the war with France and Belgium; whose troops grabbed infants a few weeks or a few months old out of the arms of their mothers in France and Belgium, and dashed out their brains on stone pavements before the eyes of their agonized mothers; who had no scruples in picking up little French and Belgian babies on their bayonets, and walking away singing "Deutschland Uber Alles" to the rhythmic motion of French and Belgian babies twirling around on their bayonets; who had no scruples about ravishing French and Belgian matrons and young women, and cutting out their breasts and throwing them on the ground, and imparting to them venereal diseases; all of which things have been incontrovertibly established.

I think the Senator from Nebraska should read Dr. Newell Dwight Hillis's book about German atrocities practiced in France and Belgium during the war. Doctor Hillis—one of the most noted divines of this country, a man of the highest standing and unquestioned honor—went over to Europe immediately after the armistice and personally investigated the charges of fiendish atrocities, unsurpassed by the atrocities practiced by the aboriginal American Indians upon their victims, reported to have been practiced by German soldiers upon helpless non-combatant old men, women, and children of France and Belgium during the war. Doctor Hillis spent months over there in investigating those charges, and returned to this country and wrote a book in which the commission of those atrocities in all of their horrible details was established by affidavits, records, indisputable evidence, beyond all controversy. And yet it is too bad that the esthetic and refined feelings of the people of Germany are to be offended by having 400 negro troops and some Moroccan and Algerian troops quartered upon their soil until they comply in some measure with the penalties and payment of reparations adjudged against them by the Entente Allies.

I do not want to see Germany destroyed. I want to see Germany have the privilege of working and manufacturing and producing and exporting and importing and engaging in commerce with all the world. I want to see her people make money, and then I want to see it taken away from them and applied upon the reparations due France and Belgium. I want the people of Germany to be earning; I want them to have the privilege of earning, and then I want to see the money they earn taken and applied where by all right and justice it should go for many, many years to come. I do not want to see Germany destroyed. I want to see Germany become normal, and produce to its full capacity, and resume business with the world, and I believe in giving her a chance to do it; but, at the same time, I believe that Germany should be made to the uttermost measure possible to comply with the terms adjudged against her by the Entente Allies, and made pay at least a small part of what is due from her to France, Belgium, Great Britain, and other countries of the Entente.

I want to see that done, and I do not want to see any obstacles thrown in the pathway of it; but I do not want to hear, without one word of protest from this body, the great statesman from France, M. Clemenceau, assailed and criticized for coming over here and saying that we should now be in the League of Nations, and should now be taking part in the settlement of European affairs, and helping bring about peace and a settled condition of affairs over there. I believe M. Clemenceau has a right to come over here; and except as to his controversy with the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. Hitchcock] about quartering colored troops in Germany, in which he became somewhat personal, I in the main subscribe to what M. Clemenceau has said over here. I think we should welcome him and do him honor as a representative of a great nation, instead of criticizing and assailing him.

I believe that M. Clemenceau is within his rights, and I am sorry to hear condemnation of him and sorry to see in reply anything like sympathy with Germany expressed in this country, and especially on the floor of this Chamber.

I have very high regard for the esteemed Senator from Nebraska [Mr. Hitchcock]. I regret very much that this body is not much longer to have the benefit of his great ability and talents. I was disappointed beyond my powers to express my feelings when I learned that he was not much longer to remain in this body. He has been of great service here. I have high regard for his ability as well as for him. He made a noble, splendid, valiant fight on the floor of this Chamber to have the Versailles treaty ratified and to have the United States enter the League of Nations. He rendered invaluable service to the people of this country in his labors to have enacted the existing Federal banking and currency law, one of the best laws that has been enacted in this country in all of its history, in my opinion, and I believe the best banking and currency law that exists in the world. In my opinion, much of the credit for that law is due to the distinguished Senator from Nebraska, along with other able and eminent Members, both Democratic and Republican, of the Senate Committee on Banking and Currency. In many ways the Senator from Nebraska has been of great service to the people of this country and I am loath to see him leave this body; but it does seem to me that it is inconsistent in him now to assail M. Clemenceau for saying that we should be in the League of Nations and should be taking our due part in settling the affairs of Europe, and for his expression of hope, in effect, that we will yet enter the League of Nations and take part in seeing justice done in Europe. It seems to me that it is unfair and unjust; and I have taken this occasion to express in my feeble way my dissent from it and to utter in my humble way a few words in behalf of our distinguished visitor, M. Clemenceau, and the people of the country from which he comes.

CLEMENCEAU AND FRENCH POLICY.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, M. Clemenceau is a greatly honored former Premier of France. He comes evidently with the approval of the French Government and with world-wide publicity announcing his coming. He has arrived in New York and been received with great cordiality by citizens of the United States on a mission of importance.

He comes making an appeal to America. He thinks we left Europe without sufficient cause and that we left too soon. He desires the American Government, with the backing of the American people, to take part in restoring distracted Europe, and says that he does not know what he wants us to do, but he wants our help, and he wants it at once, and he thinks we may have an armchair at Lausanne if we ask for a seat at that conference.

It seems worth while to submit an observation upon this visit of M. Clemenceau and to call his attention and the attention of the French people and of the people of Europe to what I believe to be the principal causes of the present disturbed condition of Europe and the only practical remedies by which their prosperity can be promptly restored.

The visit of M. Clemenceau may be of great value if it shall lead to the discussion of these matters frankly, honestly, and fearlessly.

We keenly and deeply sympathize with the French people, with their great sufferings. We have deplored the wanton invasion of France by the German military dynasty in 1871 and the more cruel invasion by the same forces in 1914.

We know how cruelly they have suffered from the German invasion. We have walked over many places in the devastated areas. We have seen the ruined cities and villages and are very sympathetic with them in promoting their future security, peace, and prosperity, and if mistakes in judgment are made by leaders of French opinion it should be remembered that similar mistakes are made by other leaders of all the nations of the earth and that such mistakes should be considered with patience and moderation. The French people, like the people of other nations, should not be made responsible for the error of their leadership if there be error, as we think there has been, and Clemenceau's visit will help to clear the atmosphere because now we can discuss these questions more serenely than when the differences occurred.

We make a wide distinction between the German people and the military dynasty which governed the German people regardless of the consent of the governed. We do not mean by this that there was any open revolt of the German people against this overwhelming, dominating, governing power, because there was little or none, but we can not help but think of the utterly helpless attitude of the young men of Germany when they were called to the colors by the order of mobilization of Wilhelm II.

A young German had his option of responding to this call promptly, efficiently, faithfully, or facing a German court-martial and a firing squad. A German boy had no option except to come, and when he came he had his choice of coming singing or weeping. He chose to sing and to come and do his utmost to win a victory under the German flag which he had been taught to love and to revere as the badge of a happy, honorable fatherland. He answered the voice of patriotism; he followed the only leadership he knew, and with infinite pathos went to his young death. Seven millions of the German youth fell in battle, and the Imperial Government finally met with a crushing defeat at the hands of those who loved justice and liberty throughout the world.

With the young soldiers of other lands—of France, of Britain, of Italy—it was the same. The Fatherland called; they came, they fought, they died for what they believed to be their duty to Fatherland.

Clemenceau senses correctly that American opinion has been slowly growing to be unsympathetic with the leadership of France. There is a profound cause for it which ought to be explained to the French people. For this reason these observations are submitted to the public records in order that French leaders may realize why the United States has withdrawn from Europe and does not wish to return until the European leaders exhibit a heartfelt respect for the opinions of America.

The American opinion was expressed in the address of the President of the United States of April 2, 1917, when he advised the Congress of the United States that the time had arrived to enter the World War. This address to the Congress of the United States was the culmination of German aggression and of conferences which had taken place between the representatives of the Entente Allies and the authorities of the United States and the principles for which we entered this war were then acquiesced in and applauded by the leaders of the Entente Allies and they are bound morally and ethically and under the principle of right to support these doctrines upon which we entered the war in cooperation with them, they declaring at the same time that they were moved by the same principles.

What were these principles, Mr. President? Woodrow Wilson stated them in his message of April 2, 1917, when he said (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, vol. 55, p. 103):

Our object now, as then, is to vindicate the principles of peace and justice in the life of the world as against selfishness and autocratic power and to set up amongst the really free and self-governing people of the world such a concert of purpose and of action as will henceforth assure the observance of these principles * * *

We are at the beginning of an age in which it will be insisted that the same standards of conduct and of responsibility for wrong done shall be observed among nations and their governments that are observed among the individual citizens of several states.

We have no quarrel with the German people. We have no feeling toward them but one of sympathy and friendship. It was not upon their impulse that their Government acted in entering this war. It was not with their previous knowledge or approval. It was a war determined upon as wars used to be determined upon in the old, unhappy days when peoples were nowhere considered by their rulers and wars were provoked and waged in the interest of dynasties or of little groups of ambitious men who were accustomed to use their fellow men as pawns and tools.

Woodrow Wilson pointed out the impossibility of friendship with the Prussian autocracy, its secret methods, its spies, its intrigues, its ambitions and greedy purposes, and he said:

We are accepting this challenge of hostile purpose because we know that in such a Government, following such methods, we can never have a friend; and that in the presence of its organized power, always lying in wait to accomplish we know not what purpose, there can be no assured security for the democratic governments of the world. We are now about to accept gauge of battle with this natural foe to liberty and shall, if necessary, spend the whole force of the Nation to check and nullify its pretensions and its power. We are glad now that we see the facts with no veil of false pretense about them, to fight thus for the ultimate peace of the world and for the liberation of its peoples, the German peoples included; for the rights of nations, great and small, and the privilege of men everywhere to choose their way of life and of obedience. The world must be made safe for democracy. Its peace must be planted upon the tested foundations of political liberty. We have no selfish ends to serve. We desire no conquests, no dominion. We seek no indemnities for ourselves, no material compensation for the sacrifices we shall freely make. We are but one of the champions of the rights of mankind. We shall be satisfied when those rights have been made as secure as the faith and the freedom of nations can make them.

We spent $40,000,000,000 and we asked no indemnities whatever. We asked no territory. We lost tens of thousands of our best beloved youth to establish these principles, and we only asked justice for all peoples, Germans as well as French, Turks as well as British. We have been disappointed.

We are not content to see them disregarded by the Entente Allies in any respect. We had a right and we have a right now to expect and to demand recognition of these broad principles of justice as a condition of the further cooperation which Clemenceau now desires.

There should never be forgotten the conditions upon which the armistice of November 11, 1918, was sought and obtained. These conditions represented the views of the Government of the United States, voiced by the President of the United States, not only with the approval of the American people and of Congress but approved by the British Government and the French Government and the Entente Allies. These conditions were transmitted to the German Government and the German people through the Swiss minister by Robert Lansing, the Secretary of State of the United States, on the 5th of November, 1918, which I ask to have printed in the Record in 8-point type.

There being no objection, the matter was ordered to be printed in the Record in 8-point type, as follows:

"Sir: I have the honor to request you to transmit the following communication to the German Government:

"In my note of October 23, 1918, I advised you that the President had transmitted his correspondence with the German authorities to the Governments with which the Government of the United States is associated as a belligerent, with the suggestion that, if those Governments were disposed to effect peace upon the terms and principles indicated, their military advisers and the military advisers of the United States be asked to submit to the Governments associated against Germany the necessary terms of such armistice as would fully protect the interests of the peoples involved and insure to the associated Governments the unrestricted power to safeguard and enforce the details of the peace to which the German Government had agreed, provided they deemed such an armistice possible from the military point of view.

"The President is now in receipt of a memorandum of observations by the allied Governments on this correspondence, which is as follows:

"The allied Governments have given careful consideration to the correspondence which has passed between the President of the United States and the German Government. Subject to the qualifications which follow, they declare their willingness to make peace with the Government of Germany on the terms of peace laid down in the President's address to Congress of January, 1918, and the principles of settlement enunciated in his subsequent addresses. They must point out, however, that clause 2, relating to what is usually described as the freedom of the seas, is open to various interpretations, some of which they could not accept. They must, therefore, reserve to themselves complete freedom on this subject when they enter the peace conference.

"Further, in the conditions of peace laid down in his address to Congress of January 8, 1918, the President declared that invaded territories must be restored as well as evacuated and freed, and the allied Governments feel that no doubt ought to be allowed to exist as to what this provision implies. By it they understand that compensation will be made by Germany for all damage done to the civilian population of the Allies and their property by the aggression of Germany by land, by sea, and from the air."

Mr. OWEN. The allied Governments gave careful consideration to this correspondence between the President and the German Government, and they declared to the President of the United States that they were willing to make peace with the Government of Germany on the terms of the peace laid down in the President's address to Congress of January 8, 1918, and the principles of settlement enunciated in his subsequent addresses. Some of the 14 points and principles they did carry out, but in many instances and in details they failed to carry them out and pursued a contrary policy, a policy calculated to injure the German people commercially and financially, and violated the agreement to permit Germany to have "a place of equality among the peoples of the world."

It was this address of the President of the United States of January 8, 1918, and the 14 points which appealed to the German people as people, and we took infinite pains to have this address of the President of the United States scattered by airplanes behind the German lines and to give for it publicity among the German people, and these German people had a right to rely, not only upon the good faith of the United States Government and the good faith of the people of the United States, but they had a right to rely upon the good faith of the Governments of the Entente Allies and of the people of the Entente Allies to carry out the principles upon which the armistice was based.

The German Government and the German people accepted these conditions and laid down their arms. It became a binding contract of honor made upon the battle field, binding France and the Entente Allies and Germany alike. A failure to carry out the terms of the contract has been followed by evil consequence.

The President's address to Congress of January 8 is of such importance in construing this agreement on the part of the United States and the Entente Allies with the German Government that I think it is proper to present it again, and I ask to have it printed in the Record in 8-point type.

There being no objection, the matter was ordered to be printed in the Record in 8-point type, as follows:

PRESIDENT WILSON'S ADDRESS TO CONGRESS, JANUARY 8, 1918.

"Gentlemen of the Congress, once more, as repeatedly before, the spokesmen of the Central Empires have indicated their desire to discuss the objects of the war and the possible bases of a general peace. Parleys have been in progress at Brest-Litovsk between Russian representatives and representatives of the Central Powers, to which the attention of all the belligerents has been invited for the purpose of ascertaining whether it may be possible to extend these parleys into a general conference with regard to terms of peace and settlement. The Russian representatives presented not only a perfectly definite statement of the principles upon which they would be willing to conclude peace, but also an equally definite program of the concrete application of those principles. The representatives of the Central Powers, on their part, presented an outline of settlement which, if much less definite, seemed susceptible of liberal interpretation until their specific program of practical terms was added. That program proposed no concessions at all, either to the sovereignty of Russia or to the preferences of the populations with whose fortunes it dealt, but meant, in a word, that the Central Empires were to keep every foot of territory their armed forces had occupied—every Province, every city, every point of vantage—as a permanent addition to their territories and their power. It is a reasonable conjecture that the general principles of settlement which they at first suggested originated with the more liberal statesmen of Germany and Austria, the men who have begun to feel the force of their own peoples' thought and purpose, while the concrete terms of actual settlement came from the military leaders, who have no thought but to keep what they have got. The negotiations have been broken off. The Russian representatives were sincere and in earnest. They can not entertain such proposals of conquest and domination.

"The whole incident is full of significance. It is also full of perplexity. With whom are the Russian representatives dealing? For whom are the representatives of the Central Empires speaking? Are they speaking for the majorities of their respective parliaments or for the minority parties, that military and imperialistic minority which has so far dominated their whole policy and controlled the affairs of Turkey and of the Balkan States which have felt obliged to become their associates in the war? The Russian representatives have insisted, very justly, very wisely, and in the true spirit of modern democracy, that the conferences they have been holding with the Teutonic and Turkish statesmen should be held within open, not closed, doors, and all the world has been audience, as was desired. To whom have we been listening, then? To those who speak the spirit and intention of the resolutions of the German Reichstag of the 9th of July last, the spirit and intention of the liberal leaders and parties of Germany, or to those who resist and defy that spirit and intention and insist upon conquest and subjugation? Or are we listening, in fact, to both, unreconciled and in open and hopeless contradiction? These are very serious and pregnant questions. Upon the answer to them depends the peace of the world.

"But, whatever the results of the parleys at Brest-Litovsk, whatever the confusions of counsel and of purpose in the utterances of the spokesmen of the Central Empires, they have again attempted to acquaint the world with their objects in the war and have again challenged their adversaries to say what their objects are and what sort of settlement they would deem just and satisfactory. There is no good reason why that challenge should not be responded to, and responded to with the utmost candor. We did not wait for it. Not once, but again and again, we have laid our whole thought and purpose before the world, not in general terms only, but each time with sufficient definition to make it clear what sort of definitive terms of settlement must necessarily spring out of them. Within the last week Mr. Lloyd-George has spoken with admirable candor and in admirable spirit for the people and Government of Great Britain. There is no confusion of counsel among the adversaries of the Central Powers, no uncertainty of principle, no vagueness of detail. The only secrecy of counsel, the only lack of fearless frankness, the only failure to make definite statement of the objects of the war, lies with Germany and her allies. The issues of life and death hang upon these definitions. No statesman who has the least conception of his responsibility ought for a moment to permit himself to continue this tragical and appalling outpouring of blood and treasure unless he is sure beyond a peradventure that the objects of the vital sacrifice are part and parcel of the very life of society, and that the people for whom he speaks think them right and imperative as he does.

"There is, moreover, a voice calling for these definitions of principle and of purpose which is, it seems to me, more thrilling and more compelling than any of the many moving voices with which the troubled air of the world is filled. It is the voice of the Russian people. They are prostrate and all but helpless, it would seem, before the grim power of Germany, which has hitherto known no relenting and no pity. Their power, apparently, is shattered. And yet their soul is not subservient. They will not yield either in principle or in action. Their conception of what is right, of what is humane and honorable for them to accept, has been stated with a frankness, a largeness of view, a generosity of spirit, and a universal human sympathy which must challenge the admiration of every friend of mankind; and they have refused to compound their ideals or desert others that they themselves may be safe. They call to us to say what it is that we desire, in what, if in anything, our purpose and our spirit differ from theirs; and I believe that the people of the United States would wish me to respond with utter simplicity and frankness. Whether their present leaders believe it or not, it is our heartfelt desire and hope that some way may be opened whereby we may be privileged to assist the people of Russia to attain their utmost hope of liberty and ordered peace.

"It will be our wish and purpose that the processes of peace, when they are begun, shall be absolutely open and that they shall involve and permit henceforth no secret understandings of any kind. The day of conquest and aggrandizement is gone by; so is also the day of secret covenants entered into in the interest of particular governments and likely at some unlooked-for moment to upset the peace of the world. It is this happy fact, now clear to the view of every public man whose thoughts do not still linger in an age that is dead and gone, which makes it possible for every nation whose purposes are consistent with justice and the peace of the world to avow now or at any other time the objects it has in view.

"We entered this war because violations of right had occurred which touched us to the quick and made the life of our own people impossible unless they were corrected and the world secured once for all against their recurrence. What we demand in this war, therefore, is nothing peculiar to ourselves. It is that the world be made fit and safe to live in; and particularly that it be made safe for every peace-loving nation which, like our own, wishes to live its own life, determine its own institutions, be assured of justice and fair dealing by the other peoples of the world as against force and selfish aggression. All the peoples of the world are in effect partners in this interest, and for our own part we see very clearly that unless justice be done to others it will not be done to us. The program of the world's peace, therefore, is our program; and that program, the only possible program, as we see it, is this:

"I. Open covenants of peace, openly arrived at, after which there shall be no private international understandings of any kind, but diplomacy shall proceed always frankly and in the public view.

"II. Absolute freedom of navigation upon the seas, outside territorial waters, alike in peace and in war, except as the seas may be closed in whole or in part by international action for the enforcement of international covenants.

"III. The removal, so far as possible, of all economic barriers and the establishment of an equality of trade conditions among all the nations consenting to the peace and associating themselves for its maintenance.

"IV. Adequate guaranties given and taken that national armaments will be reduced to the lowest point consistent with domestic needs.

"V. A free, open-minded, and absolutely impartial adjustment of all colonial claims, based upon a strict observance of the principle that in determining all such questions of sovereignty the interests of the populations concerned must have equal weight with the equitable claims of the Government whose title is to be determined.

"VI. The evacuation of all Russian territory and such a settlement of all questions affecting Russia as will secure the best and freest cooperation of the other nations of the world in obtaining for her an unhampered and unembarrassed opportunity for the independent determination of her own political development and national policy and assure her of a sincere welcome into the society of free nations under institutions of her own choosing; and, more than a welcome, assistance also of every kind that she may need and may herself desire. The treatment accorded Russia by her sister nations in the months to come will be the acid test of their good will, of their comprehension of her needs as distinguished from their own interests, and of their intelligent and unselfish sympathy.

"VII. Belgium, the whole world will agree, must be evacuated and restored, without any attempt to limit the sovereignty which she enjoys in common with all other free nations. No other single act will serve as this will serve to restore confidence among the nations in the laws which they have themselves set and determined for the government of their relations with one another. Without this healing act the whole structure and validity of international law is forever impaired.

"VIII. All French territory should be freed and the invaded portions restored, and the wrong done to France by Prussia in 1871 in the matter of Alsace-Lorraine, which has unsettled the peace of the world for nearly 50 years, should be righted, in order that peace may once more be made secure in the interest of all.

"IX. A readjustment of the frontiers of Italy should be effected along clearly recognizable lines of nationality.

"X. The peoples of Austria-Hungary, whose place among the nations we wish to see safeguarded and assured, should be accorded the freest opportunity of autonomous development.

"XI. Rumania, Serbia, and Montenegro should be evacuated; occupied territories restored; Serbia accorded free and secure access to the sea; and the relations of the several Balkan states to one another determined by friendly counsel along historically established lines of allegiance and nationality; and international guaranties of the political and economic independence and territorial integrity of the several Balkan states should be entered into.

"XII. The Turkish portions of the present Ottoman Empire should be assured a secure sovereignty, but the other nationalities which are now under Turkish rule should be assured an undoubted security of life and an absolutely unmolested opportunity of autonomous development, and the Dardanelles should be permanently opened as a free passage to the ships and commerce of all nations under international guaranties.

"XIII. An independent Polish State should be erected which should include the territories inhabited by indisputably Polish populations, which should be assured a free and secure access to the sea, and whose political and economic independence and territorial integrity should be guaranteed by international covenant.

"XIV. A general association of nations must be formed under specific covenants for the purpose of affording mutual guaranties of political independence and territorial integrity to great and small States alike.

"In regard to these essential rectifications of wrong and assertions of right we feel ourselves to be intimate partners of all the governments and peoples associated together against the imperialists. We can not be separate in interest or divided in purpose. We stand together until the end.

"For such arrangements and covenants we are willing to fight and to continue to fight until they are achieved; but only because we wish the right to prevail and desire a just and stable peace such as can be secured only by removing the chief provocations to war, which this program does remove. We have no jealousy of German greatness, and there is nothing in this program that impairs it. We grudge her no achievement or distinction of learning or of pacific enterprise such as have made her record very bright and very enviable. We do not wish to injure her or to block in any way her legitimate influence or power. We do not wish to fight her either with arms or with hostile arrangements of trade if she is willing to associate herself with us and the other peace-loving nations of the world in covenants of justice and law and fair dealing. We wish her only to accept a place of equality among the peoples of the world—the new world in which we now live—instead of a place of mastery.

"Neither do we presume to suggest to her any alteration or modification of her institutions. But it is necessary, we must frankly say, and necessary as a preliminary to any intelligent dealings with her on our part, that we should know whom her spokesmen speak for when they speak to us, whether for the Reichstag majority or for the military party and the men whose creed is imperial domination.

"We have spoken now, surely, in terms too concrete to admit of any further doubt or question. An evident principle runs through the whole program I have outlined. It is the principle of justice to all peoples and nationalities, and their right to live on equal terms of liberty and safety with one another, whether they be strong or weak. Unless this principle be made its foundation, no part of the structure of international justice can stand. The people of the United States could act upon no other principle; and to the vindication of this principle they are ready to devote their lives, their honor, and everything that they possess. The moral climax of this the culminating and final war for human liberty has come, and they are ready to put their own strength, their own highest purpose, their own integrity and devotion to the test."

Mr. OWEN. By every principle of common honesty the United States and the Entente Allies were bound by the 14 points, which were not carried out in good faith. Clemenceau himself was quoted as deriding the 14 points after the fruits of this gigantic declaration of principle had been obtained through the armistice and the German Government had surrendered and was disarmed.

After the Germans were disarmed, Clemenceau was quoted in the public press as saying that "Moses only laid down Ten Commandments and Woodrow Wilson laid down 14 commandments." How witty and merry. How thoughtless and destructive. Moses led the Children of Israel out of the wilderness with the Ten Commandments, and the American people would have led the children of Europe out of the wilderness with the 14 points if leaders like Clemenceau, Lloyd-George, and others had, in perfect good faith, carried out these principles and covenants on which the surrender of the Germans was obtained.

But the Entente leaders have not carried them out. They wrote a treaty of victory and imposed conditions some of which are now believed to be impossible of fulfillment, and others which contain the seeds of future war and which were and are in flat violation of various of these pledges of the 14 points.

It is not necessary to regard Clemenceau and Lloyd-George as being willfully unfaithful because of this breach of faith in carrying out the 14 points. They are merely human beings, with human frailty, controlled by their environment, representing the leaders behind them and voicing the language of the old diplomacy of Europe, the diplomacy of strategic boundaries, of brute force, and of commercial advantages on land and sea. Blind leaders of the blind, piling up disaster and war from their failure to recognize the fundamental principles of justice between nations, every one of whom is equally entitled to life, liberty, the pursuit of happiness, the right to manage its own affairs in its own way, and the right to international understanding and good will and the means to make these rights effective.

We have no sympathy with the abuse of the German people, the Russian people, the Turkish people by Clemenceau any more than of the British or French people by the Germans.

The 14 points represented the new order of reliance on justice and international good will rather than the old order, a reliance alone upon brute force.

The group behind Clemenceau put their faith in brute force, and therefore at Paris and Versailles they carried on a vigorous, strenuous campaign for the purpose of building up material forces which would strengthen France and weaken Germany, regardless of the principles of justice, in carrying out the 14 points to which they were so solemnly pledged.

Against these gigantic forces of self-interest moving the leadership of the Entente Allies in so large a measure Woodrow Wilson stood isolated and alone at Paris, the most pathetic, the most tragic figure the world has ever seen in the most gigantic crisis of all time. Woodrow Wilson went as the advocate of principles of international good will and understanding and justice and righteousness and self-government among men. He not only had to meet these great forces of the old order at Paris and Versailles, but even in this gigantic struggle in which he was engaged—and which has been so graphically portrayed by Ray Stannard Baker in his recent volumes of Woodrow Wilson and the World Settlement—Woodrow Wilson failed to receive the support from his own country which might have made it possible for him to have fully established the new order in writing this treaty. His failure was not due to his lack of effort, for his efforts brought him even at Paris to the point of physical collapse. At Paris his hands were weakened by attacks from America.

In order to hold up the hands of the President in his great struggle for justice on earth I offered the following Senate Concurrent Resolution No. 17, which, without reading, I ask to have printed in the Record in S-point type as an appendix.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. OWEN. The Senate and the House of Representatives acquiesced in the address of the President of January 8, 1918, with "prolonged applause."

Clemenceau and Lloyd-George and the Entente leadership wrote the treaty of Versailles, ignoring some of the important principles of the 14 points. They broke faith with the world and occupy in America the attitude now of asking America to come to Europe again to relieve them of the results of their own unwise conduct.

What do they want of America? We have a right to know.

Clemenceau and Lloyd-George wrote the treaty of Versailles in such form and of such substance that it did not secure ratification by the Senate of the United States. The concessions which they wrongfully extorted from Woodrow Wilson brought on a violent attack on the treaty itself in America, and American leaders asked themselves, Are we to pledge the powers of America to carry out this treaty of greed and fear and force framed in contravention of the 14 points, in contravention of the principles in which America believes? Are we to be made the instruments by which the wrongs done the conquered peoples shall be made permanent and effective?

No, Mr. President; Clemenceau, or rather the powers behind Clemenceau, have made a bed of thorns for themselves, and the end is not yet.

Mr. President, we are more than anxious that America and the American people, both for their own sakes and for the sake of the people of Europe, should do everything in their power to restore the European people to a condition of perfect peace and happiness, but America can not make wrong right. America can not be of great service to Europe until the statesmen of Europe are willing to recognize the fundamental principles upon which the peace and welfare of the people of the world must be founded. The evil consequences which have been brought upon Europe are largely due to the obsession of fear of the French people which was used by the French leaders to build up a program of French security by force and intrigue as against the program of Woodrow Wilson—of international justice and good will and the mutual guaranties of the covenant of the League of Nations.

The French policy as opposed to the 14 points may be briefly summarized as follows:

- (1) French military control of the Rhine.
- (2) A permanent alliance of the great powers to help France to hold it.
- (3) A group of smaller allies to menace Germany from the east.
- (4) Territorial revision of the German Empire.

(5) Crippling of the German political organization.

(6) Disarmament of Germany but not of the Allies.

(7) A crushing indemnity.

(8) Deprivation of economic resources.

(9) A set of commercial agreements preferential to France, prejudicial to Germany.

(10) Germany not allowed to enter the League of Nations.

(11) Cutting off German markets, and so forth.

The French people undoubtedly have been profoundly affected by a fear of future German aggression, and they are proposing to make sure their future defense by breaking Germany down by the above program, by going heavily armed, and by promoting the same spirit and policy in Poland, Rumania, Greece, Belgium, and so forth. The British and the French have been regarded as the real force behind the Greek-Turk war.

They have failed to carry out the treaty entered into at Washington between the nations to reduce competitive naval armaments. The French leadership is slowly isolating from the French Government the sympathy of the world in spite of the fact that the American people have felt a great and sentimental friendship for the people of France. A wide distinction must always be made between the people of a country and the governing forces of a country. France is pursuing a policy which threatens Europe with war or Bolshevism, or both, and the sooner the French statesmen realize the error of this short-sighted policy, the better it will be for the world, and the better it will be for the happiness and prosperity of the French people.

If Europe receives American help it will be upon the basis of absolute international justice, of international understanding, of international good will. Perhaps Clemenceau's visit may open the door. I wish this venerable statesman a welcome to America, and hope his visit will be pleasant and agreeable and that it may be useful in leading to a better understanding between the people of America and the people of France. America is not going to support a policy of greed and brute force and injustice between nations. America is going to stand for the new order upon the face of God's footstool. Clemenceau is believed in America to have extorted much from Woodrow Wilson in the treaty of Versailles in exchange for the League of Nations, but he has not made the American people agree to the extortions, although because of the covenant of the League of Nations a large body of American opinion was willing to give support to the treaty of peace, believing, as Woodrow Wilson seemed to believe, that the principles of the covenant would in time correct the unjust features which had been written into the treaty, as they did do in regard to Shantung and naval armaments.

Mr. President, every human being, I suppose, is a product of his training and environment, and it is easier for an American—living in the United States, where 48 sovereign States live side by side in peace and happiness under a just and generous Government, a Government of the people, by the people, and for the people—to see the value of such forces as are at work in America than it is for Clemenceau or the French leaders to believe that peace on earth can be maintained by moral force and that moral force is greater than physical force and that moral force can produce physical force which will be triumphant even in war, and yet if they should reflect upon it they would at last be driven to concede that it was the moral forces behind the Entente Allies that brought bayonets from the ends of the earth in defense of liberty and justice and actually won the late war. The old order of European diplomacy believed alone in military force, in strategic boundaries, in secret covenants, in intrigue, in balances of power, and so forth, and this doctrine has been so ground into the mind of Clemenceau it is difficult indeed, if not impossible, for him to understand the conquering power of the new forces which are going to govern and make safe the world and which have been written in the covenant of the league under the inspiration, leadership, and sacrifice of Woodrow Wilson, whose name, as time goes on, will rise in greater and greater dignity and honor.

Clemenceau believes in balances of power, in alliances versus alliances. He tells us the hope of the world is France, Great Britain, and the United States versus Germany, Russia, and Turkey.

Not so, my dear Clemenceau. The peace of the world is justice to all nations alike, great and small, and a recognition of the doctrine "Turkey for the Turks, Russia for the Russians, as well as France for the French." Political independence and territorial integrity for every nation. Let Great Britain and France and Greece get out of Turkey and stay out.

Over 50 nations are now members of the League of Nations. The injustices of Versailles should be corrected at once. Germany and Russia should be brought into the league. The United States should enter the league or declare an approval of its principles.

The principles of the 14 points should be written into the Versailles treaty as agreed—and especially disarmament, down to the limit of domestic needs, should be speedily accomplished. The budgets should be balanced. A federal reserve system of Europe adopted. Gold enough to supply the system should be advanced by the European countries with the aid of $500,000,000 of American gold. An international conference of business men should be annually assembled with a view to increasing production and distribution of commodities and teaching men of all nations to know and trust each other. The economic barriers should be removed between nations.

You can not hate a man you really know and who really knows you.

The need of the world is mutual understanding, mutual faith and good will. It will lead to peace and to prosperity of all men. The doctrine of Christ is the true doctrine. "Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself." If dear Clemenceau could teach his people to turn their backs on fear and hate, even the Germans would respond to these sentiments and America could then do much to help Europe.

Mr. President, one of the most remarkable appeals for peace has come with the signatures of the representatives of the organization of European War Veterans after their participation in the last annual convention of the American Legion. Among these resolutions are the following:

That all international agreements among Governments affecting the entire people shall be open and above board, with full publicity.

To oppose territorial aggrandizement.

That an international court be established to outlaw war.

To proceed as rapidly as conditions permit, and when the decrees of such courts become operative entirely disarm and disband armies and their forces and destroy the implements of warfare.

The organizations of the soldiers of the late World War can do more to teach sanity to public leaders than, perhaps, any other force, and I rejoice in these resolutions. They reflect the principles of the 14 points, and go further to outlaw war.

There should be international treaties by which the invasion of the territory of another country should be denounced as an international high crime, punishable with death for the leaders guilty of it, and the world ought to inflict this penalty and teach by personal penalties stupid officials who bring about war that they are responsible for the death of the men whom they lead into aggressive, wrongful war, and they should suffer the penalty of death as a righteous judgment.

The time has come for the new order, and if Clemenceau really represents the better sentiment in France in saying, "Let us be good and let us be free," the American opinion might support America participating in the councils of Europe for the reconstruction of Europe—but when Clemenceau talks about "Turkish barbarism, German revenge, and Russian anarchy" as the problems he wishes America to help him to solve by an alliance with Great Britain and France to stop the menace of a Moslem war, the reply of America will be unsympathetic. We are not astonished nor shocked at the Turks driving the aggressive Greeks out of their country. We are in favor of Turkey for the Turks, of Russia for the Russians, of Germany for the Germans, and of France for the French, and opposed to any one of them invading the territory or the rights of any other. We are in favor of the principles of the league and the 14 points, which are binding on Clemenceau and on the French leadership, and until they recognize these principles they will have great difficulty in conciliating American opinion.

Mr. President, we believe that the people of Europe are deeply desirous of peace. It is the leadership of Europe that does not seem to understand the conditions upon which peace may be obtained. They are pursuing policies which are stirring up hate. If Clemenceau's visit to this country can make that perfectly clear to the leadership of Europe, if they will be advised from what Clemenceau is able to learn in the United States with regard to the true principles of government which should obtain between nations, his visit will not have been in vain. We hope his visit will accomplish that result.

APPENDIX.

Senate Concurrent Resolution 17, submitted by Senator OWEN January 28, 1918.

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), The United States declared a state of war existing between the Imperial Government of Germany and the Imperial and Royal Government of Austria and the United States because of their repeated willful violations of the rights of the people of the United States under the acknowledged principles of international law; the sinking of unarmed merchant vessels and of hospital and Red Cross ships; the destruction of the lives of unoffending American citizens on their lawful business on the high seas on many occasions; filling the United States with spies and secret agents; conspiring the wholesale destruction of American industries by arson, by explosions, and murder; systematically promoting sedition and treason among our citizens, and the criminal violation of our laws by the German and Austrian aliens residing in the United States; endeavoring to incite the hostility and aversion of other nations against the United States, and to persuade Mexico and Japan to make war upon the United States, and many other wrongful acts contrary to the laws of nations and in violation of justice and of humanity; and for the further reason that it had finally become known to the United States from indisputable evidence that the military masters of Germany and Austria had deliberately and secretly conspired to bring about an elaborately prepared offensive war by which and through which they intended, first, to dominate Europe, nation by nation, and then to dominate the other unprepared nations of the earth and establish a military world dominion.

For many years past the governing powers of Germany and Austria have by world-wide intrigue carried on a systematic attempt to disorganize public opinion in the United States and in the other nations of the world for the purpose of breaking down the powers of resistance of other nations against this conspiracy for world dominion by exciting nation against nation and internal disorders among the nations that might oppose this sinister design.

The United States has not forgotten that the military rulers of Germany and Austria deliberately prevented international agreements at the various Hague conventions for arbitration of international differences, abatement of armaments, and world peace.

The United States recognizes this war as an offensive war of the completely prepared German and Austrian military autocracies against the unsuspecting and inadequately prepared democracies of the world in pursuance of the policy laid down in the first and second articles of the secret treaty of Verona of November 22, 1922, in which the autocratic rulers of Prussia and Austria solemnly pledged their powers to each other to overthrow all "representative" governments on earth, the consummation of which design the Prussian and Austrian autocratic group has steadily and secretly kept in view, and that this war had for its objects the premeditated slaughter and robbery of the innocent peoples of other nations for the sordid and base purposes of annexation, indemnity, robbery, and commercial profit by military force and terrorism and ultimate world dominion.

The United States finally recognized the unavoidable necessity of meeting the forces of this military conspiracy on the battle fields of Europe in order to prevent the military rulers of Germany and Austria succeeding in the first step of mastering Europe as a means to mastering and robbing America.

The United States can not be deceived by those military leaders of Germany and Austria who now, before their own people, pretend to be waging a war of defense and to desire an honorable peace, but whose every act has clearly demonstrated to the whole world that they deliberately planned and are still persisting in this unspeakably brutal war, with their sinister purposes unchanged, and which they are still attempting to carry out by terrorism, intrigue, and systematic falsehood and deceit at home and abroad.

The United States can not confide in any statement or promise emanating from such a perfidious source until the German and Austrian people in fact and in sober truth can control the conduct of their agents and compel them to observe the rules of morality and good faith.

The United States did not enter this war for material advantage or for any selfish purpose or to gratify either malice or ambition.

The United States will not approve of forcible annexations or mere punitive indemnities, even on the misguided people of Austria or of Germany, but demands the complete evacuation of all territory invaded during the present war by the German and Austrian troops and the restoration and indemnity of Belgium, Serbia, Rumania, and Montenegro.

The United States believes that righting the wrong done to the French people by the Prussian Government in 1871 in the matter of Alsace-Lorraine will remove long-pending grievances due to previous military aggression and will promote future world peace.

The United States believes that a readjustment of the frontiers of Italy should be effected along clearly recognized lines of nationality; that an independent Polish State should be established over territory indisputably occupied by Polish people; that the peoples of Austria-Hungary, of the Balkans, and of the Ottoman Empire should have the right of autonomous development.

The United States will favor recognizing and protecting by an international alliance the territorial integrity of all nations, great and small; the maintenance of the right of unembarrassed self-determination of all nations, and the right of such nations to manage their own affairs by internal self-government; and safeguarding the rights of backward peoples by international agreement.

The United States will favor extending international credits for the restoration of all places made waste by war.

The United States will insist that the oceans and high seas and international waterways and canals shall be open on equal terms to the citizens of all nations; that all nations shall have the untaxed right of access to the sea of their goods in bond, through any intervening territory to the seaports of other nations, with equal access to shipping facilities.

The United States will favor the removal, as far as possible, of all economic barriers and the establishment of equal trade conditions among all the nations of the world consenting to peace and associating themselves for its maintenance, without interfering with the right of any nation to govern its own imports and exports.

The United States will insist that adequate guaranties shall be given and taken to the end that national armaments on land and sea should be reduced to the lowest points consistent with domestic safety.

The unbounded ambition and deceit of the Prussian military autocrats are again exposed in shameless nakedness before the German and Austrian people, their allies, and the world at large in their present demands of annexation of adjacent Russian territory and other demands contemplating the domination of the Russian and Polish people in flat violation of their own Reichstag's recent pledges against annexation and indemnity.

The United States feels for the Russian people the liveliest sympathy in their great losses in life and property at the hands of the German and Austrian autocrats, as well as their magnificent and glorious struggles in behalf of freedom and democratic world peace.

Having passed through many severe tests and trials in establishing popular government in America, the people of the United States, through their own directly elected representatives, desire to extend to the Russian people the cordial hand of fellowship in their new-found freedom and to assure their democratic brothers in Russia that we earnestly desire to render them, so far as possible, every assistance they may need and which they themselves desire.

The United States will favor an open-minded and absolutely impartial adjustment of all colonial claims based upon a strict observance of the principle that in determining all such questions of sovereignty the interests of the population concerned must have equal weight with the claims of the Governments whose titles are to be determined.

The United States recognizes that a general association of civilized nations must be formed under specific covenants for the purpose of affording mutual guaranties of political independence and territorial integrity to nations, great and small alike, and of maintaining world peace, and believes that under such a system dissatisfied peoples now held under subjection to dominating nations for strategic purposes could be safely given their liberty and autonomy, as the rights of the dominant nation would be made safe by the general association of nations and the subject nation would cease to be a coveted asset against future war.

The United States believes that under such general association of nations it should be a violation of international law and the highest international crime for any nation, on any alleged ground, to invade by military power the territorial limits of another nation, and that the penalty for such invasions should be the immediate international blockade of the invading and offending nation, an embargo on all mail, express, and freight to and from such nation, and the suppression of such invasion by the combined forces of the general association of nations organized for the protection of world peace.

The United States believes that all future international treaties should be made in the open, where all the world may know of the proceedings in the framing of such treaties, and that secret diplomacy and international intrigue should end.

The United States desires to be on friendly terms, political, commercial, and social, with the people of every nation, including those now under the control of the German and Austrian military autocracies, and to restore as speedily as possible these friendly relations with the German and Austrian people as soon as they organize a Government responsible to the will of the people of Germany and Austria and whenever they shall themselves demonstrate a willingness to deal with the other nations of the world on a basis of equality, justice, and humanity and are willing to abandon the atrocious and detestable doctrine of making war for annexation, indemnity, and profit.

The United States entered this war to protect the rights of its own citizens to life and liberty, to protect its own future, to make the world safe from the future menace of military despotism, dynastic ambitions, or competing armaments, to establish permanent world peace on a basis of international justice, righteousness, and humanity, and, in cooperation with the self-governing belligerent nations, will maintain these principles, whatever the cost, with firmness and resolution until these ends are fully accomplished.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Forty-eight Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

MERGER OF MEAT PACKERS.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of Senate Resolution 364, which is lying upon the table subject to my call.

Mr. OVERMAN. I do not object, but I understood the Chair had announced that no quorum was present.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. The Chair announced that a quorum was present.

The VICE PRESIDENT. A quorum is present.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I made the request which I made without prejudice to the pending motion.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the resolution, which the Secretary will read for the information of the Senate.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, will the Senator from Wisconsin yield to me in order that I may make an inquiry of the Chair?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I inquire of the Chair how the Chair arrived at the conclusion that 48 Senators constitute a quorum of the Senate?

The VICE PRESIDENT. There are only 95 Members of the Senate at the present time.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The question as to the propriety of that ruling is now before the Committee on Rules. Of course, the Chair is entirely justified under the existing rules in arriving at that conclusion. I trust, however, that the matter may at some time soon receive the attention of the committee and be finally determined by them.

Mr. DIAL. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield.

Mr. DIAL. Mr. President, I understand the Senator from Wisconsin has unanimous consent for the consideration of a resolution.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I have.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That request has been made.

Mr. DIAL. I shall object to its consideration, but I will not offer an objection to the resolution being read.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Then I ask to have it read, Mr. President, as I have modified it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the resolution.

The Secretary read the resolution (S. Res. 364), as modified, submitted by Mr. LA FOLLETTE on the 22d instant, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of Agriculture be, and hereby is, directed to report immediately to the Senate all information now in his possession relating to any proposed merger or mergers of large meat-packing companies, accompanying said report with a statement of the number of animals annually slaughtered under Federal inspection, tabulated by fiscal years beginning July 1, 1919, and the proportion slaughtered by each of the five principal packers, with their subsidiary and affiliated companies; also to report what action, if any, he has taken or contemplates taking in reference to such proposed merger.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the request of the Senator from Wisconsin for unanimous consent.

Mr. DIAL. Mr. President, as I understand, to-day is Calendar Monday. I do not desire to consume any time whatever; but I have a little bill which is uncontested, which has been considered and unanimously reported by the Committee on Claims and recommended by the Secretary of the Treasury. It is designed to expedite the settlement of the account of a former acting internal-revenue collector in my State. There is no appropriation whatever involved. I should like to have that bill passed. I have been trying all day to secure its consideration. My friends on the other side objected to unanimous consent for that purpose. I expect to leave the city in a day or two, to be gone two or three days. I should like to have my little bill passed before that time. If I could get unanimous consent to do so I should be very glad to have it considered, but, if I can not, I am going to object to any measure coming up by unanimous consent so long as I am in town and until I have to go home in the next three or four days. I object to the consideration of the resolution at this time.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I should like to say to the Senator from South Carolina that I think the resolution offered by the Senator from Wisconsin is a very important one and is rather urgent. Would the Senator be willing to withdraw his objection if the Senator from Wisconsin would consent to taking up the bill to which the Senator from South Carolina refers?

Mr. DIAL. I did not pay any attention to the reading of the resolution and I do not know anything about it and do not care anything about it for the present, but I want to be assured that I can secure the passage of my uncontested bill reported unanimously by the Claims Committee.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. The Senator will certainly encounter no objection from me to the consideration of his bill.

Mr. SIMMONS. Will the Senator from Wisconsin withdraw his resolution temporarily in order that the Senator from South Carolina may ask unanimous consent for the consideration of the bill referred to by him?

Mr. SMOOT. There will be objection to the consideration of the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Wisconsin for unanimous consent for the consideration of Senate Resolution 364?

Mr. DIAL. I object.

Mr. OVERMAN. I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Let us have an executive session.

Mr. OVERMAN. Very well, I will move then that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. In the nature of an amendment I move that when the Senate conclude its business this afternoon it take a recess until to-morrow at 12 o'clock.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The reading clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ball	Harrell	Nicholson	Stanfield

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Monday, November 27, 1922.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

We trust that we approach Thee, O Lord, with open hearts and sacred desire. The light of day is a proof of Thy mercy and the night is written all over with the stars of Thy presence. Help us to a clear understanding of these days. Give patience to those who wait and hope to those who labor. In all manly strength and courage may we persevere in the things that are right. As solemn responsibilities have been intrusted to this assembly, bless all Members with broad knowledge that they may be able to respond wisely to their demands.

Give comfort to all homes of sickness. Make a way for us where there is no path, and when the darkness thickens let the pressure of Thy hand be tenderest. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday, November 25, 1922, was read and approved.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, it occurs to me that we ought to have a roll call on this matter, and I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the merchant marine bill, with Mr. TILSON in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 12817, which the Clerk will report for amendment.

The Clerk began the reading of the bill.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state his parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Under the rule or practice is it intended to read the whole section before the offering of amendments?

The CHAIRMAN. The bill will be read by sections under the rule. The Clerk will proceed to read the first section of the bill.

The Clerk began the reading of the bill.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I want to ask—I did not hear the ruling of the Chair—is it that the paragraph must first be read before the offering of amendments?

The CHAIRMAN. The bill is being read by sections. The Clerk will proceed to read the first section of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc.—

TITLE I. AMENDMENTS TO THE MERCHANT MARINE ACT, 1920.

SECTION 1. Section 5 of the merchant marine act, 1920, is amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 5. (a) That in order to accomplish the declared purposes of this act, and to carry out the policy declared in section 1 hereof, the board is authorized and directed to sell, as soon as practicable, consistent with good business methods and the objects and purposes to be attained by this act, at public or private competitive sale after appraisal and due advertisement, to persons who are citizens of the United States, except as provided in section 6 of this act, all the vessels referred to in section 4 of this act or otherwise acquired by the board.

"(b) Any vessel may be sold without such advertisement or such competitive sale, if such action is specifically authorized by the board upon an affirmative vote of not less than five of its members, and if such vote and a full statement of the reasons for authorizing such sale are spread upon the minutes of the board.

"(c) Any sale under this section shall be made at such prices and on such terms and conditions, including the use or disposition of the vessel by the purchaser, as the board may prescribe; except that (1) the completion of the payment of the purchase price and interest shall not be deferred more than 15 years after the making of the contract of sale, (2) interest on the unpaid purchase price shall be payable at least annually at a rate of not less than 4 per cent per annum, and (3) the payments of principal shall be so arranged that the amounts due or paid under the contract of sale as principal up to any moment of time shall be sufficient to cover depreciation of the vessel up to such moment, unless the board waives this requirement upon the giving of adequate security.

"(d) All sales made under the authority of this act shall be subject to the limitations and restrictions of section 9 of the shipping act, 1916, as amended."

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois: Page 2, lines 6 to 11, inclusive, strike out all subsection.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, this subsection provides, in brief, that any vessel may be sold without advertisement or competitive sale if the action is specifically authorized by the Shipping Board and if that board writes down on their minutes why they wanted it done. I suppose the idea of those who framed this particular subsection was that if the reasons were given on some record somewhere that was all that is considered necessary for safety. Let me say to the membership of the committee that I consider this one of the most vulnerable sections. Gentlemen of the committee, and especially those on the Republican side, I want to say a word to you about this. The Republican Party is chargeable for this bill, and properly so. There are several of us here who would like to vote for this bill if it can be amended so that it can be defended among our constituencies, but I want to say to you earnestly now on the Republican side that those who are in charge of this bill had better listen rather carefully to suggestions that are made by those who are friendly to the cause of the Republican Party and friendly to the general principle involved in this bill and be liberal in permitting amendments to this bill. [Applause.] If you do that, so far as I am concerned I want to go along. I do not think I need vouch for my abstract of title to Republicanism. I want to vote for this bill. I want the bill fixed so that I can vote for it, and the place to fix it is here. The Republicans should have fixed it in conference, so as to come in with a united front, but we did not, so we must perfect it here, if at all. Now, we have this one section that ought not to be in this bill. Some of the worst scandals that arose out of our late war came from negotiated sales of surplus materials that came after the war was over. Millions of dollars worth of surplus material were sold without advertisement, not sold as the result of competitive bidding, and sold by negotiated sales. Those sales stink to the high heaven. Here are $3,000,000,000 worth of ships. It may be that they are only worth $150,000,000. Here are 2,200 ships, and the members of the majority side, because it is our bill, propose to give to the Shipping Board, composed of men who may or may not know what the ships are worth, and who may or may not be honest, the power to sell these ships for anything they see proper. What sort of proposition is that? Let me tell you something, gentlemen on the Republican side. For every mistake or error of judgment that this Shipping Board may make in their sales of these vessels we will be held responsible, and the people of this country will not question whether they were errors of judgment or mistakes, but they will hold us responsible for the worst possible construction to be placed upon their acts. This section ought to be stricken out.

These ships ought to be sold by competitive bidding so that you can go to the country and defend the sales. I sincerely trust that this section will go out of this bill. [Applause.]

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I wish to speak to the same amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is recognized in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. FREAR. In favor of the amendment. I take the same position so far as the pending amendment is concerned as the gentleman [Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois] who preceded me. I also take the same position regarding my Republicanism, which has been uniform for many years since the first time I ever voted. As I received a majority of over 37,000 in the last primary, I have no apology to make. I want to read something in regard to this very question which comes to me from the New York Herald upon this very point, an article which has been printed and circulated throughout the country in regard to views expressed several days ago by the Wisconsin delegation. A reporter of the New York Herald called on me and endeavored to put words in my mouth which I refused to agree to. This is the first time this has happened to my knowledge from any reputable reporter. As a class they are of as high a character as men on this floor, I believe. This is what he said in addition to the authorized statement given out, which authorized statement was as follows:

I have been instructed to say that the Wisconsin delegation individually and collectively expects to work with the Republican organization as heretofore. It has no candidate to offer nor support to ask as a delegation. Primarily, it is interested in the enactment of progressive legislation, which is interpreted to be a recent mandate from the people.

Here is the misstatement that has no basis of fact whatever, as follows:

Mr. FREAR said the Wisconsin delegation would not oppose the selection of Mr. GILLET and Representative LONGWORTH as Speaker and Republican floor leader.

That statement was never made, never could be made, because never discussed by the delegation, and existed only in the imagination of the Herald reporter. No other paper, to my knowledge, has printed any such inference as that published by this paper.

Mr. MONDELL rose.

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman from Wyoming rise?

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, we want to conclude the consideration of this bill. We want to have every provision of the bill read and an opportunity allowed for amendment before the time comes for voting. In order to do that the House must confine itself to the matters before it. I hope the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR] will not bring in extraneous matters and that we may get down to the discussion of the bill and the amendment.

Mr. FREAR. I am in sympathy with the gentleman. I want to make just a brief statement.

Mr. MONDELL. I hope the statement the gentleman will make will be very brief.

Mr. FREAR. My brief statement is, in effect, that I never made such a statement. There is no truth in it, because I could not speak in any way for the delegation. As to another part, that the Republican leader believes it is a confession of weakness, I do not believe any Republican leader ever made such a statement to the Republicans.

Mr. EDMONDS. I am going to accept the amendment.

Mr. FREAR. Well, of course, if the gentleman is going to accept the amendment, I will not pursue the matter further.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Chairman, let the amendment be read again.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maryland asks unanimous consent that the amendment be again read.

Mr. MONDELL. The amendment was read clearly. It is an amendment simply to strike out.

Mr. LINTHICUM. I could not hear in the confusion.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment is to strike out paragraph (b) of the section.

Mr. EDMONDS. The amendment is to strike out paragraph (b), on page 2. So far as the committee are concerned, we are perfectly willing to accept the amendment.

The committee put it in for this reason—that the Shipping Board found itself in the position where it would be forced to advertise every time a man made a request for a ship. That took time—a large amount of time. Sometimes a prospective purchaser found another ship, and the Shipping Board did not sell to him. This is not vital to the bill, and it makes no difference to the committee. We are perfectly willing to accept the amendment.

I want to say further that we are having prepared an amendment that will take the industrial ships, like those of the Standard Oil and the United States Steel, away from being the recipients of any subsidy.

This matter was taken up with five or six of the Republicans in the committee who drew the bill, and, although we deemed that it is absolutely vital for war purposes that we should have these ships, however it seems to be the sentiment of the House that we are not going to have any more wars and that we do not need the ships. I will offer an amendment to take that compensation out of the bill.

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EDMONDS. Yes.

Mr. LONDON. Does not the expression, "public or private competitive sale," on the first line of page 2, comprise the very language that paragraph (b) was intended to provide for?

Mr. EDMONDS. As I understand it, they invite 10 or 15 people who are likely to purchase a ship. When a man comes in and asks for a ship they will invite 10 or 15 people who are likely to purchase the ship and make a private competitive sale for it. In other words, they will auction it off.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EDMONDS. I do not want the House to be laboring under a mistake. Outside of the tankers we have got 1,200 ships, of 9,059,000 tons—dead-weight tons. Twenty-eight and five-hundredths per cent of those vessels are of the lake type; 14.07 per cent of the dead-weight tonnage of those vessels are of the lake type. I am trying to give you information. So far as the committee is concerned we will accept the amendment and be prepared to go on.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Mr. Chairman, I wish to say a word in behalf of myself and others who are somewhat responsible for this provision going into the bill. One of the considerations favoring its insertion is the one expressed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania. There has been a fear expressed over and over again that a few localities and a few interests would acquire these ships if they were put up to competitive bids to the exclusion and prejudice of other localities. There is a provision of the bill under which certain areas are sought to be taken care of, a provision looking to maintenance of existing lines.

A further reason for this provision was that these localities that have existing lines under this provision might acquire these ships notwithstanding, for instance, New York, Philadelphia, or Boston interests might be willing to come in and outbid them at a competitive sale. We were seeking by this provision to make an equal distribution of these ships throughout all the territory of the United States.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman has come to the latter part of the game. I would like to be heard a moment on this same amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. MONDELL. The debate is exhausted on the amendment, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas can make a proper motion.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Mr. Chairman, just in order to keep the record straight I wish to say that in this committee the minority members tried their very best to have this section of the bill stricken out, and we went back to the act of 1920, the Jones Act, which required advertisement and competitive bids, and we insisted that these ships should not be sold except after due advertisement under competitive bids, and the majority of the committee then refused to accept our proposition. But I note that they now have come to terms.

We shall move later to strike out and go back to the act of 1920. Not only is this paragraph subject to objection but I am glad to see that on this day the wakening interest of the people is causing the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. EDMONDS] to accept one amendment in the interest of the honest administration of this law, if it is to be passed. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn in opposition to this amendment.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, it may be proper that this amendment should go out. And yet, speaking from the technical standpoint, it may be proper that it should stay in. If it is necessary for the corporation to do business there ought to be a provision of this sort. Unfortunately you can not—and you can not largely because of partisanship and partisan criticism—conduct these transactions as they would be conducted by private parties. If the ships were sold under a provision of this sort and the sale were ever so proper and legitimate, even if it were just what should be done, it would afford the opposition the opportunity to criticize.

I think we should not leave anything in this bill which by any possibility can give anyone an opportunity to say that we are not in an honest, straightforward, aboveboard way trying to make possible the carrying of the American flag on the high seas. Of course this board ought to have some discretion; and yet, being a Government board, as matters go in this country, we can not give them that discretion without involving criticism. Therefore the provision ought to go out.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question being taken, the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee: On page 2, line 13, after the word "conditions," strike out the following words: "including the use or disposition of the vessel by the purchaser."

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, the provision which I propose to strike out is one of the innumerable provisions in this bill conferring upon the Shipping Board extraordinary power and discretion. The bill as it reads authorizes them to sell at such prices and on such terms and conditions as they may prescribe, "including the use or disposition of the vessel by the purchaser."

Now, if an American citizen desires to buy one of these ships and is able to buy it and pay for it, why should the Shipping Board be given the right to say what he shall do with it, or whether he shall operate it or where he shall operate it, or whether he shall sell it to some other American citizen? There are provisions in the bill against the transfer to foreign registry and such things as that, but this provision which my proposed amendment would strike out simply gives the Shipping Board a power which they should not possess and a power by which they could work injustice to American citizens and favor other American citizens. My amendment ought to be adopted.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. May I interrupt the gentleman for a moment?

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. It is a fact, is it not, that this language which the gentleman is criticizing does not appear in the Jones Act?

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. It does not appear in the Jones Act. I want to say in this connection to the Members on the other side that the merchant marine act of 1920, known as the Jones Act, which this bill proposes to mutilate and in many particulars to destroy, was enacted by a Republican Congress, and the last Republican platform boasted of the wisdom of that act and of the fact that it would "insure the establishment and maintenance of an American merchant marine." And as was suggested by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MOORE], this provision which I propose to strike out changes the act of 1920 in that respect.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment. I do not suppose anyone will question the legal right to sell conditionally anything that you may possess. The prime purpose of including this language here was much the same as that which prompted the provision which has just gone out of the bill. It was an effort to make certain that these ships owned by the Government should be equitably distributed throughout the ports and localities of the United States. We were moved by the desire to make certain, if it could be done by law, that if there were a fleet of vessels or a single vessel moving, we will say from Baltimore to Chile or from Galveston to Habana, or from any other port to a foreign port, if those vessels were sold the United States might say to the purchaser, "You have got to maintain the service which the people of that particular locality are now enjoying." It is a provision put in the bill in the interest of the whole United States—in the interest of the ports of the Pacific, the ports of the Gulf, the ports of the Atlantic—to make sure that the people dwelling in those localities shall have an adequate shipping service. That is the only reason for putting it in, and that is the reason why it ought to be left in the bill.

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Yes.

Mr. SNELL. If this provision should be stricken out of the bill what would hinder a man who is now operating a Government ship buying it at a very low figure, with the intention on our part that he should continue it in that service, and then turning around and selling it to some foreign purchaser?

Mr. WHITE of Maine. There would be the general provision of law against the sale to foreign interests without consent, but there would be no provision of law which would compel a man to keep that ship in a desirable service. This provision is entirely for that reason.

Mr. BRITTEN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Yes.

Mr. BRITTEN. Is it not also intended to prevent destructive competition?

Mr. WHITE of Maine. I do not know what some other persons may have had in mind with respect to that, but that was not what was in my mind. I can only repeat what I said, that my thought was that we ought to maintain so far as possible by law existing services, and we ought to create services elsewhere if it was desirable to do so, and we thought this provision made it possible in some degree, so far as law can do those things, the bringing about that result.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WHITE of Maine. I yield to the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. I want to ask the gentleman from Maine if it is not a fact that the purpose and effect of the provision would be that the Shipping Board could prevent competition by withholding the sale of ships wherever and in whatever cases they desired to do so?

Mr. WHITE of Maine. I think they can always refuse to sell ships, and that this provision does not affect that situation at all.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, no provision in this bill is more essential or more important than the one which the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. DAVIS] desires to strike out. If it were stricken out it might happen that every line running from southern ports would be discontinued. It might happen that no line would be permanently continued except a few great steamship lines. It might happen that the service absolutely essential to make the American merchant marine valuable—that is, a regular service from given ports in the United States to given ports abroad—might be abandoned and that we should have nothing except a tramp merchant marine, depriving us of that service which is above all the most essential service, service at stated times from all of the great ports of the country to the peoples with whom we have commerce.

I can not understand how anyone at all favorable to this bill, desirous of building up an American merchant marine, could approve or even suggest the amendment that has been offered by the gentleman from Tennessee. Under it the entire purpose of the bill might be defeated, and if we had a fleet at all it might be that the entire fleet would be largely engaged only in the more remunerative lines of commerce. The smaller ports, the American small harbors having a small amount of commerce, might, if this were stricken out, be entirely deprived of all service under the American flag.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I wish to answer what has been stated. The trouble with this provision in the bill, and the purpose declared by the two gentlemen who have just spoken, is that it is the purest camouflage. Nobody is more interested than I, and the gentleman who has offered this amendment, in the preservation of the shipping lines in the service of the smaller ports which we hope will be bought and continued in the service of the smaller ports by the people of such ports who will not desire to sell them. But when you attach this provision and limitation to the sale of a ship you will let every little man who wants to invest know that his head is in the lion's mouth, that his paw is in the trap, and that the power of life and death is given to the Shipping Board over his property which he buys and would like to pay for.

It is known further that the big corporations in this country do not have the same fear, because they have influence with the public and with the board to secure permission to sell the ships they might buy. The little investor will go to the Shipping Board as a prospective buyer of ships, but he knows "if he buys this ship they will hold him for all time, not for one year, not for five years, but during all time; they will not permit him to sell that ship." Do you not know that if that is done you will prevent any little man from buying? If the gentleman thought the omission of that would crush southern ports, does he think that in the Jones Act we would have omitted it and sought to crush the southern ports? We did not put it in because we wanted an honest sale, and we provided for a fair valuation and a fair price for the ships, which can only be had by giving a clear title to a ship when you sell it. With this restriction on the title and use of the ships you can not sell them except to the big corporations, knowing they will not be prevented from disposing of the ships.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Will the gentleman permit a suggestion?

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Yes.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Is not that specially true in view of the fact that Mr. Lasker stated at the hearings that it would be the policy of the board to require a cash payment to the amount of 80 per cent?

Mr. HARDY of Texas. That is the policy of the Shipping Board, and the ships will be sold to the big interests; they do not favor the little purchasers, and this clause will prevent the little purchaser from buying.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Chairman, perhaps a word should be said in the opening of the debate on amendments with reference to the attitude of the committee. Of course, we do not claim that this is a perfect bill or a perfect proposal for legislation. We do say, Mr. Chairman, that the committee has spent many months of hard labor on the bill and thinks it will accomplish the purposes intended.

There are two purposes intended; one is to sell the ships now controlled and operated by the Shipping Board and get them into private hands. The second and larger purpose is to establish an American merchant marine in all the trades and lines where we have a commerce. I am surprised that the gentlemen representing the Gulf States should object to this proposition. The people from the Gulf of Mexico were among those who appealed for protection in the sale of these ships. The people on the Pacific coast were among those who appealed for protection in the sale of these ships. They wanted an opportunity to buy the ships and they wanted the assurance that the ships would be retained on the Gulf and on the Pacific Ocean and in the South Atlantic ports.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Yes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. The gentleman has expressed a good deal of solicitude about the trade in the Gulf and South Atlantic ports. Why was not he willing to accept the request of the representative from those interests that section 7 of the Jones Act should be allowed to remain as it is?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Does not the gentleman from Alabama know that the representative agreed to the provisions in this bill?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I do not know it, and we will show that when we reach the section.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Chairman, speaking for myself, we are anxious to have constructive criticism and constructive amendments, but we do not think we should yield to those gentlemen who propose to kill the bill and kill the legislation and who will not vote for it no matter what you do. [Applause.] You may adopt every amendment suggested by the gentleman from Tennessee, and when you are all through I doubt if he will vote for the bill. If the friends of the bill come forward and make the proper suggestions and offer proper amendments, this committee will listen attentively and receptively to any such suggestions. This provision is an essential portion of this legislation if we are to maintain an American merchant marine and preserve our trade in the sections of the country where that is necessary, and the provision should be retained in the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman—

The CHAIRMAN. Debate has been exhausted on the amendment.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I want to say in answer to the gentleman who has last spoken that I understand him to say that only amendments will be permitted to this bill coming from those who are recognized friends of the bill.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. I did not say that.

Mr. FREAR. I take it that there are many gentlemen on the floor who have not yet determined in their own minds what their course will be. I think there are such Members on both sides of the House. I understand by statements made by members of the committee that there are 1,400 ships now held by the Government and 13 are in commission under the Shipping Board.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. There are 400 ships out of the 1,298, outside of the tankers.

Mr. EDMONDS. I can give the gentleman the figures.

Mr. FREAR. I will assume the statement made by the gentleman from Illinois is correct. Is there danger that the 1,000 ships are going to be taken over by certain interests, so as to prevent the whole country or every port in the United States from being taken care of? That is the question in my mind on this particular amendment. In whose power will you put it to determine where these boats are going? Mr. Lasker's? Mr. Lasker is the publicity agent and concedes that he is not acquainted with the merchant marine service, I understand.

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FREAR. In a moment. Here are a thousand ships unsold, and you want to sell them. We want to sell them to anyone who will buy them. You say that some of them are to be given away. Let us try to sell them if we can, and do not let us give all of the power to this commission, so that they can say that the ships shall go to a Gulf port or to a seaport in the Orient, or elsewhere. Let us say that these ships are for sale, and before the thousand now unsold are exhausted it may be we will come back here and control the rest, if we find there is no provision for Gulf ports about which the gentleman seems to be so anxious.

Mr. EDMONDS. Right in that connection with this amendment, let us presume that there is a line running out of Galveston or some southern port, and that somebody comes in from New York having more money than this line has, who wants to buy a number of ships to put into competition with that line. We used the term:

including the use or disposition of the vessel by the purchaser—

Mr. FREAR. Then that would remove the competition to which the man who ships is entitled. You are by this provision attempting to give a subsidy, and you are trying to destroy competition or putting it in the hands of Mr. Lasker to do it. I do not think that is good Republican doctrine; it is not good American doctrine.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FREAR. Yes.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. As I understand the situation, it is this. I want to talk on the point that the gentleman is discussing.

Mr. FREAR. Just ask the question. That is all I care to say on this amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee) there were—ayes 52, noes 90.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. SEARS. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. SEARS: Page 2, line 1, after the word "public" strike out the words "or private."

Mr. SEARS. Mr. Chairman, on the 20th of this month this bill was introduced and on the 21st was reported, and Members of Congress could not get the bill, consisting of 63 pages and involving about $6,000,000,000 worth of property, until the following day. The President of the United States on the 22d came before Congress and addressed us, and at that time urged us to pass this bill. Therefore, I presume the President knew what the bill contained. All last week the chairman of this committee and those who he states are friends of the bill fought for the bill as it stands. I want to congratulate those on the Republican side for getting a softening of the heart and at least accepting some amendments, such as the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana, and also indicating that later on they would offer amendments eliminating the Steel Co. and the Standard Oil Co. Why this change of front and of heart perhaps some day the people will know.

I was struck by the remarkable statement of the chairman of this committee. He said that Mr. Lasker and this board will call in 1 or 2 or 12 or 15 men, who want to buy ships, and will let them bid on the ships, sitting around the table. Who are those 12 or 15 men that are going to be called in by Mr. Lasker? I read before I left home to attend this session for the purpose of considering this bill that a corporation was being formed for the purpose of buying these ships. The President has said that we wantonly, wastefully, and madly expended money during the war. Mr. Chairman, we are now about to wantonly and wastefully waste the people's money and fasten on them, and I fear their children's children, a tax to meet this subsidy, by this hasty legislation. These sales should only be at public sale, where each American citizen will have the right to bid on the ships, and no man should have the right to call in 10 or 12 or 15 of his friends and let them sit around the table and go through the farce of bidding on these ships. Those of us who have been in public life and have seen these private sales know what they mean. We know that the little man who wants to buy a vessel will never get a chance to bid upon it. We know who are going to finally get these ships, although we have been unable to find out during the debate, and I want to again congratulate my Republican friends upon their repudiation of the President of the United States by admitting that the bill he urged us to pass was not properly drawn; that it is subject to amendment, and that we should amend it. I hope the chairman will also accept the amendment which I have offered in order that no one man—and I mean no reflection on Mr. Lasker, we do not know who will be the guiding spirit when these sales are made—shall have the right to invite a few friends to sit around a table and go through the farce of bidding on these vessels. Let each and every American citizen have the right to bid on these vessels at public sale, and then the people can not complain.

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Chairman, all I want to say in answer to the gentleman is that this is existing law and it has worked satisfactorily. There has been none of the scandal that occurred during the Democratic administration of the Shipping Board. All parties in interest have been notified. This has been done right along. There is no real reason for taking it out of the bill. It is in the Jones Act and has worked satisfactorily for two years.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. When the amendment was offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GRAHAM] to strike out subdivision (b), it was, I take it, unanimously stricken from the bill.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Oh, I voted against it.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman from Maine is the only vote that I know of who was against it. It was repugnant to the sensibilities of the House that that provision should stay in the bill.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. There was another thing that was against it.

Mr. BLANTON. Yet at the time that amendment was offered it remained for the gentleman from New York [Mr. LONDON] to call attention to the fact that the very power that we were seeking to take away from the Shipping Board was yet in the bill, in the language of the preceding paragraph. There is no question but that the vice of subdivision (b) is still in this bill, and the amendment by the gentleman from Florida [Mr. SEARS] will strike it out, and it ought to be stricken out. You say that there ought to be private sales without real advertisement and without public competition.

There was read into this RECORD the other day by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. DAVIS] an article that appeared in last week's New York Tribune, showing that two officers of the Shipping Board who are now out of the people's Treasury drawing each an annual salary of $35,000 are forming a syndicate to buy the 13 boats that are now in operation and which are making some profit.

Mr. EDMONDS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. They are to buy these boats. How? Buy them in open competition with the shipping interests of the world? No. I take it if they are to buy them the Shipping Board would give them the same privilege of buying them at this private sale they would give anyone else. We have a spectacle of these $35,000 a year members of the Shipping Board sitting around the table and buying these 15 ships without real competition.

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I will.

Mr. SNELL. I do not understand the provisions of this section as the gentleman does, and I wondered if the gentleman or myself was wrong. It means private competitive sale—get the real meaning of the bill.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman has probably in the course of his experience heard of competitive sales where there was no real competition, where competition is arranged beforehand, where there are but two bidders and both friendly so far as their interests are concerned, unknown to the seller. That could be the competition.

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. BLANTON. I will yield.

Mr. SNELL. Why not take the whole line in the consideration of the amendment? It does not mean the same to me as to the gentleman, and I am perfectly honest, and I believe the gentleman is. It says, "private competitive sale after appraisalment and due advertisement."

Mr. BLANTON. The Shipping Board—

Mr. SNELL. Come down to what is in the bill and be honest.

Mr. BLANTON. I am going to be honest with the gentleman. The Shipping Board appraises those 15 boats—

Mr. SNELL. And due advertisement.

Mr. BLANTON. Just a moment. It does not provide real advertisement.

Mr. SNELL. Then I can not read. Take the bill and read it.

Mr. BLANTON. Except to specify—

Mr. SNELL. After appraisalment and due advertisement.

Mr. BLANTON. What is due advertisement? [Laughter.] Does it mean it is in open shipping journals in the United States?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BLANTON. I have been interrupted and I ask for five additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection. [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Just a moment.

Mr. SNELL. Come to a consideration of the bill.

Mr. BLANTON. One question at a time and I will answer the gentleman.

Mr. SNELL. That is all I ask.

Mr. BLANTON. They advertise in some little insignificant paper down at Norfolk—

Mr. SNELL. Is that due advertisement?

Mr. BLANTON. Or at Richmond, that they are going to sell certain boats at private sale. No one knows about the inside agreements.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. In a moment. These $35,000 a year shipping experts with some friends come in and sit around a table, and one offers an insignificant sum, such as was offered when the first boats were put on sale, of $1, and these experts then make their offer. Now I yield.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. In the hearings before this committee the chairman of the Shipping Board appeared, and he said he had taken a total roster of all the ships they had; that they had appraised them and advertised; and they considered that that appraisalment and advertisement was a compliance with the existing law when hereafter they sought to sell a ship.

Mr. BLANTON. That answers the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL]. I want to say to the distinguished gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GRAHAM], who is sincere, if he wants to see the people's interests are safeguarded, I want to say to him that if he expects to protect the people's interests in this bill he should stand here and insist on these words authorizing private sales going out of this bill, because under the bill with those words left in you are going to find just such sales made under simulated competition. The distinguished gentleman from Illinois is an expert lawyer; he has been around courthouses for years; and he knows that in many instances there has been an apparent competition, there has been an apparent advertisement, there has been an apparent due notice, and yet there is no competition whatever concerning the sale of property in large amounts. I want to say he ought to stand up and insist upon those words going out if he is still sincere in wanting to protect the interests of the people.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, of course the gentleman who has occupied 10 minutes time would not vote for the bill if this amendment or any other amendment—

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman has me right.

Mr. MONDELL. Were agreed to. He is against the bill, against the principle of the bill, against the method of making the bill, and he would be against the bill under any and all circumstances. I am not surprised at gentlemen on the Democratic side being disturbed for fear something will not protect the public interest. We have had enough examples of that sort of thing during their administration to put anyone in a frame of mind to be suspicious. But, Mr. Chairman, we expect the gentlemen who are in charge of these important affairs for the Government to be honest, conscientious men, trying to do their duty. Objection is made to the use of the word "private" or "private competitive sale." I do not think that it is the happiest phrase that could be employed, but what it intends to cover is the sale under sealed bids. This is the provision of the existing law. The gentleman was here when the Jones Act was adopted, and he seemed to have no difficulty about it then. If this word was stricken from the bill, the only way the sale could be made would be by public auction. Every one familiar with sales of this sort knows that there must be other ways of selling than by public auction. There must be sales under sealed bids and that sort of thing which is described here.

Cries of "Vote!"

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Florida.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. HARDY of Texas rose.

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman from Texas rise?

Mr. HARDY of Texas. I rise to strike out section 1 of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas moves to strike out section 1 of the bill.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment to perfect the section.

The CHAIRMAN. That would be in order before action is taken. The gentleman from Texas has the floor on his amendment if he desires it.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. I shall discuss my amendment, then, and later on—

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I wish to offer a perfecting amendment.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. As I understand the ruling of the Chair, I may offer my amendment now, and it will wait until the perfecting amendment has been acted upon?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. I would like to ask unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes on this motion.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is made. The gentleman from Texas is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I am sorry that there has been an objection, because I want to present at some length my reason for offering the motion to strike out this section. It is an amendment to section 5 of the Jones Act. Section 5 of the Jones Act and section 7 of the Jones Act laid down the policy upon which the Republican Party went before the people in 1920 with reference to the merchant marine. I want to read to you section 5 of the Jones Act, which is being amended, emasculated, and destroyed by this bill. Section 5 of the Jones Act provides:

That in order to accomplish the declared purposes of this act, and to carry out the policy declared in section 1 hereof, the board is authorized and directed to sell, as soon as practicable, consistent with good business methods and the objects and purposes to be attained by this act, at public or private competitive sale after appraisement and due advertisement, to persons who are citizens of the United States except as provided in section 6 of this act, all of the vessels referred to in section 4 of this act or otherwise acquired by the board. Such sale shall be made at such prices and on such terms and conditions as the board may prescribe, but the completion of the payment of the purchase price and interest shall not be deferred more than 15 years after the making of the contract of sale.

Then section 5 continues:

The board in fixing or accepting the sale price of such vessels shall take into consideration the prevailing domestic and foreign market price of, the available supply of, and the demand for vessels, existing freight rates and prospects of their maintenance, the cost of constructing vessels of similar types under prevailing conditions, as well as the cost of the construction or purchase price of the vessels to be sold, and any other facts or conditions that would influence a prudent, solvent business man in the sale of similar vessels or property which he is not forced to sell.

Very carefully this bill now under consideration eliminates every restriction placed upon the Shipping Board which requires them to get some fair price for these ships. The bill places them in an attitude where they might sell these ships as junk, for a song or a trifle, even though the United States is not forced to sell. The whole policy of the Government is changed by this bill from section 5 of the Jones Act. And you should bear in mind, gentlemen, you on that side, that section 5 of the Jones Act was by your convention at Chicago, when you nominated Mr. Harding, declared to express the policy of the Republican Party with reference to maintaining a merchant marine.

And when you get to section 7 of the Jones Act you will find that the words sought to be stricken out of this bill by my friend from Tennessee is intended to repeal that section. Section 7 of the Jones Act declares that if the Shipping Board could neither sell those ships for what they were worth or charter them for what they were entitled to bring, then the Government could operate the commercial lines necessary to the welfare of this country until they had demonstrated the feasibility of such lines and then they could sell at a fair price.

Gentlemen, if you adopt section 1 of this bill, you are blotting out section 5 and section 7 of the act which you once approved by your votes in this House in 1920 and which you approved by the declaration of your party platform, and you abandon what you went to the people on, and you adopt another policy by which you place an unlimited power in the Shipping Board to sacrifice every ship the Government owns and to sell at a song that which cost our people $3,000,000,000 and which you could not replace to-morrow for less than $75 a ton. They propose to sell them at an average of $20 per ton. You could not replace these ships for $75 a ton. There are a great many passenger ships among them. You know you could not replace them for $75 a ton.

This law upon which you went to the country required that you should sell those ships for something like what they were worth. That law provided also that you should consider what they could be rebuilt for when you went to price them. You should consider the world prices, and then if the shipping interests undertook to hold up the Shipping Board by refusing to bid, that law requires that the Shipping Board shall operate these ships along desirable lines until they do establish the feasibility of maintaining those ships in operation.

Yes; there is an offer now, I understand, to buy the United States Line, which is being operated by Mr. Rossbottom. Just as fast as the Shipping Board puts a successful line in operation you are going to find a private interest coming in to buy, and then the Shipping Board may sell them for a song, may sell them for whatever they please. Are you in favor of that?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

Mr. BRIGGS. Mr. Chairman, the other amendment, offered by Judge HARDY, is still pending for debate, is it not?

The CHAIRMAN. It is open to debate. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GRAHAM] offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois: Page 2, line 19, after the word "than," strike out the figure "4" and insert in lieu thereof the figures "4½."

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I will accept the amendment.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I wish to offer a perfecting amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GRAHAM].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, on line 19 I move to strike out the words "a rate of not less than 4½ per cent," according to the present amendment, and insert simply the figure "6."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. FREAR: Page 2, line 19, strike out "a rate of not less than 4½" and insert in lieu thereof the figure "6."

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that that is not in order, because the committee has just passed an amendment fixing the number. You can not offer to strike out a number and insert another number.

Mr. FREAR. I will abide the ruling of the Chair. If the Chair holds this amendment out of order, then I will offer another.

The CHAIRMAN. If the amendment of the gentleman from Wisconsin simply struck out the language that was inserted it would not be in order; but it proposes to strike out other material language, and therefore the Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. FREAR. My reason for offering this amendment is this, Mr. Chairman: It seems to me we are to act intelligently here. I hope so. Even though the members of the committee believe this is a proper bill to put through, in present form, I ask you in all fairness, what law there is to-day that puts in the hands of any man or any set of men the right to determine in their own judgment the rate of interest that may be charged?

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FREAR. Yes.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. The existing law authorizes the Shipping Board to take any rate of interest they see fit.

Mr. FREAR. Then that is the only board which does that, to my knowledge. That being so, it seems to me we should state positively in the statute in this case, as we do in every other case, as the law does when dealing with foreign loans, what the rate shall be, so fixed that the board can not change it. We ought to fix the rate. Whether it is 4½ or 6 per cent is a secondary consideration; but why should we place in the hands of a set of men the right to say to the gentleman from Wyoming, "You can have this at 4½ per cent," and to the gentleman over here on my right, "You may have it at 10 per cent"? Why place that discretion in the hands of anyone. And where have you ever done it before?

Mr. MONDELL. On the foreign debt the limitation is not less than 4½ per cent.

Mr. FREAR. We fixed it there because of the rate at which we sold the Liberty bonds. I tried to put through on the floor the very amendment mentioned fixing the interest rate and you voted against it. Now, I ask you to vote the restriction so that it will not be in the hands of two or three men or five men to say that the rate of interest to one man shall be 10 per cent and to another 4½ per cent. Let me say in addition that 6 per cent is the rate. That is the rate the average man out in my country pays on his loans. Why are you putting it at 4½? I ask that you treat all alike.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FREAR. Yes.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. It is because of the existing law.

Mr. FREAR. I do not care about the existing law. Let me say that I do not believe one man on this floor, outside of your committee, knows what the existing law is. When the bill was put through some of these matters of taxation were not known to the Members, and I question whether the members of the committee themselves could explain to the satisfaction of the House the meaning of these taxation propositions claimed to be in existing law. We are dealing with the bill before us. We are fixing a law that is going to control the loaning of $125,000,000, and I say we ought to fix the rate of interest positively, and fix it at the ordinary rate paid in the West, and not grant special favors as is done in this bill.

Mr. BRIGGS. Is it not true that the President in his message to Congress last week expressly condemned the existing law for not fixing a definite rate with reference to the interest upon construction loans, stating that it left it open to the whims of favoritism?

Mr. FREAR. That is the position that I assume ought to be taken in regard to this bill.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Mr. Chairman—

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR].

The question being taken, the amendment was rejected.

Mr. BRIGGS. Mr. Chairman—

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman from Texas rise?

Mr. BRIGGS. To debate the amendment.

Mr. MONDELL. Is the gentleman in favor of the amendment?

Mr. BRIGGS. I am in favor of the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BRIGGS. I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. MONDELL. I think we ought to have a vote on the amendment.

Mr. BRIGGS. The amendment I am referring to is not the one that has been passed on. It is the amendment pending.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HARDY] to strike out the entire paragraph. To that the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BRIGGS] offers a motion to strike out the last word. The gentleman is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. BRIGGS. Mr. Chairman, as I understand it, the Frear amendment has been voted on.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment pending is the amendment of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HARDY].

Mr. BRIGGS. Mr. Chairman, under section 5 of the existing Jones law there is nothing to prevent the Shipping Board from selling the fleet to-day at any price it chooses consistent with good business judgment. When the question came before your committee of striking out of it the safeguards now contained in section 5 the question was asked repeatedly why the Shipping Board should be relieved of all responsibility when they can already sell the fleet for any price they desired. But, my friends, the testimony developed that when bids were invited for this great fleet last February the bids which were received were so hopelessly inadequate that the chairman of the Shipping Board called them facetious. The witnesses before the joint committee testified that there was no sale for the ships; and yet advocates of this subsidy insisted that the Government should sell the ships as soon as possible, although in the same breath they admitted that there was no market for the ships.

What is the meaning of this amendment to this act which is now contained in the bill? It can mean only one thing. It is to give to the Shipping Board the impression that Congress did not want them to observe prudence and good business judgment any longer, but wanted them to sell the ships at all hazards, no matter if they were sold for $5 apiece or 5 cents apiece. That can be the only reason. It can be the only effect of this amendment. My friends, I am persuaded that when you take this safeguard out of the bill you will never get $200,000,000, even for a fleet of 10,000,000 tons of ships, but will sacrifice it for a mere pittance and then pay the syndicate that acquires it a tremendous subsidy based not upon the sacrifice purchase price but upon the cost of new construction. The motion of Judge HARDY should prevail.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HARDY].

The question being taken, on a division (demanded by Mr. HARDY) there were—ayes 37, noes 69.

Accordingly the amendment was rejected.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Chairman, inasmuch as section 3 has been stricken from the bill, I offer the following amendment:

Page 2, line 12, strike out the letter "c" and insert "b"; page 3, line 1, strike out the letter "d" and insert "c."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. LEHLBACH: Page 2, line 12, strike out the letter "c" and insert "b"; page 3, line 1, strike out the letter "d" and insert "c."

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will be agreed to.

There was no objection.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment:

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 1, after the word "sale" insert the words "under sealed bids."

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Chairman, as the bill has been left the provision enables them to assemble around the table when many of the people who want to buy will not be there, and shade their bids in order that certain people can acquire ships, while the people who are not there have no opportunity to shade their bids. If they are going to sell at private sale under competitive bids they should be sold by the bids that have been made, and not on the bids that may be jockeyed after they have gathered there.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. EDMONDS] a while ago said that they had decided that they were going to undertake to remove from the bill the provision giving a subsidy to the Standard Oil Co. and other great interests of that character. If you allow them to buy these ships at just such a figure as they see fit to make, they do not care very much whether they get a subsidy or not, because, after they have acquired the ships at such a price as they want, you have left in the tariff bill a provision that when the shipbuilder imports the materials of which he builds the ship—and the gentleman from New York [Mr. CHANDLER] made the statement that they could buy them cheaper abroad—if he sells the ship to a foreigner the Treasury will give him a rebate on all the tariff he paid on the material. If he sells it to go under the American flag he sells it loaded, so you have made it impossible for the cheapest method of getting ships to be followed, except to get them by these bids, and I am in favor of hedging it about so that nobody can acquire them by method of favor, or by jockeying of bids after they get around the table, when other competitors can not get there.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from South Carolina.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. STEVENSON) there were 26 ayes and 69 noes.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on the section and all amendments thereto be now closed.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I have a perfecting amendment that I want to offer to the section.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Mr. Chairman, does the adoption of this motion cut off amendments to the section?

The CHAIRMAN. It does not. It cuts off debate. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Wyoming that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto be now closed.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BLANTON) there were 66 ayes and 28 noes.

So the motion of Mr. MONDELL was agreed to.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 23, after the word "moment," insert the words "together with an equal annual payment of the consideration price."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, and I would like to ask the attention of the chairman to the reading of it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 2, following the words "due advertisement," insert the words "hereafter published."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment:

At the end of section 1 insert the following: "The board in fixing or accepting the sale price of such vessels shall take into consideration the prevailing domestic and foreign market price of, the available supply of, and the demand for vessels, existing freight rates and prospects of their maintenance, the cost of constructing vessels of similar type under prevailing conditions, as well as the cost of the construction or purchase price of the vessels to be sold, and any other facts or conditions that would influence a prudent, solvent business man in the sale of similar vessels or property which he is not forced to sell."

Mr. Chairman, I take that language from the Jones Act.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

At the end of section 1 insert the following: "The board in fixing or accepting the sale price of such vessels shall take into consideration the prevailing domestic and foreign market price of, the available supply of, and the demand for vessels, existing freight rates and prospects of their maintenance, the cost of constructing vessels of similar types under prevailing conditions, as well as the cost of the construction or purchase price of the vessels to be sold, and any other facts or conditions that would influence a prudent, solvent business man in the sale of similar vessels or property which he is not forced to sell."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. HARDY of Texas) there were 35 ayes and 64 noes.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. OLIVER: Amend section 1 by adding the following proviso: "Provided, however, That the ship known as the Leviathan, now being reconditioned, shall be not sold for a price less than the cost for reconconditioning said vessel."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. OLIVER) there were—ayes 54, noes 57.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, on that I demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered, and the Chair appointed Mr. OLIVER and Mr. EDMONDS to act as tellers.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 81, noes 78.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BLANTON: Page 2, line 25, insert the following after the word "security":

"Provided, however, That no employee of the Government shall in any way be interested as a vendee in any purchase made from the Shipping Board."

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, there is no objection to that amendment.

Mr. MONDELL. That is the law already.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. (a) Section 7 of the merchant marine act, 1920, is amended by inserting after the first proviso thereof the following: "Provided further, That domestic communities primarily interested in such lines shall be understood to mean the geographical divisions of the coast lines of the United States known as the North Atlantic, South Atlantic, Gulf, and Pacific coasts, together with the particular ports from which such lines may run or be intended to run, and the territorial regions and zones naturally tributary to such ports and coastal divisions: Provided further, That the board shall not for the period of two years after the enactment of the merchant marine act, 1922, sell such vessels to persons other than those who have the support, financial and otherwise, of the domestic communities primarily interested in such lines:"

(b) Such section is further amended by adding at the end thereof a new paragraph to read as follows:

"It is hereby declared to be the policy of Congress to discourage monopoly in the American merchant marine, and, in pursuance of this policy, the board is directed, in the development of its sales policy, to continue as far as possible and practicable, subject to the provisions of this section, all existing steamship routes and regular services and to endeavor in every way to bring about the permanent establishment of such routes and services, and their retention, as far as possible, in the hands of persons having the support, financial and otherwise, of the domestic communities primarily interested in such routes and services. In carrying out the provisions of this section the board is directed to investigate fully all matters in connection therewith and to conduct hearings at which the persons interested in such communities may have the opportunity to express their views as to the course to be pursued by the board and the methods to be adopted in carrying out the policy herein prescribed."

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee: Page 3, line 7, after the word "mean," strike out the following: "the geographical divisions of the coast lines of the United States known as the North Atlantic, South Atlantic, Gulf, and Pacific coasts, together with."

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, by striking out the words proposed to be stricken out by this amendment it will leave the definition to read as follows:

That domestic communities primarily interested in such lines shall be understood to mean the particular ports from which such lines may run or be intended to run, and the territorial regions and zones naturally tributary to such ports.

That would constitute a natural and a correct definition. The language which I propose to strike out is a "joker," and absolutely destroys the pretended purpose of the amendment in the bill. Why do I say that? Simply because the "geographical divisions of the coast lines of the United States" known, for instance, as the North Atlantic and the others specified, goes so far as to permit an absolute nullification of the definition which should be given for the protection of these trade routes. There are several steamship lines that operate boats out of the North Atlantic, the South Atlantic, and the Gulf, or out of two of those, and under the provisions here if they operated one boat out of the Gulf they would be authorized to purchase any boat operating out of any Gulf port, even though their office be in New York and they operated out of the North Atlantic also. Therefore, this joker is for the purpose of permitting certain big lines, with offices in New York, to gobble up some of those little lines operating out of the Gulf and the South Atlantic. The other side will be put to the test on whether or not they are in favor of that, whether they want to strike the joker out and leave the natural meaning. This is very important and has been agitated by the Middle West and the Northwest as well as the South by witnesses who have appeared before the committee and who say if it is not safeguarded they are against this bill. The Middle West Merchant Marine Association, the Mississippi Valley Association, and numerous other organizations have declared against the bill unless that section is reported as it should be by striking this out and adopting other amendments which will be offered.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I understood in a general way that the Mississippi Valley Association had suggested this language.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. No. I will say to my friend that the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] will later offer the identical amendment that the Mississippi Valley Association and others have offered and asked the committee to adopt, and it is widely different in many respects from the language which was adopted by the majority of the committee. The majority of the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries recognized the importance of this, and in their report on this bill they used this language:

During the hearings, representatives of the Middle West and the South Atlantic expressed themselves as apprehensive that the sales policy of the board might be such as to vest control of the board's tonnage in the hands of monopolistic interests so as to work eventually to the detriment of the shippers of the Middle West, and possibly undo the work done by the United States Shipping Board in building up adequate services from all American ports. The committee recognized clearly the need of insuring that all sections of the country be afforded adequate water transportation facilities, and while believing that the danger of monopoly in cargo lines is not as great as is feared, nevertheless agreed that adequate guaranties should be incorporated in the bill to remove all doubt upon the point.

They have made a pretense of meeting the situation, but as any man can see by reading the language, the language which I propose to strike out absolutely destroys the very purpose which they claim to be wanting to serve. It could not be inserted for any other purpose than that which I have stated, and those who are in favor of protecting all of the ports, those who are in favor of protecting all of the trade routes, and especially those who are interested in protecting the South and also the great Middle West should vote for the amendment and protect and safeguard those sections from monopolistic interests.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Chairman, the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. DAVIS], if adopted, would greatly embarrass, hamper, and restrict the effort to establish a merchant marine serving uniformly all sections of the country. As to the attitude of those persons who are interested in section 7 of the merchant marine act, and supplementary legislation provided for in this bill, I hold in my hand a letter dated June 13, 1922, signed by Mr. Malcolm Stewart, chairman of the Middle West Merchant Marine Association, which speaks for the interests of the shipowners of the Middle West very largely, and in a proposed amendment of section 7, which, in substance, is the amendment carried in this bill, they use exactly the same language in determining the meaning of "domestic communities primarily interested." The effect of the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee would be not to allow service to a community, a geographical division, North Atlantic, South Atlantic, Gulf, and Pacific coasts, together with the ports from which said lines may run or be intended to run, but would restrict the effect of this limitation to every particular port from which at the present time a boat may run.

Manifestly situations may arise in the service from a particular port at which there is a boat at the present time which make it impracticable to continue the service. Section 7 as we have it prohibits, unless the line or boat is put in charge of persons or citizens of the community affected, any sale for two years, giving the people in the community and in that subdivision an opportunity to organize and to take over the operation of their foreign transportation. But to restrict the limitation to particular ports would seriously hamper and render difficult and embarrassing and at times impractical the effort to furnish adequate merchant marine service for all sections to all parts of the world. That is the idea of this bill.

Mr. BRIGGS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. The building up of all lines of service and trade routes from various ports of the United States is one of the prime features of the Jones law of 1920. It is specifically provided there that these lines shall be built up and established, so that in time they may be acquired by the community or ports from which they operate. This provision in section 2 of this bill pretends to be in harmony with such purpose, but it is not because it is limited to geographical divisions of the Atlantic, of the Pacific, and the Gulf, so that if any line operating from any one of the ports along the Atlantic, or any one of the ports along the Pacific, or any one of the ports along the Gulf, they would comply with this provision and deny the people of the other ports and the contiguous territory the right to utilize and acquire the American vessels operating in Shipping Board trade routes established from other ports. My friends, this is one of the most important provisions of this bill. It can not embarrass anybody to have it made clear that domestic communities means the particular ports and territory naturally tributary to them and it can not embarrass the Shipping Board, because the thing itself pretends to leave the impression that lines running from particular ports shall be preserved. Let us see what it says. Amend section 7 of the merchant marine act as follows by providing:

Provided further, That domestic communities primarily interested in such lines shall be understood to mean the geographical divisions of the coast lines of the United States known as the North Atlantic, South Atlantic, Gulf, and Pacific coasts, together with the particular ports from which such lines may run or be intended to run, and the territorial regions and zones naturally tributary to such ports and coastal divisions.

There can be no harm in striking out the language referred to in the pending amendment so as to clearly define that the term "domestic communities" is not limited to coastal geographical zones, and the amendment should be adopted.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, we could not expect gentlemen who are opposed to this bill, and opposed to it in any other form, to be consistent, but I am a little surprised that the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. DAVIS], who continues to endeavor to convey the impression that he wants to be fair about the matter, should become as widely and as wildly inconsistent as he has in a very few moments in his attitude toward the bill. When we considered section 1 the gentleman moved to strike out the words in lines 13 and 14, "including the use or disposition of the vessel by the purchaser." He said it was not wise to give the Shipping Board authority to insist that a certain service should be maintained; that they should have no authority at all. They should not be in a position where they could compel that service from the port or from the section, and he became quite eloquent in trying to explain what an unhappy thing it would be to give the Shipping Board that authority.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. When we came to section 2 he took exactly the opposite position in regard to the authority of the Shipping Board. I will yield.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. I want to state that the gentleman is incorrect. I—

Mr. MONDELL. I did not yield to the gentleman to make a speech.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. We proposed to fix it so as to protect the routes.

Mr. MONDELL. Of course, the gentleman would not mutilate the bill by taking from it the authority it is proposed to give the Shipping Board to insist upon the continuation of the service from the ports. Now, we have reached another provision of the bill where that authority, or direction under that authority, is to the effect that they shall consider services or sections.

They are not to be compelled, this is a general direction to the board, they are not to be compelled to insist that the service from one port to another shall be continued, but it is their duty at least to see that the service from certain sections shall be continued; that is, that they shall continue to have this service on the North Atlantic and shall continue it on the South Atlantic. The gentleman a few minutes ago did not want the Shipping Board to have any discretion in the matter at all, and now he insists that they shall be given authority to require that service, no matter where it may be or what the conditions may be under which the route shall be continued, even though the service from a neighboring port might be more satisfactory and might be a better service to establish. Mr. Chairman, I want to emphasize the shifting attitude; anything to defeat the bill, anything to embarrass the committee, anything to make the bill less effective, less workable, anything to leave it in a condition where it may be attacked and criticized. That is the attitude the gentleman from Tennessee has revealed by his opposition first to section 1 and his opposition now to section 2.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Chairman, I would like to inquire of the gentlemen who are now so solicitous about the Mississippi Valley and the interests associated with the Mississippi Valley Association if they have any information later than June 13, 1922, with reference to their attitude on this matter?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Yes. This is something later than that.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Let us have it.

Mr. BANKHEAD. We will produce that in due season.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. I have it in writing.

Mr. BANKHEAD. What is your writing that you refer to?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. This is a letter from the chairman of the Middle West Merchant Marine Committee.

Mr. BANKHEAD. What does he say?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. I will tell you what he says. He asks for an amendment, and he proposes exactly the thing that is in the bill. I will read to you what he proposes, and I will ask you to follow the language in the bill and see if there is any difference. This is from a letter of the president of the Middle West Merchant Marine. He requested the following amendment:

Provided further, That "domestic communities primarily interested in such lines" shall be understood to mean the geographical divisions of the coast lines of the United States known as the North Atlantic, South Atlantic, Gulf, and Pacific coasts, separately, together with the particular ports from which such lines may run or be intended to run, along with the territorial regions and zones naturally tributary to such ports and coastal divisions.

That is the amendment that was requested by the Middle West Merchant Marine Committee, and I will state that Mr. Malcolm Stewart, its president, says this amendment has been drawn up by the Middle West Merchant Marine Committee, representatives of the Mississippi Valley Association, and others interested in the Gulf and South Atlantic, as being a document calculated to give them the protection desired in their Middle West amendment. Then in this letter of June 13, 1922, he says:

We hope that no member of your committee will get the impression that the Middle West Merchant Marine Committee is only interested in the Gulf and South Atlantic ports.

The contrary is the case—

We are just as much interested in the smaller ports of the North Atlantic, and we are intensely interested in the Pacific ports.

Now, Mr. Chairman, this organization came before the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries and presented their case and requested certain amendments to the original draft of the bill, and most, if not all, of those amendments are incorporated in the bill. Of course, our friends on the other side wish to improve on what our friends in that section of the country themselves desire.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Yes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. In that case will the gentleman accept in his amendment the actual proposition offered at the hearings by these gentlemen who desire to protect their interests?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Is not this of a later date?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Oh, I do not know what the date is.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. This is of date June 13. What is yours?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I am talking about the official amendment of the proponents of this proposition.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. This letter is of date June 13, 1922.

Mr. BANKHEAD. If the gentleman will remember the date of the appearance of Mr. Stewart before our committee, he will have the exact date.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Have you the exact date?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I have not, I will say to the gentleman.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. That is of date May 27. This is June 13.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the "noes" have it.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. A division, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. A division is demanded.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 38, noes 80.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. BRIGGS. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BRIGGS: Page 3, line 14, strike out the word "two" and insert the word "five."

Mr. BRIGGS. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, this amendment extends the time from two years, as fixed in the bill, to five years, in which domestic communities may acquire the lines on trade routes now operated by the Shipping Board. When this matter was up for consideration by the joint committee, delegations from the Middle West, delegations from the South Atlantic, and delegations from the Gulf appeared and insisted that under existing conditions and prospects they could not hope within less than five years to obtain the financial support which would enable the domestic communities to invest in and take over the Shipping Board service. They came before that committee and—

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRIGGS. Yes.

Mr. BUTLER. This postpones the sale of the ships for five years—your amendment would do that?

Mr. BRIGGS. This simply gives the local community an opportunity within five years in which to purchase the lines.

Mr. BUTLER. I am not contentious at all.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. That refers to the ships that are now running?

Mr. BRIGGS. Yes; the services that are now being operated.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRIGGS. Yes.

Mr. SNELL. Does the gentleman think it expedient for the country to extend the limit of the present operations until five years, when we are trying to cut down the expenses and get rid of the expense of this Government ownership and operation?

Mr. BRIGGS. In answer to that I will say that your committee thought it well to extend it at least for two years. The discussion in the committee indicated that if you would turn this fleet over to-day to buyers, although they might buy it for nothing, they would have to tie up the ships until ocean trade revived. The contention made by these sections of the country, by the South Atlantic, by the Gulf, and by the Middle West, was that it would take them five years to obtain the financial support necessary to maintain these services, which they felt are valuable to the communities they are serving—the contiguous territory, embracing largely the Gulf States, the South Atlantic States, and the Middle West—and building up an American merchant marine.

Mr. SNELL. Would not two years be a reasonable time in which to take the ships over? It seems that the intention of the bill is to cut off the expense now borne by the Government as speedily as possible.

Mr. BRIGGS. The section of the Jones Act which is involved here, section 7, declared that it was the purpose to preserve these lines and continue to serve the domestic communities contiguous to them. It was said that two years would not be a reasonable time; that the depression of shipping was so great that you could not hope to interest the people in buying within that time. Therefore, they came before the committee and asked five years.

Mr. SNELL. Could they get the money in five years?

Mr. BRIGGS. The question was not so much buying the boats as running them. Even if you gave the idle boats away, the owners would still have to tie them up until trade revives. You can not keep the idle ships in operation until world trade revives. The greatest depression the world has ever known prevails at the present time.

Mr. SNELL. I am talking about ships that are in existence, ships that are being operated at the present time. Are we not talking about ships that are owned and operated by the Government at the present time?

Mr. BRIGGS. Most assuredly.

Mr. SNELL. Then they are being operated.

Mr. BRIGGS. The lines are being operated, but, my friend, as you have emphasized, along with others I think, the lines are not yet a paying proposition. Money is being lost all over the world, in private operation as well as by the Shipping Board. Mr. Lasker stated in the hearing that the Government to-day is giving as fine operation and fine service as is being given in private operation, and the private operators who testified before that committee said that they were losing money on a part of their service and making only a little on the other. This amendment of five years, instead of two years, carries out strictly the purposes of the Jones law enacted in 1920.

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Chairman, answering the gentleman, I should like to say that I have always believed in consistency. The principal losses of the Shipping Board to-day come in those lines that the gentleman wants to perpetuate under MO4 contracts, and that some gentleman in his home town wants to perpetuate under MO4 contracts. We are trying to economize. The opposition have been talking about economizing and about wanting the interests of the Government safeguarded. We want the interests of the Government safeguarded. We went into this matter thoroughly. Only last night Mr. Lasker told me the principal losses of the Shipping Board were made in their effort to establish these lines on the Gulf.

Mr. BRIGGS. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. EDMONDS. Yes.

Mr. BRIGGS. The gentleman has said I am in favor of the MO4 contracts. I never expressed myself in favor of them; but I want to say that the chairman of the Shipping Board, after denouncing MO4 contracts, held that they are the only things under which those lines can be kept in service.

Mr. EDMONDS. The gentleman knows as well as I do that if those lines are continued they must be continued under something like the MO4 contracts.

Mr. BUTLER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EDMONDS. Yes.

Mr. BUTLER. You gentlemen of the committee are very familiar with these things. What is a MO4 contract?

Mr. EDMONDS. A contract where the agent takes the boat and gets a commission for handling the boat and also gets a commission for getting freight to the boat, and if the boats goes out half full, the Government pays the bill, because the agent has no interest as to whether the boat has a full cargo or not. If two years from now the Government wishes to extend this privilege, it can do so. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this section and the amendments thereto be now closed.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I hope the gentleman will not insist on that. I have a substitute that I want to offer for the whole section.

Mr. EDMONDS. My motion does not prevent the gentleman from offering amendments. It simply closes debate on the amendments.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I hope the gentleman will allow a little debate.

Mr. EDMONDS. Then, Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in 10 minutes, 5 minutes on one side and 5 minutes on the other.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania moves that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in 10 minutes.

The question being taken, the motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BRIGGS].

The question being taken, the amendment was rejected.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I offer a substitute for the section.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BANKHEAD: Page 3, line 6, after the word "further," strike out all to and including the word "services" on line 6, page 4, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"It is hereby declared to be the policy of Congress to discourage monopoly in the American merchant marine. In pursuance of this policy the provisions of section 7 of the merchant marine act 1920 are specifically reaffirmed, and the board is directed in the development of its sales policy to continue as far as possible all existing steamship routes and regular services and to retain them in the hands of persons that have the support, financial and otherwise, of the domestic communities primarily interested in such routes, and every effort shall be made to organize or enlarge local companies to purchase or operate vessels in these routes. If in the judgment of the board at the expiration of five years from the coming into force of this act vessels of the board can not be sold to persons that have the support, financial and otherwise, of the domestic communities primarily interested in such routes to maintain such routes and services, the board may transfer such routes and services to such other persons, citizens of the United States of America, who can and will purchase vessels and continue the operation of such routes and services."

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, this substitute presents fairly and squarely the deliberate attitude of the great commercial organizations of the Mississippi Valley and of the Gulf and South Atlantic ports as presented to our committee in the hearings in the month of May. So anxious were these gentlemen to undertake to avoid the existence of a monopoly in shipping on the Atlantic seaboard, to the detriment of their business interests in failing to provide adequate export shipping facilities, that Mr. Malcolm Stewart and Mr. Matthew Hale, as representatives of these two great sections of the country, came before our committee and presented this formal amendment, and both of them stated upon cross-examination by me that if the provisions of this amendment were not incorporated in the pending bill they could not give support to the measure.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CHINDBLOM] has referred to a letter written in June by Mr. Malcolm Stewart. I do not know what particular pressure was brought to bear on Mr. Malcolm Stewart with reference to this matter, if any; but I can not understand why in the short lapse of time from May until some time in June the fundamental arguments upon which Mr. Stewart based his claim before our committee and the facts upon which they were based could have been changed. I hold in my hand here a letter addressed to Judge DAVIS, dated November 20, 1922, from Mr. Malcolm Stewart, in which this expression occurs:

The Middle West is discriminated against very greatly in ocean freight rates when shipping out of any other seaport except the North Atlantic for business destined to United Kingdom, continental Europe, and Mediterranean ports. We can render great assistance to the American merchant marine and at the same time secure for ourselves fair and equitable freight rates out of all our seaports if we act together and join our forces in demanding what is essential for our best interest.

These gentlemen asserted to us and their argument was when they appeared before the committee—and it is as sound now as it was then—that it would be impossible within the limited period of two years as provided by the bill for the interest of the great Mississippi Valley, the South Atlantic, and the Gulf ports to build up a sufficient interest of maritime affairs to get citizens to invest in private ownership in the necessary trade routes. He asserts that it is a discrimination against the Middle West in requiring her freight to be exported from the Atlantic seaboard.

That issue is fairly presented by this amendment. We propose a period of five years if necessary in order to maintain and establish the routes now in existence by action of the Shipping Board, and in order to give a reasonable time in which domestic communities interested may build up an interest in shipping affairs so as to extend and invest their means in this enterprise.

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Yes.

Mr. SNELL. Is not the effect of the gentleman's amendment the same as that offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BRIGGS], extending for a longer period the inefficient Government ownership and the operation of these ships?

Mr. BANKHEAD. The effect of it as far as the time is the same, but there are other benefits proposed in my amendment which were not incorporated in the amendment of the gentleman from Texas. The gentleman has asked the question, and I want to say, as I undertook to argue in the speech that I made in general debate, that a great deal of this expense can be saved by abolishing the MO4 contracts for the operation of vessels under the Shipping Board and substituting therefor direct operation by the Government under competent shipping men.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Chairman, in the language of the act sought to be stricken out by the gentleman will be found the following in line 21. This is what they propose to strike out and then insert substantially the same language in another place to authorize the continuance of the Government operation of these vessels:

It is hereby declared to be the policy of Congress to discourage monopoly in the American merchant marine, and in pursuance of this policy the board is directed, in the development of its sales policy, to continue as far as possible and practicable, subject to the provisions of this section, all existing steamship routes and regular services, and to endeavor in every way to bring about the permanent establishment of such routes and services, and their retention, as far as possible, in the hands of persons having the support, financial and otherwise, of the domestic communities primarily interested in such routes and services.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Will the gentleman yield for a brief question?

Mr. LEHLBACH. No; I have not said anything yet.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I agree with the gentleman. [Laughter.]

Mr. LEHLBACH. I merely read what is in the bill and what the gentleman wishes to strike out. It is the unanimous desire of those who are proponents of the legislation to have the existing service in all sections of the country continued; to protect the sections by selling boats in all parts and sections of the country to be operated by private persons by private capital. In order to insure what the law directs, that preference in the sale of these ships must be given to citizens of a community that are to be served by them, no sales to anybody but those citizens can be made for two years after the enactment of the law. But what we want to do is to sell the ships to private owners. The gentleman wants the Government to hold the ships and continue to operate them for five years. It is only another way to seek to continue the Government ownership and prevent their being put into private hands.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Fess). The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BANKHEAD) there were 52 ayes and 82 noes.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk continued with the reading of the bill, as follows:

INSURANCE.

SEC. 3. Section 9 of the merchant marine act, 1920, is amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 9. That if the terms and conditions of any sale of a vessel made under the provisions of this act include deferred payments of the purchase price, the board shall require, as a part of such terms and conditions, in order to protect and secure the equity of the United States for such unpaid purchase money, that the purchaser of the vessel and his successor in title shall keep the same insured (a) against loss or damage by fire, and against marine risks and disasters, and war and other risks if the board so specifies, with such insurance companies, associations or underwriters, or with the separate insurance fund to the extent authorized by section 10 of this act, and under such forms of policies, and to such an amount, as the board may prescribe or approve; and (b) by protection and indemnity insurance if the board so specifies, with such insurance companies, associations or underwriters, or with the separate insurance fund to the extent authorized by section 10 of this act, and under such forms of policies, and to such an amount as the board may prescribe or approve. The insurance required to be carried under this section shall be made payable to the board and/or to the parties as interest may appear. The board is authorized to enter into any agreement that it deems wise in respect to the payment and/or the guarantee of premiums of insurance."

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, in order to ask the chairman a question. Why is it that they use here two conjunctives "and, or" at the end of line 10?

Mr. EDMONDS. Because it is the usual language in insurance matters. All charters and marine policies contain it. I have no objection to the gentleman taking out either one or the other. It is admiralty language and insurance language, and I can see no objection to leaving it in. It is perfectly well understood in legal circles.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. It is funny language.

Mr. EDMONDS. It may look funny to the gentleman, but it is the usual language in admiralty and insurance matters.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Sec. 5. Section 11 of the merchant marine act, 1920, is amended to read as follows:

"Sec. 11. (a) That there is hereby established in the Treasury a revolving fund to be known as the 'United States Shipping Board construction loan fund' (hereinafter in this section called the 'loan fund'). There shall be covered into the loan fund all moneys which at the time of the enactment of the merchant marine act, 1922, are in the fund created by this section as in force before its amendment by such act; and the board may set aside and cover into the loan fund all receipts of the board, except appropriations made by law and profits of the board from the operation of vessels; but the total amount of moneys covered into the loan fund (other than payments upon the principal and interest upon loans made therefrom) shall not exceed $125,000,000.

"(b) The board may use the loan fund, to such extent as it deems necessary, for making loans to aid persons, citizens of the United States, (1) in the construction by them in private shipyards of the United States of vessels of the best and most efficient type equipped with the most efficient and the most economical machinery and commercial appliances, or (2) in the equipping by them of vessels already built with such machinery and commercial appliances.

"(c) No loan shall be made for a longer time than 15 years. All loans shall bear interest, payable at least annually, upon the unpaid principal at a rate not less than 2 per cent per annum. No loan shall be made, (1) in the case of a loan for construction purposes, for a greater sum than two-thirds of the cost of the vessel to be constructed; nor, (2) in the case of a loan for equipment purposes, for a greater sum than two-thirds of the cost of the equipment or two-thirds of the value of the vessel when thus reequipped, whichever is the lesser. The board shall require such security for the loan, including a first lien upon the entire interest in the vessel with reference to which the loan is made, as it deems necessary in order to insure the repayment of the loan with interest. In case of a loan under this section made after the enactment of the merchant marine act, 1922, all payments upon the principal and interest of the loan shall be covered into the loan fund."

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 7, line 12, after the word "than," strike out the figure "2" and insert in lieu thereof "43."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I offer the further amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee: Page 7, line 10, after the word "than," strike out "15 years" and insert in lieu thereof the following: "a period within 15 years after the date of the enactment of this measure. This entire loan fund, including the interest collected thereon, shall be covered into the General Treasury of the United States within 16 years after the enactment of this measure."

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, it is contended by the opponents of this bill that it is permanent legislation, that it is intended to be, and that that will so result. While some of the proponents of the bill have argued that it is only a temporary proposition, yet that is an issue which this amendment will put to the test. The bill as now written authorizes a revolving fund of $125,000,000, which may be loaned to any individual or corporation for a period of 15 years at a time. It may be loaned and reloaned. There is no time limitation whatever upon the fund under the provisions of the bill as they now exist. My amendment, if adopted, would limit the authorization for these loans for a period of 15 years from the date of the passage of the bill and provide that within 16 years after the passage of the bill the entire fund shall be covered into the General Treasury. That gives a year after the expiration of any loan which may have been made within which the Shipping Board or other authorities may collect the loans and pay them into the General Treasury. If this is a temporary proposition, if it is not intended to make these loans for a longer period than 15 years, this amendment should be adopted. If it is the purpose to continue loaning and reloaning for an indefinite period of time, we should know it, and we will determine what the purpose of the majority is by the vote on this amendment.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. I want to know, and that is the reason for my question, how much of the $125,000,000 is to be taken out at once? Therefore I ask the question whether the gentleman can give me some idea as to what moneys at this time are available, as provided in this section?

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. The Jones bill, enacted in 1920, provided that $25,000,000 should be set aside for loans out of the sales of ships, and so forth, the receipts of the Shipping Board. This bill provides that the accrued amounts, and also up to an amount of $125,000,000, shall be paid into this fund, and they can obtain additional funds from the sale of ships or any securities or other properties belonging to the Shipping Board.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. The language of the bill is:

There shall be covered into the loan fund all moneys which at the time of the enactment of the merchant marine act, 1922, are in the fund created by this section as in force before its amendment by such act.

What amount of that character is now in hand?

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. I do not know, and you can not get anything out of the Shipping Board. That is within their keeping. I can not answer the question.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Can the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. EDMONDS] give us some idea as to about what amount is now in hand that would go toward the creation of the total fund of $125,000,000?

Mr. EDMONDS. As near as I can find out there is very little money in the Treasury now.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Then it means that $125,000,000 is to be segregated from the Treasury at once?

Mr. EDMONDS. If they can not sell $125,000,000 worth of ships they can not get it out of the Treasury in any other way.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. It is the fact that they have other securities and property which they can sell and use for this purpose.

Mr. EDMONDS. They can use any property they have to create the fund. As I understand the matter, the Shipping Board has been selling some property, and there was a certain amount of that money set aside by the Committee on Appropriations for the payment of claims. These claims have been rapidly cleaned up, and it is just possible there may be a little money in the Treasury to-day; but I doubt very much whether it will be held subject to this particular fund, although in the Jones Act we had arranged for a fund of that character—up to $125,000,000 a year for five years.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee) there were—ayes 29, noes 71.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate upon the section and all amendments thereto be now closed.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, will not the gentleman allow us a few minutes debate? I shall move to strike out the section in order to make one or two observations.

Mr. MONDELL. On this section?

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Yes.

Mr. MONDELL. How much time does the gentleman desire?

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Of course, I shall claim only five minutes.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I modify my motion that debate close in 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Wyoming that all debate upon this section and all amendments thereto close in 10 minutes.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the section.

The CHAIRMAN. The clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. MOORE of Virginia: Strike out all of section 5.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, the purpose of the section is to create a fund to be used in the construction of vessels at private yards, to assist in their construction. The amount mentioned, as just indicated, is $125,000,000, which is to constitute a revolving fund. The Jones Act contains a provision somewhat similar to this, but limits the amount to a total of $125,000,000 to be used at the rate of $25,000,000 a year, and makes certain provisions that were very carefully considered at the time that statute was enacted. It seems to me that the Jones Act goes quite far enough in appropriating money, however to be derived, which is the money of the public, for the purpose of assisting in the construction of new vessels. If the bill as it stands is passed, it will require not the using of $25,000,000 a year, which is somewhat leisurely, but the use of $125,000,000 as soon as it can be gotten in by the Shipping Board from the sale of vessels, from the collection of claims, and otherwise.

It strikes me that is going pretty far and pretty fast, particularly in view of the fact, as is well known, that the Treasury is not in a very fortunate condition at this time. The Government is facing a deficit; it faces an accrued deficit and it faces a constantly accruing deficit. Only this morning the statement was published that for the last fiscal year the revenue is $1,400,000,000 less than the preceding fiscal year. Now, if the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Appropriations is here—I do not know whether he is here or not—I would like to know if he gives his indorsement to the pending proposition. The other day one of the prime reasons given for the enactment of this measure is that it would enable the Government to get ready for possible war; that is to say, a large amount of money is to be spent in building ships which will be of assistance in case of an emergency—$125,000,000. Now, it is a very curious thing that almost at the time when we propose to do this we have provided for scrapping war vessels. We are to scrap war vessels, assuming that the treaty is going to be ratified by Italy and France, to the extent of several hundreds of millions of dollars—no one states even approximately how much—and in addition from $70,000,000 to $150,000,000 is to be spent to make good damages to contractors sustained because of the cessation of work upon Government vessels. That is a strange situation. On the one hand, declaring that we think there is little fear of war, we are prepared to scrap property that is worth hundreds of millions of dollars and besides pay large damages, and on the other hand in order to get ready for war, which is one of the main purposes of this bill, we are going to put the Government in business to the extent of assisting in the construction of new vessels.

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Chairman, again I must call the attention of the committee to the consistency of gentlemen on the other side. The gentleman gets up and proposes to strike out this section. It leaves the section in the Jones bill in existence. There is no limit of interest to be charged by the Shipping Board. There is no arrangement of a 15-year loan. The Shipping Board can loan out that money, $125,000,000, $25,000,000 a year for five years. The committee thought the proper thing to do was to put some limitation on the power of the Shipping Board. Gentlemen on the other side have been complaining all morning that we give the Shipping Board too much power, and now they want to give more. There is only one difference, and that is in regard to encouraging the placing of Diesel engines on ships that they will build and equip them with new and improved machinery.

Mr. FREAR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EDMONDS. I will.

Mr. FREAR. How much money is placed in the revolving fund under the Jones bill?

Mr. EDMONDS. $25,000,000 a year for five years.

Mr. FREAR. How much is there at the present time?

Mr. EDMONDS. I do not know; I do not imagine very much.

Mr. FREAR. This bill provides $125,000,000.

Mr. EDMONDS. Just exactly the same sum of money as was placed in the Jones bill.

Mr. FREAR. Does not the gentleman think he should place certain restrictions upon the expenditure of such an enormous sum of money?

Mr. EDMONDS. That is what we do; we have put restrictions, but the gentleman wants the Shipping Board left open to do as they please.

Mr. FREAR. I do not want it.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Nobody objects to putting the restrictions on the way in which the fund is to be handled. My objection was on the use of the $125,000,000; that is the central objection I respectfully urge upon the chairman.

Mr. EDMONDS. The gentleman wants restrictions and does not want restrictions; I do not know how to please him.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. That is a limitation rather than an enlargement of the Jones Act.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I have a perfecting amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. JONES of Texas: Page 7, line 22, after the word "interest," insert the following: "and the board shall require annual payments on the principal of any loan in amounts sufficient to cover not less than the depreciation of the vessel up to the time of any such payment."

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Virginia to strike out the section.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk began reading.

During the reading—

Mr. BLANTON. Will the Chair permit a parliamentary inquiry?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman can not interrupt the reading.

Mr. BLANTON. The reading will go along until the entire bill is read under the ruling of the Chair?

The CHAIRMAN. Only the section which the Clerk is now reading.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 6. (a) Section 24 of the merchant marine act, 1920, is amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 24. That all mails of the United States shipped or carried on vessels shall, if practicable, be shipped or carried on American-built vessels documented under the laws of the United States. No contract hereafter made with the Postmaster General for carrying mails on vessels so built and documented shall be assigned or sublet, and no mails covered by such contract shall be carried on any vessel not so built and documented. No money shall be paid out of the Treasury of the United States on or in relation to any such contract for carrying mails on vessels so built and documented when such contract has been assigned or sublet or when mails covered by such contract are in violation of the terms thereof carried on any vessel not so built and documented."

(b) Section 7 of the merchant marine act, 1920, is amended by striking out so much thereof as reads as follows: "The Postmaster General is authorized, notwithstanding the act entitled 'An act to provide for ocean mail service between the United States and foreign ports, and to promote commerce,' approved March 3, 1891, to contract for the carrying of the mails over such lines at such price as may be agreed upon by the board and the Postmaster General."

(c) The act entitled "An act to provide for ocean mail service between the United States and foreign ports, and to promote commerce," approved March 3, 1891, is repealed.

TITLE II.—TAXATION.

INCOME TAX OF VESSEL OWNERS.

SEC. 201. Title II of the revenue act of 1921 is amended by adding at the end thereof seven new sections to read as follows:

"EXEMPTIONS TO VESSEL OWNERS.

"SEC. 265. (a) That the owner of a vessel of 1,500 gross tons or more (as shown on her certificate of admeasurement), registered, or enrolled and licensed, under the laws of the United States, shall, for the taxable year 1921 and for each of the eight taxable years following, be allowed as a deduction in computing net income, in addition to other deductions allowed by law, an amount which bears the same ratio to his net income during the taxable year attributable to the operations of such vessel (computed without the benefit of this section) as his gross income attributable to the foreign operations of such vessel bears to his entire gross income attributable to the operations of such vessel: Provided, That in no case shall the amount by which the taxes imposed by this act are diminished by reason of such deduction, exceed 50 per cent of the amount certified under clause (1) of subdivision (b) of this section, plus 100 per cent of the amount certified under clause (2) of subdivision (b) of this section.

"(b) Such deduction shall not be allowed unless the United States Shipping Board (hereinafter in this title referred to as the 'board') has certified to the commissioner (1) the amount invested by the taxpayer, after the beginning of the taxable year for which the deduction is claimed and prior to the time fixed by law for filing the return, in the building in private shipyards in the United States of new vessels of a type and kind approved by the board, to be registered, or enrolled and licensed, under the laws of the United States, and (2) the amount set aside by the taxpayer after the beginning of the taxable year for which the deduction is claimed and prior to the time fixed by law for filing the return, in a trust fund for investment in the building in private shipyards in the United States of new vessels of a type and kind approved by the board, to be registered, or enrolled and licensed, under the laws of the United States.

"(c) As soon as practicable after the filing of the return for the taxable year for which the deduction is claimed, the amount by which the taxes imposed by this act are diminished by reason of the deduction allowed under subdivision (a) of this section shall be determined by the commissioner with the approval of the Secretary and certified by the latter to the board. The commissioner shall notify the taxpayer, who may immediately withdraw from such trust fund the amount, if any, by which the amount set aside in such trust funds exceeds the amount which should have been so set aside, together with the ratable part of the interest on or earnings from such trust fund since the date of its establishment.

"(d) For the purposes of this section there shall be deemed attributable to the foreign operations of a vessel so much of the gross income attributable to the operations of such vessel as is attributable to the carriage of passengers, cargo, and mails taken on board at a port not in the coastwise trade and discharged at a port whether or not in the coastwise trade, or taken on board at a port whether or not in the coastwise trade and discharged at a port not in the coastwise trade. If the owner of the vessel uses it in whole or in part for the transportation of his own property, his gross income attributable to the operations of the vessel in transporting such property shall be considered to be such amount as is determined by the board, and certified by it to the commissioner, as representing the fair value of the services performed by the vessel in transporting such property.

"(e) In no case shall the amount by which the tax due from a taxpayer, other than a corporation, is diminished by reason of the deduction allowed by this section, exceed the amount by which the tax would have been diminished if such taxpayer were a corporation.

"(f) That portion of the amount of invested capital attributable to the vessel which bears the same ratio to such invested capital as the amount allowed as a deduction under the provisions of this section bears to the amount of the entire net income for the taxable year attributable to the operations of such vessel (computed without the benefit of this section) shall be regarded as an inadmissible asset in computing the tax imposed by Title III of this act.

"Sec. 266. (a) That in the case of the sale, during the taxable year 1921 or any of the eight taxable years following, of a vessel launched prior to January 1, 1914, which was at the time of the enactment of the merchant marine act, 1922, registered, enrolled, or licensed, under the laws of the United States, and which at no time thereafter, up to the time of sale, was under a foreign registry or flag (or, in case of sale made prior to the enactment of such act, was at the time of the sale registered, enrolled, or licensed under the laws of the United States), the taxable gain derived from the sale shall be allowed as a deduction (in addition to other deductions allowed by law) in computing the net income of the owner, if he is a citizen of the United States within the meaning of the shipping act, 1916, as amended by the merchant marine act, 1920. Except as provided in subdivision (b) this deduction shall not be allowed unless (after the beginning of the taxable year for which the deduction is claimed and prior to the time fixed by law for filing the return) the entire proceeds of the sale have been invested by the taxpayer, or set aside by him in a trust fund for investment, in the building in private shipyards in the United States of new vessels of a type and kind approved by the board, to be registered, or enrolled and licensed, under the laws of the United States.

"(b) If a part only of the proceeds of the sale has been so invested or set aside in a trust fund the amount of the deduction allowed under subdivision (a) shall be an amount which bears the same ratio to the taxable gain derived from the sale as the part of the proceeds so invested or set aside in a trust fund bears to the entire proceeds of the sale.

"(c) Upon the completion of the new vessel or vessels they shall, for the purposes of sections 202, 214, and 234, be treated as taking the place of a like proportion of the vessel sold.

"(d) Where a vessel is exchanged for property, or for money and property, the transaction shall, for the purposes of this section, be deemed to be a sale with reference to (1) the money received in the exchange, and (2) that part of the property received in the exchange which, under the provisions of subdivisions (c) and (e) of section 202, is considered in determining the taxable gain from the exchange.

"Sec. 267. (a) That if a taxpayer establishes a trust fund for investment under the provisions of section 265 or 266, the amount so set aside under section 266, or an amount equal to 200 per cent of the amount set aside under section 265, as the case may be, shall be actually invested by the taxpayer, within a reasonable time, to be determined by the board, in the building in private shipyards in the United States of new vessels of a type and kind approved by the board, to be registered or enrolled and licensed under the laws of the United States. Upon failure to invest all or any part of such amount within the reasonable time fixed by the board, or upon failure to register or enroll and license, the new vessel or vessels under the laws of the United States within a reasonable time fixed by the board, the board shall immediately notify the commissioner, and (1) the amount which should have been invested under the provisions of section 266 and this section which is not so invested, or the amount invested in a vessel or vessels not registered or enrolled and licensed under the laws of the United States, shall be deemed, for the purposes of section 266, to have never been set aside in a trust fund for investment, and (2) 50 per cent of the amount which should have been invested under the provisions of section 265 and this section which is not so invested, or 50 per cent of the amount invested in a vessel or vessels not registered or enrolled and licensed under the laws of the United States, shall be deemed, for the purposes of section 265, to have never been set aside in a trust fund for investment. Any additional tax due by reason of this adjustment of the amount set aside in the trust fund for investment under sections 265 and 266, together with interest thereon at the rate of one-half of 1 per cent per month from the time the tax was due, shall be payable upon demand at any time, notwithstanding the provisions of section 250. The amount in the trust fund shall be first applied in payment of such additional tax due, and the instrument creating the trust fund shall provide for such application.

"(b) Whenever the taxpayer establishes a trust fund for investment under the provisions of section 265 or 266, the interest on or earnings from the amount set aside in such fund shall belong to the fund, and, for the purposes of subdivision (a) of this section, shall be considered as being a part of the amount set aside in the fund.

"Sec. 268. That the commissioner may require a taxpayer, who claims the benefit of the deduction allowed by section 265 or 266 and establishes a trust fund for investment, to furnish a bond with such security or surety as the commissioner shall require, for an amount not less than the difference between (1) the estimated income, war-profits and excess-profits taxes that would have been payable but for the deduction claimed under those sections, and (2) the estimated income, war-profits and excess-profits taxes that would be payable if such deduction were allowed. Such bond shall be conditioned upon (a) the investment of the fund in accordance with the provisions of section 267, or the payment of the tax, together with interest, due by reason of failure to so invest, and (b) the registering, or enrolling and licensing, of the new vessels under the laws of the United States within the time fixed by the board.

"Sec. 269. (a) That the amount invested under the provisions of sections 265, 266, or 267, or set aside in a trust fund for investment under the provisions of sections 265 or 266, must be from funds other than any loan which the taxpayer may have received from the board under the provisions of section 11 of the merchant marine act, 1920, as amended by the merchant marine act, 1922.

"(b) So much of sections 265 and 266 as requires that the investment, or the setting aside of an amount in a trust fund for investment, shall be made prior to the time fixed by law for filing the return for the taxable year for which the deduction is claimed, shall be deemed complied with by a taxpayer with respect to the deduction for a taxable year ending prior to the time of the enactment of the merchant marine act, 1922, if he makes such investment, or sets aside such amount in a trust fund, within 75 days after the enactment of such act.

"Sec. 270. That section 265 and section 266 shall be deemed to have been in force on January 1, 1921.

"Sec. 271. That the benefits of section 265 and section 266 shall be allowed to the members of a partnership and the beneficiaries of an estate or trust under regulations prescribed by the commissioner, with the approval of the Secretary."

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. That concludes the reading of the section?

The CHAIRMAN. It does.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. I desire to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee: Page 11, lines 16 to 22, after the word "trade" strike out "If the owner of the vessel uses it in whole or in part for the transportation of his own property his gross income attributable to the operations of the vessel in transporting such property shall be considered to be such amount as is determined by the board, and certified by it to the commissioner, as representing the fair value of the services performed by the vessel in transporting such property."

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, this amendment simply points out the fact that these tax exemptions are extended to those lines, like those of the Standard Oil and the United States Steel and various other lines, that are operating ships in conveying their own products, and not as common carriers; and this motion proposes to strike out that portion recognizing that they are entitled to those tax exemptions.

Mr. SEARS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Florida asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Mr. Chairman, as to the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. DAVIS], I do not think it accomplishes, in the first place, the thing he desires; and in the second place, I do not think the thing he desires to accomplish ought to be accomplished.

This simply lays down for the guidance of the Secretary of the Treasury a rule for putting into effect what appears in other portions of the bill. If you strike it out, it does not destroy the substantial proposition at all, but it leaves the Secretary of the Treasury suspended in the air without any rule for his guidance except as may be otherwise provided in the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. HARDY of Texas rose.

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman from Texas rise?

Mr. HARDY of Texas. To submit a few observations on the amendment. I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. I wish to call attention to the additional fact, not mentioned by my colleague from Tennessee [Mr. DAVIS], that this paragraph evidences the fact that those who own their own transportation facilities, like the Standard Oil and the Steel Trust and the United Fruit Co., are exempted from paying any income tax on the reasonable earnings of their shipping when engaged in carrying their own products, and it also exemplifies the fact that while exempted from taxation they are given a subsidy by the Government of the United States under this bill. It seems to me it all ought to go out.

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania moves to strike out the last two words.

Mr. EDMONDS. This proposal to strike out has nothing to do with the payment of a subsidy to industrial ships. It simply establishes a method by which the Treasury Department can make the deductions in taxes authorized by this House and the Senate under the Jones bill.

Now, what happens here? Under the Jones bill if a man owns a ship he could take from his income tax a certain sum of money, and by doubling the amount of money and putting it into new ship property get an exemption of taxes. There is no exemption of taxes here except for the purposes of building new ships. If he does not build new ships, he does not get the exemption. We all know that. In another case a man may have a ship worth, say, $600,000, and he sells it for $1,000,000. He would be entitled for taxation purposes to count up a profit of $400,000. What are you doing here? You simply say to him, "If you take that whole $1,000,000, the $600,000 of the original cost and the $400,000 profit, and put it in another ship for $1,000,000 we will not charge you any taxes on the $400,000 profit."

As I said this morning, when the proper time comes I am going to offer an amendment in the proper place that will take industrial ships out from the subsidy.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. But the gentleman will concede that this does exempt the Standard Oil and the United States Steel and the United Fruit Co. from the payment of income taxes, provided they would certify that they had invested their income in the purchase of other ships. If this provision is not knocked out they will be entitled to that.

Mr. EDMONDS. Yes. But I do not understand the gentleman's position at all. The Standard Oil Co. is not charged with being discreditable or disgraceful in this country.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EDMONDS. Yes.

Mr. MONDELL. Under the amendment which the gentleman proposes to offer later the Standard Oil tankers would not secure the benefit of the subsidy?

Mr. EDMONDS. No.

Mr. MONDELL. On the other hand, the provision which the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. DAVIS] now proposes to strike out has no relation whatever to that affair or to that condition of affairs?

Mr. EDMONDS. Absolutely none whatever.

Mr. MONDELL. It simply provides that where there is a ship receiving a certain amount of compensation, as some ship will that may carry some of the products of its owners, the Treasury shall have a method of computation, and this is simply a method of computation?

Mr. EDMONDS. That is all. It is simply to carry out what has been the express decision of the House on the subject.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EDMONDS. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. It is said that the tankers of the Standard Oil Co. will not get the subsidy. The gentleman knows that there is a greater demand for tankers than for any other class of vessels just now. What is there to prevent the Standard Oil from selling its tankers where there is a demand and building new tankers that would come under the provisions of this bill? They would in that case get the subsidy for carrying the oil in their own tankers?

Mr. EDMONDS. Simple business sense would prevent their doing that.

Mr. BLANTON. If they sold the tankers, as they could, they could borrow from the Government at less per cent than it costs us and build new tankers.

Mr. EDMONDS. No; we changed that to 4½ per cent.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. And they can not do that without the consent of the Shipping Board, anyhow.

Mr. FREAR. Since this question of subsidy has been presented, what does the gentleman mean by "subsidy"? Does that run to tax funds?

Mr. EDMONDS. No.

Mr. FREAR. Are the Standard Oil and the United States Steel exempt from the deductions?

Mr. EDMONDS. They will not get yours or mine.

Mr. FREAR. But as they own two-thirds of the vessels, they will get two-thirds of all the profits?

Mr. EDMONDS. Yes; providing they use them for building new ships and put an equal amount of money with the exemption.

Mr. FREAR. Sales and all these other questions are involved?

Mr. EDMONDS. Yes. That is in the Jones Act that the gentleman voted for.

Mr. FREAR. Yes; I voted for the Jones Act, but I did not know what was in it, and two-thirds of the Members were in the same position.

Mr. TINCHER. Mr. Chairman, as I understand, the gentleman from Pennsylvania proposes to offer an amendment to do away with the subsidy provided for in another section for industrial ships. Am I correct in the assumption that this section to which the amendment has been offered is a form of subsidy offered to industrial ships as well as others?

Mr. EDMONDS. To all ships. Will the gentleman allow me to say a word?

Mr. TINCHER. I will yield.

Mr. EDMONDS. It is my opinion that they may not want to set the money aside to build the ships. It may be possible that they may say that they do not want any more ships at this time.

Mr. TINCHER. The point I am making is: Does the gentleman think it is fair to strike out the subsidy for a class in one section and still let that class have the benefit of a distinct subsidy in another section?

Mr. EDMONDS. This is not a subsidy.

Mr. TINCHER. Does not the gentleman think that if you exempt people from the payment of an income tax that that is a subsidy?

Mr. FREAR. Let me ask the gentleman how many millions of dollars will this take—how much is it estimated it will cost?

Mr. EDMONDS. It would depend upon how many wanted to build new ships. That would be very indefinite. I do not think the Treasury Department or anybody else can give any estimate that would be worth anything.

Mr. TINCHER. The gentleman has made some calculation, I suppose; which does the gentleman think would amount to the most, the subsidy provided in this section or the direct subsidy?

Mr. EDMONDS. If they used all the compensation they are allowed for ships and used all the ships I should say the subsidy would be the greater amount. I assume that the compensation would amount to the greater sum.

Mr. TINCHER. Is there any way of arriving at it?

Mr. EDMONDS. I think there is no question but that the compensation would amount to the greater sum.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. How does the gentleman know it when not a single representative of the Shipping Board would say how much this tax exemption, or any tax exemption, would impose as a burden upon the Public Treasury?

Mr. EDMONDS. Oh, nobody knows; there is nothing to show in any way how to compute it. Suppose the Standard Oil Co. says, "We do not want any more ships; we have more than we want." Then they pay their taxes and do not take any tax exemption.

Mr. TINCHER. Is there any difference in principle between authorizing a subsidy to be paid in cash to an industrial ship or a subsidy in the way of a rebate in taxes to the ships engaged in their own interests; is there any difference in principle?

Mr. WHITE of Maine. There is this difference, that in the case of the subsidy the money is a direct payment by the United States Treasury. In this case it may be that the Standard Oil Co. will not want to construct any new vessels.

Mr. TINCHER. Is it not true that a subsidy paid directly out of the Treasury is more American than a rebate graft?

Mr. FREAR. Both of them come out of the Treasury.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that the gentleman from Kansas has thrown a good deal of light on this proposition. As I gather from the statement of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, if any concern is in the shipping business and it is profitable and they want to build more ships, then it will set aside a fund and avoid its income tax and thereby build for a more profitable business. If it is not profitable, it will pay the tax and quit.

Let us look at it from the standpoint of the farmer. The President said he was in favor of helping out the farmers right away. Now, take a farmer who makes a good deal of money—I know that is a rash proposition, but he sometimes does—give him the same privilege and he will say, All right; I will set aside $10,000 and buy another farm and produce more farming products; but you must exempt me from taxation on the money invested if I am going to get another farm and run it." That is the same proposition you are putting up here. If a man wants to take the money, if he is doing a profitable business, we will exempt him from taxation provided he will invest it in another concern and will continue to make more money. It is a premium offered to the man who wants to avoid taxation by making more money for himself. The President stated that he wanted to take care of the farmers. I would like to see you take care of the farmer who would like a little more himself. We passed a bill last May putting a farmer on the reserve board which is to fix the financial policy of this year. Now, it has been eight or nine months since that was agitated and we have not got that relief for the farmers. It was stated by Secretary Mellon that on the assembling of the extraordinary session that matter would be acted upon by President Harding by appointing Mr. J. R. Howard, the only farmer who has come out in favor of this bill and who has been repudiated by every farm organization in this country.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEVENSON. Yes.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. The gentleman is trying to propose an indirect method of helping the farmer. Would not the people of the United States be better off if they subsidized directly the woolgrower instead of the manufacturers, with the tremendous indirect subsidy in the tariff law?

Mr. STEVENSON. Perhaps they would, so far as that is concerned. But I want to call attention specifically in this matter to the statement of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, that if the shipowner is making money and wants more ships the Government will give him his income tax if his business is profitable with which to build it. If the farmer is making money and wants another farm they will not give him money, but they take his income tax, and he will have to go and borrow money at 7 or 8 per cent where you propose to loan to the shipowner at 4½ per cent.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. These concerns can utilize their wealth or a portion of it in rebuilding such ships as necessary to reinforce their fleets, and every dollar they put into a fleet is an increase of wealth without taxation.

Mr. STEVENSON. I call attention to the fact that since this bill has been pending the Standard Oil companies have declared and announced their intention of declaring stock dividends amounting to $1,338,000,000, which they have built up in the last 11 years since the old Standard Oil Co. was divided up into 33 different companies.

Mr. FREAR. That is in addition to the cash dividends.

Mr. STEVENSON. In addition to cash dividends which have been at the rate of 20 per cent per annum. In giving out a statement of their policy to the New York papers on the 6th day of October, 1922, they made this statement:

The killing of the bonus bill caused several plans of recapitalization to come before the directors of the Standard Oil companies. It had been feared that the bonus legislation might have included provisions unfavorable to Standard Oil plans. The chief fear was that the Government might take steps to tax stock dividends.

Therefore they did not declare them, because they were afraid the soldiers would get something out of them. Now they propose to hand out these stock dividends to their stockholders.

It is not surprising that the Standard Oil and kindred enterprises have found a warm friendship in the financial legislation of this Congress, when we remember that of the 17 Republican members of the Ways and Means Committee 11 were millionaires, most of them multimillionaires, as was stated by Hon. Frank R. Reid, Member elect of the eleventh Illinois district, and a Republican, in an interview given out last summer and placed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD by myself.

The performances of that committee have justified their appointment. They reduced the taxes of the millionaires $150,000 on each million of income, thereby reducing the tax of their millionaire Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Andrew Mellon, $2,250,000 a year, if the statement of Mr. FREAR, of Wisconsin, is correct, that Mr. Mellon's income is around $15,000,000 a year. The bill as originally introduced was prepared in Mr. Mellon's office and provided for the reduction of $330,000 on each million, which would have reduced Mr. Mellon's taxes $4,950,000 if it had been passed in that shape, and it was jammed through this House in that shape, and Mr. Mellon and President Harding both advocated its being passed that way when the bill went to conference. The same committee, in the same bill, took $450,000,000 excess-profits tax from the corporations that make an excess-profits tax, making in these two items a reduction of $540,000,000 in the taxes of the very rich. The excess-profits tax has been greatly misunderstood by many people. No corporation is subject to it unless it made net profits of $3,000 and in addition to that 8 per cent on its capital stock. To give an example, a corporation of a hundred thousand dollars capital which made only $11,000 net would not be subject to the excess-profits tax. But if it made $50,000 net the excess over $11,000 would be taxable as excess profits and the tax on that $39,000 would be $18,350, which would leave a net profit of $31,650 on the capital of one hundred thousand. In other words, it would double its capital every three years and pay the excess-profits tax. This committee also reported a tariff bill which directly tends to destroy our American shipping. Section 313 of that bill provides that if a shipbuilder imports the materials with which to build a ship and pays tariff on them he can sell the ship to an American, but if he does he sells it with the tariff added. If he sells it to a foreigner, to wit, an Englishman, he can get back from the United States Treasury 99 per cent of the tariff paid on the material. It has been stated in the debate here—by Mr. CHANDLER of New York—that shipping material can be bought cheaper abroad than in this country, and it has generally been conceded that the average tariff will run about 40 per cent. Take a shipbuilder building a million-dollar ship, and the proportion of the ship cost which is material, if imported, would make the tariff item at least 10 per cent of the cost of the ship, or a hundred thousand dollars. Now, an Englishman comes up to buy the ship, and says, "I want it to put under the British flag." An American also comes up, and says, "I want this ship to fly the Stars and Stripes."

The shipbuilder will necessarily reply to the American, "It has cost me $1,000,000, and I will sell it to you on that basis." To the Englishman he will say, "It has cost me a million dollars, less $99,000 rebate which I can get from the United States Treasury if I sell it to you, and I will sell it to you on the basis of $901,000 cost." And this bill proposes to tax the American people to assist the American shipowner to compete with the Englishman, whom it has given an advantage by its own legislation. And yet the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. EDMONDS] has stated more than once that the people who oppose this bill are favoring the British. The gentleman's own party has so favored the foreigner at the expense of the home shipowner that the American shipowner has been driven off the seas. Their same tariff bill, section 466, also provides that if an American ship is repaired in a foreign port, that when the ship returns to an American port it shall pay 50 per cent tariff on the expense of such repairs, no matter how much more cheaply the repairs could be made in a foreign port. An English and an American ship are both repaired, say, in a port in Australia, have the same repair work done, at an expense of $50,000 each. The English ship goes its way and that is the end of it. The first time the American ship reaches a home port it is assessed $25,000 taxes, and if it fails to pay it the ship is seized and sold to pay the charges, thereby making its cost of maintenance 50 per cent more than what the Englishman's ship costs, and, under section 413 of this bill, forfeits all compensation under the provisions of this act.

There is one other provision of the tariff act which favors the very wealthy people, with whom Secretary Mellon is largely associated. Section 312 of the tariff act provides for the corporation that is engaged in reducing ores and shipping metals in any form to have their smelters declared "bonded smelting warehouses" by merely giving a bond to the Secretary of the Treasury to pay any tax due on the ores imported, and when the company exports as much metal as the ores imported should produce the tariff charge against such ores is canceled. It is charged, and I have never heard it denied, that the United States Steel Corporation has very large holdings of iron-ore lands in foreign countries, notably China. This provision will enable them to mine that ore in China with coolie labor, the cheapest in the world, to transport it to this country in their own ships, take it into their factories here without paying any tariff on it, reduce it, manufacture it, and ship it out to supply its foreign market and have all tariff charges canceled against it. What is the result of this? First, in supplying its foreign market it puts Chinese coolie labor in direct competition with the miner in the iron mines of this country. Second, it arranges for the United States Steel Corporation to be able to sell to the foreigner for probably 50 per cent less than he sells to the American; and third, it enables it to get a ship subsidy, under this bill, on the cargo both ways, which it carries for itself alone. This is certainly not taking care of America but taking care of a great financial and manufacturing trust and its foreign customers at the expense of the American miner and the American consumer.

But Mr. EDMONDS of Pennsylvania says that they propose to strike out of this bill the provision for paying a subsidy to the Standard Oil Co., the United States Steel Corporation, and the American Fruit Co., in so far as those corporations earn it by carrying their own stuff. That is a mere subterfuge to get the bill through. There are 33 Standard Oil companies. The big capitalists who own the large blocks of stock in those corporations will simply see that there is an independent ship-operating concern organized which will buy the tankers and other ships necessary to carrying the Standard Oil products, and that corporation will get the Standard Oil cargoes exclusively and charge the usual ocean rate and get the subsidy, and the money will go into the pockets of the big capitalists in the Standard Oil group just the same, but will come from another conduit, and they will be pulling down dividends from 34 concerns instead of 33, while the small stockholders' dividend will come from 33 and be reduced slightly in order to make the shipping concern dividend larger. A like scheme will be operated by the United States Steel Corporation and the American Fruit Co.

I want to notice one other result of the great corporate control of this administration. The railroads were returned to the owners thereof with a six months' guaranty put through by a Republican Congress. In that six months they claimed to have lost over $700,000,000, which this administration has paid without question and without suggestion that an extra tax was necessary in order to finance them. The corporations engaged in supplying the Government with war materials, who are generally designated as profiteers, complained to Congress that they lost money as the result of the cancellation of their contracts when the armistice was signed. The contracts provided for cancellation on a certain notice, which notice was duly given, and they had made multiplied millions in filling the contracts. But Congress provided for a commission to settle with these profiteers on an equitable basis, and up until last June they had settled $1,500,000,000 of the $3,000,000,000 claimed for $600,000,000. And it was estimated that it would take $600,000,000 more to settle the balance—which will make $1,900,000,000 paid out in settling with the railroads and the profiteers for their alleged losses incident to the war without a single suggestion that it was necessary to make any special taxation to finance these things. The adjusted compensation bill of the former soldiers, which would not cost any more if every soldier took the cash and got it at once, was vetoed by President Harding with the backing of Mr. Mellon, the financial adviser of the administration, because a special tax was not levied to pay that. But some one says that it will take four billions to pay the bonus. I want to set down the figures, so that claim will not be made unchallenged again. Two million men went overseas. Under the bill they were to get a dollar and a quarter a day for each day in the service, not exceeding $600, less the $60 bonus paid on discharge. That is, $540 each, if each one was in from the day war was declared until the end. This would make $1,080,000,000. The men who did not go overseas were to have $1 a day, not exceeding $500, less the $60 bonus, which would be $440 each if everyone was in from the day war was declared until the end. This would make for the 2,000,000 men in $880,000,000. The total therefore would be $1,960,000,000 if every man had been in all the time, or about the same that they are paying the railroads and the profiteers without ever a suggestion of a special tax. The general understanding is that the average length of service was a little over six months, or around 200 days. But suppose it was higher than that and was half of a full service—half of that would be $980,000,000, and that is about what it would cost, certainly not over a billion, to pay these boys the cash. And it is typical of this administration that it is taking care of the great financial corporations and turning its back upon the boys who stood between this great wealth and the concentrated power of Germany. And in this bill now before us it proposes to continue this policy of subsidizing great wealth with money taken from the pockets of the producers and the burden bearers of this country.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment is withdrawn. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. DAVIS].

The question being taken, on a division (demanded by Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee) there were—ayes 61, noes 63.

Mr. TINCHER. I ask for tellers.

Tellers were ordered, and the Chairman appointed Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee and Mr. LEHLBACH.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 59, noes 70.

Accordingly, the amendment was rejected.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I offer another amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee: Page 9, line 13, after the word "State," insert "and operated as a common carrier."

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, this is along the same line as the last amendment. This section as it now reads extends and enumerates the tax exemptions in favor of ship-owners, which amount to an exemption of Federal taxes of every character, including excess profits, war profits, income tax, surtax, corporation tax, and everything else. It exempts them from payment upon the sole condition that they set the money aside for reinvestment. That is done without regard to whether they are common carriers or not. This amendment simply confines these exemptions and favors to the ships that are operated as common carriers; in other words, to the ships that are operating in the interest of the public and for the service of the public, and not solely for the enrichment of the Standard Oil Co., the United States Steel Trust, the Packers' Trust, the United Fruit Co., and the other classes of lines that get the benefit of these enormous exemptions, unless this amendment is adopted—exemptions that will be greater in their cases than in the case of any other steamship line.

Now, it is up to you.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. In line 13 why is the year 1921 exempted?

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. It says:

For the taxable year 1921 and for each of the eight taxable years following.

That is retroactive.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Why is that? That is what I am trying to find out.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Simply in order to favor them for the past year as well as present and future years, that is all.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. If the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY] will allow me, I wish to state that the simple reason for putting this in is that it is existing law and that they are simply carrying out the existing law, the Jones Act.

Mr. BRIGGS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. There has been a good deal of talk about this being an extremely innocent bill and having only one or two modifications of the existing law. The Jones law did not give any income-tax exemption. It made excess profits and war profits exempt under certain conditions. This bill expands very greatly the exemptions. How can any man say that the return of taxes paid into the Treasury does not constitute subsidies of the very highest value? How can any man say that taxes which otherwise would find their way into the Treasury of the United States, but which are allowed to remain in the pockets of a taxpayer are not contributions from the Treasury of the United States? Of course, these great organizations like the Standard Oil and the Fruit Trust and the Steel Trust will share in these benefits. Not only are they to derive these benefits in the future, but with a reported deficit of over $700,000,000 the Treasury will have to pay back excess-profits and war-profit taxes beginning with the 1st of January, 1921. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me there is no use in intimating that these tax-exempt provisions are not of the very highest value. In fact, it was directly testified by those advocating this bill that the indirect aids were more valuable even than the direct aid or cash subsidy; and that is the only reason why the chairman of the Shipping Board says only "a modest sum" was provided for cash subsidies, because these indirect subsidies were regarded as the ones that would bear the burden.

Mr. SEARS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRIGGS. Yes.

Mr. SEARS. How much do the laboring people, the merchants, business men, and farmers of the West, North, East, and South get under this bill?

Mr. BRIGGS. The gentleman knows they get nothing under the bill.

Mr. SEARS. Why should they be overlooked?

Mr. FREAR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRIGGS. Yes.

Mr. FREAR. It was stated in this morning's paper by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue that the Treasury had $1,400,000,000 less revenue this year than it had last.

Mr. BRIGGS. By the passage of this bill the Treasury will lose and have to restore some hundreds of millions of dollars to these rich corporations. That is the purpose of these retroactive provisions all through this bill—to restore excess profits and war taxes that have already been paid in. That purpose is manifest, and gentlemen will find that when these provisions are adopted that will be the result.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Mr. Chairman, the Jones Act of 1920 provides for the exemption of the excess profits and war taxes of the 1918 act.

That act has gone out, and all we have done in this draft is to make those same general provisions of law available under existing tax statutes; that is all that has been done here.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. In other words, if a man has not taken advantage of the Jones Act, and has gone on and paid his income tax, he can come in now and take advantage of this act and get it back.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. He can not take advantage of that, because it has been repealed by the act of 1921. Does the gentleman mean the tax act?

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. The gentleman says that this is reenacting existing law. If it is existing law, you do not need to reenact it.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. No; but we are trying to do something for American ships.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. By giving these parties retroactively something that they did not get under the Jones Act?

Mr. WHITE of Maine. The 1919 act continued in force and effect until November, 1921, and they had the benefit of that act up until that time. This bill simply gives them the benefit of the 1918 act, and it gives them the benefit of the 1921 act.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. What objection would the gentleman have to making it 1923?

Mr. WHITE of Maine. We do not want to cut them out, and we want to keep faith. We want them to have the benefits that the law contemplated they should have. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate upon this section and all amendments thereto be now closed.

The motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend, in line 13, page 9, by striking out the figures "1921" and inserting in lieu thereof the figures "1923."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 9, line 13, strike out the figures "1921" and insert in lieu thereof the figures "1923."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BANKHEAD: Pages 12 to 14, beginning at line 11, on page 12, strike out section 266.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I understand that debate is closed on this amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is closed on this section and all amendments thereto. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee: Pages 9 to 17, strike out section 201.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee.

The amendment was rejected; and on a division (demanded by Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee) there were—ayes 46, noes 59.

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. Chairman, I offer to amend, on page 17, line 7, by striking out section 270.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. DICKINSON: Page 17, line 7, strike out section 270.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. DICKINSON) there were—ayes 54, noes 66.

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. Chairman, I demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered, and the Chair appointed Mr. WHITE of Maine and Mr. DICKINSON to act as tellers.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 52, noes 82. So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 202. (a) Subdivision (a) of section 212 of the revenue act of 1921 is amended by striking out the word and figures "section 214" and inserting in lieu thereof the following: "sections 214, 265, and 266."

(b) Section 232 of the revenue act of 1921 is amended by striking out the word and figures "section 234" and inserting in lieu thereof the following: "sections 234, 265, and 266."

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee: Page 17, line 14, strike out section 202.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, this section simply extends the exemptions that were originally granted in the Jones Act. It widens them and covers other sections not covered in that act.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Mr. Chairman, the amendment ought not to be agreed to, because this section simply fits what the committee has already adopted into the general scheme of the revenue act.

Mr. MONDELL. It rennumbers the sections.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate upon this section and all amendments thereto do now close.

The motion was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

DEPRECIATION OF VESSELS.

SEC. 203. Title II of the revenue act of 1921 is further amended by adding at the end thereof, after the sections added thereto by section 201 of this act, a new section to read as follows:

"DEPRECIATION OF VESSELS.

"SEC. 272. (a) That in the case of vessels registered, enrolled, or licensed, under the laws of the United States, the reasonable allowance for exhaustion, wear and tear, and obsolescence, provided in paragraph (8) of subdivision (a) of section 214, and in paragraph (7) of subdivision (a) of section 234, shall be determined, and allocated to the years in which sustained, under rules and regulations prescribed by the United States Shipping Board.

"(b) In the case of a vessel of 1,000 gross tons or more (as shown by her certificate of admeasurement), registered, enrolled, or licensed, under the laws of the United States, acquired after August 1, 1914, and prior to January 1, 1921, there shall be allowed for the taxable year 1922 and each of the four succeeding taxable years, a reasonable deduction for the exceptional decrease in value thereof since the date of acquisition, but not again including any amount otherwise allowed under this act or any previous act of Congress as a deduction in computing net income. This deduction shall be determined and allocated to the taxable year 1922 and the four succeeding taxable years under rules and regulations prescribed by the United States Shipping Board. At any time before March 15, 1927, the commissioner may, and at the request of the taxpayer shall, reexamine the return, and if he then finds as a result of an appraisal or from other evidence that the value on which the tentative deduction for exceptional decrease in value was based, was incorrect or has changed, the income, war-profits and excess-profits taxes for the year or years affected shall be redetermined; and the amount of tax due upon such redetermination, if any, shall be paid upon notice and demand by the collector, and the amount of tax overpaid, if any, shall be credited or refunded to the taxpayer in accordance with the provisions of section 252.

"(c) This section shall take effect as of January 1, 1922."

Mr. BRIGGS. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BRIGGS: Page 17, beginning line 22, strike out all of section 203, section 273, down to and including line 13, page 19.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer a perfecting amendment, but I suppose I shall be permitted to do so before the vote is taken on this.

The CHAIRMAN. Certainly.

Mr. BRIGGS. Mr. Chairman, this provision in the bill, which I seek to strike from it, is one which is designed to allow vessels acquired between August 1, 1914, and January 1, 1921, extraordinary reductions in capital costs. At the hearings it was contended that many of the ships constructed had been built at very great cost.

It was also stated, however, that during the period of the war and subsequent thereto, within a year and a half, most, if not all, of those ships earned fabulous sums; that under the common and accepted practice it was required that the capital cost should be reduced out of the net earnings, and it was testified by the owners that they would have followed that practice had they been permitted to do so by the Internal Revenue Bureau and the revenue law and regulations, but that they were only allowed to write off 5 per cent depreciation. The result was that these great earnings—in some cases nearly equal to the value of the ship in a single voyage—actually wiped out the initial cost of the ships and the great profits made are revealed in the hearings and exhibited in the minority report. Instead, therefore, of writing off capital costs, these great earnings were distributed either in the form of dividends or carried to surplus, until some of these companies accumulated a surplus so large that they declared immense stock dividends and some are even now carrying an enormous surplus. It is proposed now, under the bill, to allow these companies to write down the cost of those vessels and secure tax exemptions of the most valuable character, and at the same time preserve the fruits and returns that they received from the enormously high freight rates—in some cases 1,250 per cent over pre-war rates—which they earned during the war and subsequent to the war. At the hearings no one could or would tell how valuable this tax exemption is or how much it will amount to. All that was disclosed was that this so-called indirect aid was very valuable and that the indirect aids are really more valuable than the direct ones. No provision is made in this section for crediting against these tax allowances the great earnings made during this period; and I say this amendment ought to be adopted and this provision stricken from the bill.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Mr. Chairman, I never heard in the discussion of a revenue bill that there should be a charge against depreciation from the man who owned a vessel or any other instrumentality. The fact is this provision is put in here to bring the policy of the United States with respect of depreciation in conformity with the practice adopted by all the maritime nations of the world, and that is all. It aims to put us in this respect on a parity with the other maritime nations of the world. The amendment ought to be voted down, and the provision should stay in the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I offer a perfecting amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.
The Clerk read as follows:

On page 18, line 2, strike out subsection B.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, this subsection is a deduction upon a ship purchased between August, 1914, and January 1, 1921, and, as stated by my colleague [Mr. BRIGGS], this is for the purpose of relieving from taxation these shipping companies which profited upon our Government and upon the people during the war to an enormous extent. Winthrop Marvin, vice president and general manager of the American Steamship Owners' Association, admitted at the hearings that during the war American steamship lines ran up the freight rates over 1,250 per cent upon our Government and upon the public. As a result of the enormous profiteering in which they indulged when their country was in the midst of war they made enormous profits. They made hundreds of per cent annual profits. Some of them made several times the value of their total investment. And I wish to cite for your information some of the specific profits which they made as they are presented in the hearings and which have never been denied by any living soul. In the first place they made profits which were characterized as "almost fabulous" by W. J. Love, one of the $35,000 experts, and described as "enormous" by J. B. Small, another of the $35,000 experts of the Shipping Board. For instance, the American-Hawaiian Steamship Co. paid dividends of 200 per cent in 1916, and 405 per cent for 1917; the Luckenbach Steamship Co. made a net profit on its capital of 236 per cent in 1916 and 606 per cent profit in 1917. The Pacific Mail Steamship Co. made 365 per cent net profit on its capital stock in 1915-1920; the Atlantic, Gulf & West Indies Co. made net profits greater than its capital in 1915-1920, and during 1921, the very worst time in the history of shipping, according to its own annual report made a net income of $1,781,337 after deducting all expenses, taxes, interest, and losses on sale of Liberty bonds; the United Fruit Co., with a capital stock of $50,000,000, made net profits of $94,147,500 in 1915-1920, paid dividends of $77,080,277, and increased their surplus to $66,176,490; the Dollar Steamship Lines made net profits on its capital stock of 322 per cent in 1916 and 104 per cent in 1917. And, remember, that the Standard Oil Co. and the United States Steel and some of the packer companies and the other industrial companies, who carry their own products and are making enormous and even outrageous profits, get the benefit of this provision to which I am directing my remarks.

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Yes; I yield.

Mr. EDMONDS. What steamship lines do the packer companies own that the gentleman talks about so frequently?

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. I do not recall the names of the lines any further than that I understand that some of them do own their own ships.

Mr. EDMONDS. I never heard of them.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Well, there are a lot of things that the gentleman never heard of. Assuming that he is correct, which I do not think he is, out of all the enormous and fabulous profits that I have enumerated, that is the only one about which the gentleman can take issue with me, because they are the facts.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Chairman, I move that the gentleman be given an additional minute.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee.

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the "noes" appeared to have it.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. A division, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. A division is demanded.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 41, noes 75.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I demand tellers.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee demands tellers.

Tellers were ordered, and the Chair appointed Mr. WHITE of Maine and Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee to act as tellers.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 48, noes 90.

So the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BRIGGS].

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the "noes" appeared to have it.

Mr. BRIGGS. Mr. Chairman, I demand a division.

The CHAIRMAN. A division is demanded.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 25, noes 64.
So the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

INCOME-TAX CREDIT FOR TRANSPORTATION BY WATER.

SEC. 204. Title II of the revenue act of 1921 is further amended by adding, after the section added thereto by section 203 of this act, a new section, to read as follows:

CREDIT FOR AMOUNTS PAID FOR WATER TRANSPORTATION.

"SEC. 273. (a) That the tax computed under this title (less the credits provided by sections 222 and 238) shall be credited with an amount equal to 5 per cent of the amount of freight money paid (not accrued) by the taxpayer and for his own account during the taxable year and after the enactment of the merchant marine act, 1922, for the transportation after the enactment of such act in a vessel registered or enrolled and licensed under the laws of the United States of cargo not taken on board at a port in the coastwise trade and discharged at another port in such trade. If such transportation is in a vessel chartered by the owner of any part of the cargo from a person not affiliated with such owner within the meaning of subdivision (b), the amount of freight money paid by the charterer for the transportation of such part of the cargo shall, for the purposes of this section, be such amount as is determined by the United States Shipping Board and certified by it to the commissioner. In such cases the credit shall not be originally claimed by the taxpayer in his return, unless the return is accompanied by a copy of the certificate of the Shipping Board.

"(b) The credit provided in this section shall not be allowed with reference to transactions between persons who are affiliated. For the purposes of this section two or more corporations or associations shall be held to be affiliated if one corporation or association owns directly, or controls through closely affiliated interests or by a nominee or nominees, more than 50 per cent of the outstanding stock of or interest in the other; or if more than 50 per cent of the outstanding stock of or interest in such corporations or associations is owned directly, or controlled through closely affiliated interests or by a nominee or nominees, by the same interests. For the purposes of this section an individual or partnership shall be held to be affiliated with a corporation or association if more than 50 per cent of the outstanding stock of or interest in the corporation or association is owned directly, or controlled through closely affiliated interests or by a nominee or nominees, by the individual or partnership."

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois: Pages 19 to 21, strike out section 204.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, this section is the one that provides for a 5 per cent rebate to anyone who ships goods in a vessel documented under the laws of the United States. I think it is vicious. I think it is extremely dangerous.

By this section you give to the man who ships across the ocean a rebate of 5 per cent, or a deduction of 5 per cent on his income tax. That is, 5 per cent of the freight is to be considered as an exemption or a deduction, which, of course, is not 5 per cent of the income tax, but it might in some cases amount to all of the income tax. In other words, it may have the effect of exempting entirely certain classes of shippers from payment of income tax under the revenue law.

I do not believe that the American Congress wants to write that sort of a principle into any law. So far as I am concerned, I think it is so inherently vicious and bad that if it were to go into this bill I could not support the bill. I say that simply to state my own position; I do not claim to speak for anybody but myself. But I think this is a bad principle, and it should be taken out of the bill; and I appeal especially to the Members of the Republican side of the House to yield now to the demand that I think is insisted upon by the country, that this be not written into the bill if the bill is to be passed.

I ask those representing agricultural districts, why would not the same argument apply exactly to the cooperative associations out in Illinois and Iowa that have grain for export and which want to ship that grain across the sea? Do you say to those associations, "You may have 5 per cent off on your freight to the seaboard"? Not at all. The farmer is not exempted. No such exemption is given to him, but it is given to the commission man or to the shipper on the seaboard for his shipment across the sea. I can not defend that sort of a proposition. I do not know how we can explain that to the farmers of the country who are now complaining because of the high freight rates charged for the shipment of their products. I do not see how we can exempt those who ship commodities across the sea and at the same time say to the farmer, "You must continue to pay high freight rates and get no deduction on what you spend." [Applause.]

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment which I wish to offer. It is a perfecting amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. DICKINSON: Page 20, line 1, after the word "vessel," insert "or when transported by any common carrier for shipment in such vessel."

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. Chairman, in support of this amendment I wish to say that the purpose—

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Chairman, I would like to make a point of order against that amendment. As I understand, it affects railroad rates. There is nothing in this bill that affects railroad rates.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the point of order comes too late.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is inclined to believe that the gentleman from Iowa had actually begun his argument.

Mr. LEHLBACH. The gentleman from Pennsylvania was on his feet and made the point of order as soon as he understood the purport of the amendment. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. DICKINSON] was recognized but had not started.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair was observing very closely the gentleman from Iowa and thought he had actually begun speaking, and the Chair should think that he had spoken at least half a dozen or ten words before the gentleman from Pennsylvania rose. Under those circumstances, and in face of the point of order, the Chair would be compelled to rule that it is too late.

Mr. LANGLEY. Mr. Chairman, can the amendment be again read?

The CHAIRMAN. If the gentleman from Iowa is willing to suspend for that purpose, the amendment may again be read.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I object, unless I understand that no point of order can be made against it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman had already begun his argument, and the Chair asked if the gentleman will yield for that purpose. Without objection the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. DICKINSON] having the floor, the amendment may be read for information of the House. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. DICKINSON: Page 20, line 1, after the word "vessel," insert "or when transported by any common carrier for shipment in such vessel."

Mr. DICKINSON. The purpose of this amendment is to give the producer the same right to the deduction of 5 per cent from his income tax that the shipper has under this provision to have 5 per cent deducted from his income tax. It would apply to the farmer, it would apply to the manufacturer, it would apply to anyone who produced tonnage that is going to be shipped on these vessels across the sea. What could be more fair? Why should these men insist that the shipper have this privilege without giving it to the man who produces the cargo? I am here simply trying to get this provision into the law so that it will help the man who produces the cargo and give him permission to get 5 per cent of the freight he is compelled to pay deducted from his income tax the same as you give the shipowner the right to do.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. DICKINSON].

The question being taken, on a division (demanded by Mr. DICKINSON) there were—ayes 39, noes 61.

Accordingly, the amendment was rejected.

Mr. BRIGGS. Mr. Chairman, I have a perfecting amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas offers a preferential amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BRIGGS: Page 20, line 18, strike out all of subdivision (b) after the word "affiliated," down to and including line 7, page 21.

Mr. BRIGGS. Mr. Chairman, this amendment strikes out the definition of the word "affiliated." It is my understanding that it is the contention that industrial companies like the Standard Oil, the Steel Trust, the Fruit Trust, and others would be denied the benefit of this 5 per cent rebate under the provision contained in the bill that "the credit provided in this section shall not be allowed with reference to transactions between persons who are affiliated." If just that language is allowed to stand, it is probable that it may have that effect, but if the definition of the word "affiliated" is continued in the bill it is probable that all those companies will also enjoy this 5 per cent rebate.

Why, the Federal Trade Commission not a great while since had occasion to investigate the acquisition of holdings by the Standard Oil Co. of Indiana in the Wyoming field, and they found that even the ownership of 30 or 40 per cent of the stock of another company would give the control to the corporation owning that amount of stock. The chairman of the Federal Trade Commission, to whom I addressed a letter upon this very question, wrote me as follows:

In effect it seems to be the fact that control seems to be dependent not so much upon the amount of stock that the active minority holder may own as upon the diversification of holdings and inert qualities of holders of the majority interests. One thing is certain, and that is that no mathematical proportion can be assigned as necessary to constitute control.

He also stated in that letter that it was notorious that Mr. Gould controlled the policies of the Missouri Pacific, although he owned no more than 23 per cent of the stock of that corporation, and that there were others where even less stock ownership was held that dominated the control of organizations. So this provision here that I seek to strike out, which defines affiliated companies as those having more than 50 per cent interest in another, would open the doors wide to any company to escape the limitation if it owned only 50 per cent of the stock. They could unquestionably enjoy the benefit of this 5 per cent rebate. If they owned 49 per cent, they could enjoy the benefit of this rebate. This definition is a most dangerous provision, if you are aiming to really prevent the benefits of the 5 per cent rebate from going to those great industrial corporations, like the Standard Oil and similar combinations, which do not really strongly lay claim, I understand, to any need for sharing in the subsidy.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. If the committee understands the provisions of this section at all as it is drawn, the Standard Oil Co., the United States Steel Corporation, and the United Fruit Co., and other companies which own vessels are not the beneficiaries under this section on account of their own commodities which they carry. That is the general proposition. Then this provision with respect to affiliated companies was put in so as to prevent companies like the Standard Oil, the United States Steel, and the United Fruit from using a subsidiary corporation for the carriage of their products and thereby getting the benefit of the 5 per cent deduction. It seems to me if that provision is stricken out it will accomplish the very thing you do not want to have permitted. You do not want these corporations, either directly or through a subsidiary or affiliated corporation, to get the benefit of this deduction. This was put in for that purpose, and we believe it accomplishes it.

I move that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto be now closed.

Mr. HAWLEY. May I ask a question?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maine has moved that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto be now closed.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I should like to know if an amendment is pending for the striking out of all of section 204?

The CHAIRMAN. It is.

Mr. HAWLEY. Will the gentleman from Maine withhold his motion? I would like to have five minutes. I have not spoken on the bill.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. If I may do so I will modify my motion so that all debate on the section and all amendments thereto shall close in 10 minutes.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. I want five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maine moves that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in 10 minutes.

The question was taken and the motion was agreed to.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. Chairman, I rise to support the amendment made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GRAHAM] to strike out section 204. Under the revenue law in reckoning the income tax payable by any individual or corporation, a taxpayer first makes an accounting of his gross income. Then there are subtracted from the gross income reductions of two kinds. One is described under the law as deductions and the other described under the law as credits. After these are taken from the gross income you have the net income of the individual or corporation upon which the tax to be paid is computed. Now, the paragraph in this bill proposes something entirely new. It proposes that after the tax is calculated and ascertained there shall be a further deduction made. It uses the word "credit" in a new sense. Apparently it confuses the meaning. It provides that after the deductions and credits authorized by the revenue law are made a further "credit" shall be made; this further credit is not taken from the gross income, but is taken from the tax after it is assessed. There is no other case like that in the law, so far as I now recall.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. I think the gentleman is mistaken. Section 222 of the income tax law provides that the tax computed under the act shall be credited and then goes on to enumerate the number of items which are to be credited, just as we propose to do here. I think we have followed the phraseology of the income tax law.

Mr. HAWLEY. I think the gentleman is in error. The subtractions for deductions and credits made under the revenue law are from the gross income in order to ascertain the taxable net income, and not made from the tax upon the net income.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. I think the gentleman is in error.
Mr. HAWLEY. Now, take the case of two business men engaged in the transaction or prosecution of any business or enterprise of the same character in any locality. If one deals in American-made goods and the other in goods brought in from abroad, then the man who brings his goods from abroad in American vessels and pays the ocean freight gets a deduction of 5 per cent on the amount paid for freight from his income tax while his competitor must pay the full amount.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. On this proposition?

Mr. HAWLEY. Yes; under the paragraph now under discussion. Suppose there were two business men in town doing an amount of business that would require each to pay $30,000 as income tax every year. One man deals in foreign goods very largely and pays $300,000 as freight on commodities carried in American bottoms. He is to get 5 per cent as a deduction from his income tax, or $15,000, and so will pay only $15,000. The other man, his competitor who deals solely in American goods, will pay an income tax of $30,000 under the proposal in this paragraph.

Now, the policy of taxation, so far as the Government is concerned, is to hold an even balance between individuals and corporations, so that no one will be benefited at the expense of another as a result of any tax.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. A merchant who used American ships would have the benefit of 5 per cent of the amount paid for freight over his competitors who did not use American ships, since they dealt in goods of American production.

Mr. HAWLEY. Yes. It seems to me a vicious provision to deduct the amount from the income tax after once ascertained. And more than that, the taxing power should not be used to give one man or corporation an advantage in business over another man or corporation. I think the motion of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GRAHAM] should prevail. [Applause.]

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman—

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee is recognized.

Mr. MONDELL. But, Mr. Chairman, the time so far occupied in debate on this amendment has been in the affirmative. Debate was limited to 10 minutes.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I suggest that the gentleman ask an extension of time of five minutes, and let the gentleman from Tennessee who has received recognition have that five minutes.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. I will let the gentleman from Tennessee proceed for three minutes and I will take two.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. That will be satisfactory.

The CHAIRMAN. Then the Chair recognizes the gentleman from Tennessee for three minutes.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, we all recollect that the Jones bill contains section 34, which President Wilson and President Harding saw proper to decline to put into execution or attempt to do so. The failure to execute that provision was given as the chief reason for the passage of this bill. A little over two years ago the Jones bill was presented by the Republican Party as a complete solution of this question. The section under consideration is one that is designed to take the place of section 34. According to the statements of the proponents of the bill, they think this provision is more valuable to the shipping interests than section 34 would have been if put into execution. During the hearings Chairman Lasker said:

It is the belief of the Shipping Board that the proposed deduction from net Federal income tax of 5 per cent of the freight paid on goods imported or exported in American-flag vessels may do more to aid in the upbuilding of the American merchant marine than any proposal which is herein submitted to the Congress.

Section 34 provided preferential tariffs for American-flag ships, but this could only be applicable to dutiable imports. The operation of section 34 gave no preference to American ships on exports and no preference to American ships on nondutiable imports. The proposed 5 per cent deduction from taxes of the freights paid on goods imported or exported in American-flag vessels now made should insure a preference to American shippers on every ton of goods sold abroad or bought for consumption at home. This 5 per cent deduction is made in substitution of section 34, but we of the Shipping Board believe it is possible that this section will accomplish at less cost to the Treasury much more than might have been accomplished by section 34.

Nothing that can be devised, the Shipping Board feels, will so greatly insure volume to American ships as the 5 per cent tax deduction here proposed.

And on cross-examination the following occurred:

Mr. LAZARO. Mr. Lasker, you stated if the Jones law could have been carried out as a whole it would have given us an American merchant marine without asking for further legislation?

Mr. LASKER. In my belief.

Winthrop L. Marvin, general manager of the American Steamship Owners' Association, and the real father of this bill, in an article in Marine Engineering gave the same opinion as to the value of this substitute for section 34, saying, among other things, that—

As a matter of fact, it is far more valuable and effective, for it would apply to all merchandise, dutiable or free, inward or outward.

Now, while all these things are admitted to be true, yet this bill not only proposes an enactment of this provision but an enactment of innumerable other provisions carrying heavy subsidies and various other indirect aids, imposing burdens upon the taxpayers of more than $65,000,000 per annum in addition to cost of the provision in question.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Mr. Chairman, the situation to which this section relates is simply this: Under previous legislation, far back in the shipping history of this country, we used discriminating duties. Either we levied an additional duty on goods brought here in foreign ships, or, on the other hand, we levied a less rate of duty on goods brought in in American ships. Either was an incentive to transport goods in an American ship. The possibility of doing that thing has been denied. We are up against a situation where through long years foreign lines have intrenched themselves in the control of the movement of American goods to and from foreign ports. They are intrenched to-day, and one of our great problems is to get the American shipper to utilize American ships for the movement of his goods. Boiled right straight down to its final analysis this is an inducement to the American shipper to use the American ships for the carriage of his goods both across the water to foreign ports and from foreign ports back here. The 5 per cent deduction does not go to the ship operator. It goes to the man who owns the goods and who ships those goods in foreign commerce in our vessels. We believe that it will be a powerful inducement to American shippers to overcome their long habit of utilizing foreign ships and be a great inducement to American shippers to utilize henceforth American ships. We believe that in full cargoes is profit for American ships and the assurance of an American merchant marine.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas.

The amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now recurs on the motion of the gentleman from Illinois to strike out the section.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. JOHNSON of Washington) there were—ayes 56, noes 47.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 205. Subdivision (b) of section 213 of the revenue act of 1921 is amended by striking out the period at the end of paragraph (13) thereof, and inserting in lieu thereof a semicolon, and by adding after paragraph (13) a new paragraph to read as follows:

"(14) Amounts received by the owner of a vessel under section 403 of the merchant marine act, 1922, out of the merchant marine fund created by such act."

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. WHITE of Maine: Page 21, line 9, strike out the figures "205" and insert in lieu thereof the figures "204."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

TONNAGE DUTIES.

SEC. 206. After 30 days from the enactment of this act all amounts required to be levied, collected, and paid as tonnage duties, tonnage taxes, or light money, except such amounts as are required to be paid into the treasury of the Philippine Islands, shall be double the amounts which would be required to be levied, collected, and paid if this act had not been enacted. This section shall not apply in the case of a sailing vessel (as defined in sec. 405) of less than 1,000 gross tons, or in the case of any other kind of vessel of less than 1,500 gross tons.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Mr. Chairman, on page 21, line 18, I move to strike out the numerals "206" and insert in lieu thereof the numerals "205."

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will change the numbering of the section.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

TITLE III.—TRANSPORTATION OF IMMIGRANTS BY WATER.

SEC. 301. As nearly as practicable one-half of the total number of immigrants admitted to the United States in any fiscal year shall be transported in vessels registered, or enrolled and licensed, under the laws of the United States.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. RAKER: Page 22, line 3, strike out all of section 301, being lines 3 to 8, both inclusive, on page 22.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, it is generally conceded that, if possible, any immigrants who are permitted to come into the United States should come in American ships, if we have the ships. But as a matter of equity it is not considered advisable to suggest that more than one-half come in that way. Several countries have laws regulating emigration and have laws in regard to immigration. Other countries say by law or by order how their emigrants shall travel, and now the United States proposes in this section of the merchant marine bill to say that if any immigrants come, one-half shall come in ships of the United States. We might write all the details into this law, but we can do it better in another bill which is to come later. A section following the one now under discussion deals with treaties and gives the President the right to act in opposition to treaties, if necessary. The assumption is, and I think it will turn out to be just that way, that the State Department will open negotiations with those countries which seem to be desirous of sending emigrants to us which will lead to an arrangement by which 50 per cent will come on American ships. Of course, this does not mean that more shall come than our immigration laws permit.

I can not see that this proposal will open the way for an increase in immigration if Congress decides we shall not have that increase, but it will give a chance to the American ships to permit the relatives in this country to lay down the money here in the United States for the passage of relatives now in Europe—

Mr. STEVENSON. If the gentleman will permit, I notice an interview by Mr. Mellon by which he advocated the open door for labor immigrants and the exclusion of others. Will this affect that in any way?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. If the gentleman will read the remarks made by me in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of Friday he will find a complete answer. The immigration laws are not to be weakened, loosened, or opened. I think his proposal is fair to the United States, in encouraging United States shipping, and ultimately help us to properly regulate immigration to the benefit of all concerned.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto do now close.

Mr. BOX. Mr. Chairman, I have sent to the Clerk's desk a perfecting amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wyoming moves that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto do now close.

Mr. BOX. I move to amend that by making it in five minutes. I have a perfecting amendment which I wish to present at this time, and the Chair, expecting he would be able to do it, assured me I would be recognized.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will be able to present it in any case.

Mr. BOX. I move to amend the gentleman's motion by making debate close in five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas offers an amendment to the motion that debate close in five minutes.

Mr. MONDELL. I will agree to modify it and make the debate close in six minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BOX. I desire to offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. Box: Page 22, line 7, after the word "year," insert the words "in compliance with the immigration laws of the United States."

Mr. BOX. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I present this amendment for the purpose of getting a brief expression of my objection to this provision and my suggestion of a needed amendment to a subsequent section before the committee.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. I will accept the amendment.

Mr. BOX. I want to continue, if I may. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognized the gentleman for five minutes.

Mr. BOX. The point is that I expect to follow this amendment up by a subsequent one, which was my purpose in presenting this one.

I offer this amendment at this time in the hope that in the time allowed me I may get into the minds of the membership the necessity for an amendment which I expect to offer to a subsequent paragraph. An amendment embodying the idea suggested by this one should be carried into section 303 of this title. It is suggested that this or any like amendment undertakes to direct the President in the exercise of his treaty-making power, but that is exactly what section 303 of this title already undertakes to do. If we are going to make any suggestions as to his manner of exercising that power, which the bill as presented by the committee does, I want us not to couple that suggestion with any hint that we think he should modify the law to meet the treaties. In his action in dealing with the immigration laws, with the advice and consent of the Senate, he will be making "the supreme law of the land," before which prior immigration statutes will have to give way. If we are to suggest anything, let us suggest that he make the treaties fit our immigration statutes. When he carries the regulation of immigration into the treaty-making functions of his office he enters into a forum where the voice of foreign powers must be heard and their will consulted. I hope that there may be an affirmative declaration by Congress that when the treaty-making power is exercised by the President, as suggested by this title, it should be done in compliance with the immigration laws. [Applause.]

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Chairman, all I have got to say is that the English papers are discussing this bill in England and their friends here, and they say that if we leave off the 5 per cent tax deduction and take out this immigration section they do not care what kind of a bill we pass.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Mr. Chairman, a point of order. What amendment was the Chair ruling on?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's from Texas [Mr. Box].

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. A point of order. The Chair announced that the amendment was accepted, and no one objected. Does not the Chair think that that—

Mr. EDMONDS. That is the first amendment that he offered.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment offered by the gentleman from California is still pending.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 302. The Commissioner General of Immigration, with the approval of the Secretary of Labor, shall make regulations necessary for the enforcement of section 301. All such regulations, in so far as they relate to the administration of such section by diplomatic or consular officers of the United States, shall be subject to the approval of the Secretary of State.

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Chairman, I do not know what the gentleman means by talking about Mr. Rossbottom, or why he quotes from him; but I do know that Mr. Rossbottom is trying to arrange to have three or four of his ships changed so that he can carry immigrants. Several times "Nauticus" has stated that all the foreigners care about is for us to take out the income-tax exemption of shippers and take out the immigration provisions, and then we can pass any legislation that we please. The people of Italy require that all their immigrants shall travel on Italian ships.

Mr. RAKER. Will the gentleman allow me to state what Mr. Lasker said on that subject?

Mr. EDMONDS. I can not yield now.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a brief question?

Mr. EDMONDS. I can not yield now.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. EDMONDS. Before the war the immigration into this country was divided up between the English and the German and the Holland lines. We got no show at it. If you propose to run your ships, you have got to have immigration. The gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER] is opposed to any change of law except by his committee. Any law that we have on the books has to be changed by his committee.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto be now closed.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wyoming moves that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto be now closed. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 303. Section 301 shall not take effect as to immigrants transported in a vessel documented under the laws of any foreign country until a time fixed by proclamation of the President. The President is authorized and directed, whenever in his opinion the provisions of this title or of regulations made thereunder, are or may be in conflict with treaties or conventions with a foreign country, to take such steps as may, in his opinion, be necessary to remove such conflict. Whenever, in his opinion, no such conflict exists in the case of any country he shall so proclaim, and the provisions of this title and regulations made thereunder shall take effect in the case of immigrants transported in vessels documented under the laws of such country at the time specified in his proclamation therefor.

Mr. BOX. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. Box: Page 20, line 23, after the word "conflict," strike out the period and insert in lieu thereof the following: "by making such treaties or conventions conform to the provisions of this title and all other immigration laws of the United States."

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Chairman, a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. We can not by legislation establish the terms of the treaty to be made by the President. It belongs to the Executive department. A treaty once negotiated by the President is subject only to approval by the Senate. We can not in this legislation provide for the terms of a treaty.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman raises a constitutional question. It is not within the province of the Chair to determine that. The Chair will examine the amendment. The Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. BOX. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I invite your attention to this in connection with the point of order which the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CHINDBLOM] makes. He makes a point that is probably valid from the constitutional standpoint, that we have no power to direct the President as to the making of treaties, but that is what we are doing in this section with or without any amendment.

Now, that being so, we can not instruct him to change these treaties; but it is the law, as I understand, that a treaty made and ratified will invalidate or repeal a prior statute, and having no authority to direct the President in his power to deal with one of two things, one of which is treaties and the other of which is statutes, we are telling him to bring these two conflicting things together. Our effort to give any direction is only an effort to authorize him to bend the statutes to fit treaties which we have no power to direct him in making.

Title 3, sections 301, 302, 303, and 304, provide that as nearly as practicable one-half of the total number of immigrants admitted to the United States in any fiscal year shall be transported in vessels registered or enrolled and licensed under the laws of the United States. Subsequent paragraphs of title 3 plainly recognize the fact that this is violative of our treaties with many foreign powers. This fact is admitted by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. EDMONDS], as shown by the following, taken from column 1, page 92, of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of November 23:

Mr. RAKER. The idea was in the committee that this provision violated about 32 treaties.

Mr. EDMONDS. I think that is right.

My understanding is that the essence of the conflict between this provision and other treaties is much the same as that of the conflict between section 34 of the Jones Act and the treaties. Section 34 did not designate the points of conflict between it and all of the treaties. A general review of a great many of our treaties, and a thorough understanding of each, would be necessary to locate all these points of conflict. That was left to the President. I think the same would be found true of the conflict between this clause and the 30 or more treaties with which it would conflict. I think one of these conflicts is illustrated by a comparison between this clause and a clause in our treaty with Serbia, concluded October 14, 1881, which is as follows:

There shall be reciprocally full and entire liberty of commerce and navigation between the citizens and subjects of the two high contracting parties. (Vol. 14 Senate Documents, 66th Cong., 1st sess., 1919, p. 36.)

The fact that stipulations such as this ramify our whole system of treaties of commerce and navigation, and the further fact that the denunciation of one clause of a treaty might, in effect, destroy the whole treaty and release the other party from all the obligations thereof, were evidently elements which deterred Presidents Wilson and Harding from denouncing these treaties. The same appalling difficulty attends the execution of the plan outlined in Title III.

That difficulty has been so great that neither President Wilson nor President Harding would undertake to overcome it, and I doubt if any wise President would. But great as that difficulty is, and forceful as is the objection which it presents to the enactment of Title III, I do not regard it as the most serious objection to it. The most serious objection is in the fact that this particular title, in effect, authorizes the President to abrogate provisions of our immigration laws. It seems to be conceded that a treaty negotiated and ratified after the passage of an act of Congress may modify or repeal a prior legislative enactment by Congress. In the American Journal of International Law, No. 15, 1921, page 34, Jesse S. Reeves, professor of political science of the University of Michigan, says:

On the other hand, a treaty may not only create a new international obligation but may modify, by way of amendment or repeal, a prior expression of the legislative will as expressed by Congress.

It is believed that many authorities could be found in support of this proposition if time permitted a collection and statement of them, and that the proposition is necessarily involved in the larger proposition that the treaties made by the President, with the advice and consent of the Senate, are the supreme law of the land.

Now, what have we in Title III? Section 301 violates the provisions of 32 treaties of the United States with foreign powers. Section 303 provides:

The President is authorized and directed, whenever in his opinion the provisions of this title or regulations thereunder are, or may be, in conflict with treaties or conventions with a foreign country, to take such steps as may in his opinion be necessary to remove such conflict.

Here the President is authorized and directed to deal with two things: First, with treaties; second, with statutory law and regulations made in obedience to it. Any authority or direction to the President concerning his treaty-making power is void. It has no legal effect, and more than one President has so treated it. But the power which this invites him to exercise over statutory law is substantial. We may not tell the President how he shall exercise his treaty-making power, but we can in advance suggest and invite his abrogation of statutory provisions of the immigration laws by directing him to deal with two things which may be in conflict so as to remove the conflict. If we had power to direct in both, that would give him authority over both, but he already has authority over at least one, and we are suggesting that he exercise that authority for the modification of our immigration laws.

One of the greatest dangers to which the immigration laws have been exposed during recent years has, in my judgment, been the danger of passing them over to the control of the treaty-making power. Foreign countries have a say in the making of treaties. When Congress invites the President to control immigration laws by the treaty-making power it invites the President to consult with foreign countries and meet their views on our immigration policies. There can be no treaty with a foreign power except upon terms acceptable to such foreign power. If our immigration laws ever come in actual practice to be controlled by the President in his treaty making, they will pass into that forum where the voice of foreign powers must be heard and their wishes consulted. We all know that they want to unload their surplus and undesirable population upon us. They will not agree to treaties made exclusively in our interests, as we have a right to make our immigration laws; therefore we shall insist that our immigration policies shall be controlled by Congress and not by the President through the treaty-making power.

I call special attention to the fact that nearly all of our leading immigration laws restricting immigration have had to be passed over the Presidents' vetoes. Our Presidents have not usually been in sympathy with the views of the people on this subject, and have repeatedly used the veto power to prevent them from giving expression to what they have repeatedly tried to say for themselves and their posterity. In 1879 President Hayes vetoed the first Chinese exclusion act. (2 I. C. R. 580.) In 1882 President Arthur vetoed an act suspending Chinese immigration for a period of 20 years. (2 I. C. R. 581.) On March 3, 1897, President Cleveland vetoed an immigration act excluding illiterates (2 I. C. R. 573.) President Taft vetoed an immigration bill in 1913 containing a restriction against the admission of illiterates. (Page 101, RECORD, special session, 59th Cong.) In 1917 President Wilson vetoed an act excluding illiterates, but Congress passed it over his veto.

The present 3 per cent law and extensions of it, have been approved by President Harding, which is an exception to the rule which usually applies, but we have no assurance that the exception will hereafter control the present or future Presidents. I am convinced that the purpose of the principal provisions of Title III are to enable Mr. Lasker, the chairman of the Shipping Board, and the private shipping companies, in whose interests this bill is proposed, to get control of the immigration laws so as to prevent their restricting the profits of the lawless steamship companies who bring immigrants here. Their record in dealing with it is marked throughout by disregard of law and the public interest, in return for which we are subsidizing them and placing them in a position in which, through their advocate, Mr. Lasker, they can mislead the President and, for the purpose of making money out of immigration traffic, weaken or disregard vital parts of the immigration laws, every wholesome and restrictive feature of which they so much hate.

But if we say to the President that whatever he does with the subject should be in harmony with the law as now existing we are maintaining that which it is our duty to maintain. It would be extreme folly, I am afraid—serious and calamitous folly—for us to abandon the control of this part of our national policy to the Executive. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment. I do not think it is either wise or necessary to direct or advise the President in the matter of treaty making.

I move that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto be now closed.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wyoming moves that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto be now closed.

The motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California moves to strike out the section. The gentleman from Massachusetts moves that the committee do now rise. The motion of the gentleman from California will be pending in the morning.

The motion of Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. TILSON, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having had under consideration the bill (H. The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the Record on this bill. Is there objection?

The SPEAKER. No such permission has been granted as yet.

HOUR OF MEETING TO-MORROW.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock to-morrow. I make this request in order that we may, if possible, dispose of at least the major portion of the bill to-morrow, in order that we may have the final vote promptly at 4 o'clock on Wednesday, or possibly a little earlier, if that is agreeable to gentlemen on both sides.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wyoming asks unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet to-morrow at 11 o'clock. Is there objection?

SENATE.

TUESDAY, November 28, 1922.

The Chaplain, Rev. J. J. Muir, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Lord, our God, we bless Thee that though the heaven of heavens can not contain Thee, Thou art pleased to dwell with those who are of an humble and contrite heart. Grant unto us such a disposition of mind, of will, of soul, that we may come into that happy relationship to have Thy abiding presence when undertaking responsibility, meeting the demands of duty, and asking from Thee guidance in all the pathways along which we are called to travel. Hear us, we beseech of Thee, for all who need Thy help in the great demands of the present life and engagements, and glorify Thyself in and through us. Through Christ, our Lord. Amen.

CALL OF THE ROLL.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will call the roll.

The reading clerk called the roll and the following Senators answered to their names:

Mr. HARRISON. I wish to announce the unavoidable delay of my colleague, the senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS].

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Sixty-three Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present.

THE JOURNAL.

The reading clerk proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings.

Mr. CURTIS. I ask unanimous consent to dispense with the further reading of the Journal.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. HARRISON. Reserving the right to object for the present, I think every one will agree that we have one of the most efficient Journal clerks in the history of this body—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair desires to observe that the question is not debatable.

Mr. HARRISON. I object, then.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the Journal.

The reading clerk resumed the reading of the Journal, and after having read for some time,

Mr. HARRISON. There is so much confusion in the Chamber that we can not hear what the reading clerk is reading.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate will be in order.

Mr. HARRISON. I suggest the absence of a quorum, so that Senators may hear the reading. It is very important.

Mr. CURTIS. I make the point of order that there has been no business transacted since the last call of the roll.

Mr. HEFLIN. Oh, yes, several things have happened.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will proceed with the reading of the Journal, and the Senate will be in order.

Mr. CURTIS. I make the point of order that the reading of the Journal can not be interrupted by a call for a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The point of order is sustained, and the Secretary will proceed with the reading of the Journal.

Mr. HARRISON. I suggest that business has been transacted. Several pages of the Journal have been read, and I respectfully appeal from the decision of the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Mississippi appeals from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. HARRISON. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is, Shall the ruling of the Chair stand as the judgment of the Senate? On which the Senator from Mississippi demands the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the reading clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BROUSSARD (when his name was called.) I have a general pair with the senior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. MOSES]. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GERRY], and vote "yea."

Mr. HALE (when his name was called.) I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS] to the junior Senator from Nevada [Mr. ODDIE], and vote "yea."

Mr. SUTHERLAND (when his name was called.) I transfer my general pair with the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] to the junior Senator from New Mexico [Mr. BURSUM], and vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. EDGE. I transfer my general pair with the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] to the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON], and vote "yea."

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I transfer my general pair with the Senator from Maine [Mr. FERNALD] to the Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST], and vote "yea."

Mr. GLASS. I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM]. In his absence I withhold my vote.

So the ruling of the Chair was sustained as the judgment of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will proceed with the reading of the Journal of the proceedings of the last legislative session.

The reading clerk resumed the reading of the Journal of the proceedings of yesterday, and was interrupted by

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will state the parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. HARRISON. The clerk read that the vote was recorded, but did not read the names of the Senators. Are they in the Journal?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. They are. The Secretary will read the names of the Senators recorded for and against the proposition.

The reading clerk read the names of the Senators recorded in the affirmative and in the negative.

The reading of the Journal was resumed and concluded.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is, Shall the Journal of the proceedings of the last legislative day's session be approved?

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I move to amend the Journal by inserting the names of the Senators who answered "present" on the roll calls on yesterday where they fail to appear in the Journal, but appear in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD; and on that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Mississippi moves to amend the Journal by inserting the names of the Senators who answered to the roll call three separate times. Upon that the yeas and nays are demanded.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, let us understand the motion. I did not get it.

Mr. HARRISON. I will say to the Senator from Indiana that the motion I made was this: The Journal says that so many Senators answered to their names but does not name the Senators. I am merely moving that in those instances where a certain number of Members are stated to have answered "present" but their names do not appear, the names of the Senators be inserted as they appear in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Mr. WATSON. I imagine that the motion is entirely in order but I hope it will not be adopted. It would be establishing a bad precedent.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, I am very much surprised to hear the distinguished Senator from Indiana say that it is establishing a bad precedent for the Senate to give publicity in the Journal of this body to what is done here. I am not going to debate the question with the Senator; but the Journal is supposed to be the written record of this body, the monument for future ages to find out what has been done, and surely Senators do not desire to camouflage the Journal by not allowing the names of those who participated in making laws to appear on the face of the Journal. So I think the motion of the Senator is entirely in order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion is not debatable.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President—

Mr. LODGE. The motion is not debatable.

Mr. SWANSON. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion is not debatable. The yeas and nays have been ordered upon it, and the Secretary will call the roll.

The reading clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. SWANSON. I suggested the absence of a quorum, Mr. President, and no Senator has answered yet.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Mississippi moves that the names of the Senators answering on these several roll calls shall be inserted in the Journal.

Mr. SWANSON. And pending that I suggested the absence of a quorum.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I make the point of order that the reading of the Journal can not be interrupted by a call for a quorum.

Mr. SWANSON. It has already been read and approved.

Mr. CURTIS. It can not have been approved if there is a motion to amend it.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, if the Chair will hear me a moment. Of course we know perfectly well what the issue is before the Senate—that there is a bill that it is threatened to take up, the consideration of which some of us are resisting; but in doing that I do not think we should violate the rules on this side or on the side of those who are in favor of taking up the bill. I think the Chair was eminently right a while ago when he held that the reading of the Journal could not be interrupted; but the Journal is the record of the legislative action of this body, and it must speak the truth. I think almost universally it does speak the truth, but it may not at times; and when it does not speak the truth it is perfectly proper for any Senator to move to correct it so that it shall speak the truth, and that is a matter which is open to the consideration of this body in the usual way.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President—

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Just one moment. A motion is made to amend the Journal. That motion the Chair has held in order. Before the motion was put the Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] suggested the absence of a quorum for the purpose of letting absent Senators appear to vote on this motion. That is entirely consistent with the ordinary procedure of the Senate.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is entirely agreed with the Senator from Alabama. The Chair did not hear the Senator from Virginia make the point of no quorum. The Secretary will call the roll upon the point of no quorum.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, will the Senator from Virginia withhold that point of no quorum until I modify my amendment?

Mr. JONES of Washington and Mr. SMOOT. Regular order!

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will call the roll to determine the presence of a quorum.

The roll was called, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ball	George	McNary	Shortridge
Bayard	Glass	Myers	Simmons
Borah	Hale	Nelson	Smoot
Brandeggee	Harrell	New	Sterling
Broussard	Harris	Nicholson	Sutherland
Calder	Harrison	Norris	Swanson

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Sixty-six Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present. The question is upon agreeing to the motion made by the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I desire to modify my motion to the extent of moving that the first roll call of yesterday showing Senators present be inserted in the Journal at the proper place. It is on page 180 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I call attention to Rule IV, in which it is stated that every vote shall be recorded in the minutes, and I ask for the correction of the Journal.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The votes are always recorded and have been read.

Mr. OVERMAN. The votes have not been read, as I understand it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The votes have been read. Responses upon the call for a quorum are now under consideration and have not been read and are not in the Journal.

Mr. OVERMAN. I make the point of order that they should be set out in the Journal.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Mississippi has moved to amend the Journal, and the question is upon the motion.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, before the motion is voted on I would like to say a word. I do not care to go into a general debate of the question, but the Chair intimated a while ago that a vote to amend the Journal is not debatable, and I wish to insist that it is debatable. I think the rule of the Senate clearly states that a motion to amend the Journal is privileged, and there is no rule or precedent to indicate that it is not debatable.

Such motions have been debated in the past, and it must be manifest to the Chair that such a motion is debatable, when the Chair considers that courts rely, in determining the action of the Senate, on the Journal, and you can not go behind the Journal in the courts in determining the action of the Senate. If a legislative mistake has been made in the Journal of necessity it can be amended by the Senate before it has gone too far, and I can not see how it is possible to intelligently correct a mistake that is made unless the proponent of the motion has an opportunity to state wherein a mistake has taken place, and wherein he desires to have the Journal amended; and that is debate.

I have no desire to debate the motion of the Senator from Mississippi, but I insist that it is subject to debate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair has not ruled that it is not debatable.

Mr. LODGE. I ask that rule 3, relating to the Journal, be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read rule 3.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. Rule 3, on pages 6 and 7 of the Senate Manual, reads as follows:

The Presiding Officer having taken the chair, and a quorum being present, the Journal of the preceding day shall be read, and any mistake made in the entries corrected. The reading of the Journal shall not be suspended unless by unanimous consent; and when any motion shall be made to amend or correct the same, it shall be deemed a privileged question and proceeded with until disposed of.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, while the Secretary was reading the rule my attention was called to the Precedents, starting on page 443, away back in the early history of the Senate, where it is shown, on page after page, that motions to expunge, and to insert a message of the President in the Journal, and to correct the Journal were all questions that were debated, so far as an amendment to the Journal is concerned.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Will the Senator from Alabama permit the Chair to observe that he has not ruled that the question is not debatable?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I take it from what the Chair has intimated that he probably will rule that it is debatable, when the time comes, and I shall not occupy the time of the Senate any further.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is of the opinion that the question is debatable.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I did not want it in doubt.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is upon the motion of the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. HARRISON. I would like to have the last motion I made stated by the Secretary. I do not want the Senate to become confused about the important question before it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will state the motion.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. The Senator from Mississippi moves that the journal clerk be instructed to insert in the Journal the names of the Senators who responded on the first roll call of the Senate on yesterday.

Mr. HARRISON. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Assistant Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

So the Senate refused to adjourn.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays on my motion.

Mr. President, on page 291 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD there appears the names of the Senators who responded on the second roll call on yesterday when the suggestion of no quorum was made. I move to amend the Journal by inserting at the proper place the names of the Senators who answered present at that time, as they appear on page 291 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Mississippi.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, so many touching incidents have been referred to in the Senate to-day by my good friend from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON], involving the able and eloquent Senator from Indiana [Mr. WARSON], that I feel it my duty at this time to read excerpts from the Washington Herald of to-day, November 28, regarding the new proposed movement in the Senate of the Old Guard to capture the Progressives. It suggests the old story of "Come into my parlor, said the spider to the fly."

Old Guard fights to win farm vote. Decides to outdo all blocs in showing friendliness for rural interests. To call G. O. P. Senators.

Well, we called several of them home on the 7th of November.

LODGE and several colleagues meet and plan legislation against profiteers.

How startling and amusing! The Old Guard of the Republican Party planning legislation against profiteers! Mr. President, would anybody ever have thought that the recent drubbing that we administered to the Republican Party would have made converts so early—that they would be calling conferences this soon after the election to plan legislation to put the profiteer out of business?

Why, I recall when a group of profiteers came here and knocked at the door of the Senate and demanded, according to pre-election promises that had been made to them, that the excess-profits tax be taken off of them to the extent of $450,000,000.

I recall that, Mr. President, and these profiteers went their way rejoicing, smiling, and looking back over their shoulders, and waving affectionate farewells to the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] and the Senator from Indiana [Mr. WARSON], and others of the Old Guard group. Four hundred and fifty million dollars, nearly half a billion dollars, that they permitted these profiteers to keep out of the Public Treasury for two years. Twice $450,000,000—$900,000,000—lacking only $100,000,000 of being a billion! The profiteers have got that money and gone; and now, after the storm is over and we have weeded out a good many on the other side, the leader of the Old Guard sounds his bugle horn and calls a conference, and the Senator from Indiana claps his hands for joy and says: "We are going to out-Herod Herod, and we are going to dismiss the farm bloc or take it over and put it out of business."

Well, I have rendered service in the farm bloc. A few Democrats over here and a few Republicans from the West got their forces together and put over legislation that the Old Guard tried to defeat, and would have defeated but for this combination of votes in the Senate between the Democrats over here and Republicans from the West. Now the Old Guard lion and the progressive lamb, we are told, are going to lie down together. If they do, when they get up the lamb will be inside the lion. [Laughter.]

Mr. President, when I read this it touches me very deeply. Lend me your ears, Senators, while I read:

Leaders of the Senate Old Guard yesterday resolved upon a bold stroke to head off the farm bloc and get on friendly terms with the farmer vote.

Meeting in Senator LODGE's office, they decided that no bloc in the Senate will be permitted to exhibit greater friendliness for farming interests than will be shown by the old guard itself.

Senators, that is really sufficiently touching to cause tears. It would cause tears amongst the farmers if they thought they were really going to be turned over to the tender mercies of the Old Guard. When I see the Old Guard coming up and offering their services now to take over the progressive Republicans and to have intrusted to them legislation that we propose to put through for the benefit of the American farmer, the American merchant, and the country banker, I think of Aesop's fable of the kite and the pigeon.

You know, the kite is a bird of prey and looks very much like a pigeon; and the kite offered his good offices to the pigeons. He said to them, "There are depredations committed on you from time to time, and I want you to make me your king, and I will protect you from all these other fowls, these cruel birds of prey." So the unsuspecting pigeons elected the kite as their king, and they had a magnificent barn loft in which they spent their evenings and roosted, and the kite was their king, and they would fly out each morning, sometimes, some of them in a considerable hurry. They felt fears they dare not express. They would come back in the evening and they discovered feathers, bones, pigeons' heads, and feet on the floor of the barn loft and the pigeons had a conference of their own when the kite was not present and they resolved:

Whereas the kite has been elected our king; and
Whereas we have caught him devouring pigeons, his own subjects, feeding and fattening upon those that he promised to safeguard and protect: Therefore be it

Resolved, That we depose our king and be done with him for good.

And they did so, and the pigeons went their way and prospered.

There is just as much harmony to be had between a real progressive and a stand-pat Republican as there is between a kite and a pigeon or a hawk and a chicken.

Mr. President, I wish I could have gotten this apparently friendly spirit in the Old Guard crowd when for 18 months I stood here pleading for relief from high rediscount rates, when, under the fight that I made, and some others, we forced the rediscount rate down from 7 per cent to 4½ per cent. I wish that we could have had a little aid from the stand-pat Republicans then. I recall that I had a resolution pending, to force a reduction in the rediscount rate; and the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCLEAN], chairman of the Banking and Currency Committee, one of the chief standpatters, got up here one day and criticized and made fun of my resolution to force down the rediscount rates so that men who needed money could get money to carry on their business. When I see these Senators coming over and wanting to take the Progressives into their bosoms and have the farming interests intrusted to them, finding out since the election is past that something is happening in the country, I am reminded of what the son of the author of Greer's Almanac said on one occasion. They said to him: "Boy, are you such a prophet as your father was? Can you predict what the weather is going to be as he could?" He said, "I do not know that I have any of my father's qualities as a prophet." He said, "There is this difference between me and my father: He could always tell when it was going to rain, and I can always tell when it has rained." [Laughter.] So you can tell by what these standpatters are undertaking to do that we had a rain or, rather, a perfect deluge of ballots on the 7th day of November, and they are seeking now not to aid the Progressives but to swallow them up. They are seeking now to take them over and to operate on them.

You Progressives submit yourselves to the tender mercies of these smooth artists of the Old Guard, and when you come out of there you will not feel half so frisky as you do now.

Mr. President, here is another very touching thing:

At the meeting in LODGE's office the Old Guard Senators agreed among themselves that high freight rates and the new tariff law are in no way to blame for the existing high cost of food products. Responsibility for the same was charged to profiteering by Senator WARSON and others who addressed the gathering. Hence it was decided to make a general assault upon profiteering under the Old Guard auspices.

Mr. President, when I was at home just after the election I saw an auto truck hauling cotton out of my town to La Grange, Ga., a distance of about 35 or 40 miles. There were 20 bales of cotton on this truck, which was speeding along through the country. I hailed the young man driving the truck, and he stopped. I said, "Where are you taking that cotton?" He said, "Over to the La Grange cotton mill." I said, "Cotton must be very scarce over there. They must be hard pressed for cotton when you are carrying to them only 20 bales." He said, "No, sir; I have been hauling cotton all the fall from Lafayette—my home town—to La Grange in auto trucks." Senators, that presents a serious problem. I said to him, "Do you mean to tell me that you can haul cotton in an auto truck, making these trips constantly, day after day, from Lafayette to La Grange, and haul it cheaper than it can be hauled on the railroad, 500 to 1,000 bales at a time?" He said, "Yes, sir; much cheaper." And yet here the Old Guard says that high freight rates have nothing to do with the high cost of living.

I want to tell the Senate to-day that freight rates are practically prohibitive in many instances.

Freight rates are so high that the farmers can not afford to ship their stuff, and when the freight price is charged in it increases the price to the consumer, and the whole business is hurt; the railroads are hurt, the producer is hurt, and the auto trucks are cutting into the business of the railroads. It would really benefit the railroads to lower the freight rate on many things, because the traffic would greatly increase and they would make more money. I want a freight rate that will be fair to the shipper, fair to the railroad, and fair to the consumer.

I pointed out before, Mr. President, that it is contended the Republican tariff has nothing to do with the increased cost of living; and that is said here. I can cite one instance—the case of sugar. They have increased the price of sugar 2 cents a pound by law. Of course, that increases the cost of living, so far as sugar is concerned. We have all been told that every one of us has a sweet tooth, and if that is true, everybody might just as well get ready to consult his dentist under Republican rule, because that tooth has to come out. [Laughter.] Sugar is increased by law 2 cents a pound.

That is not all. They say the cost of living is not increased. Cement is a thing in common use. We use it for nearly everything about the home, the farm, the town. We use it for sidewalks, for streets, for roads from the farm to market, and for building bridges over little streams and creeks and rivers.

We use it for making water troughs for stock. It is used to make posts for use in constructing wire fences. They use it to make stables for horses and warehouses for cotton, oats, and wheat, and things of that kind. They use it for making dwelling houses, church houses, schoolhouses; but the Republicans put a tax of about 11 cents a hundred on cement for the benefit of the Cement Trust of Michigan. Yet they say in this little statement that their tariff tax had nothing to do with increasing the burden of the man who has to buy these things, the common necessities of life.

That is not all they have done. They have put a tax on salt of about 15 cents a hundred pounds. That is an increase of 30 cents on a 200-pound sack of salt, and we use salt in our bread; we use it to season our food; we use it to cure and save our meat; and the Republican Party, under the leadership of the Old Guard, has put a tax on salt, one of the commonest necessities of life. They took salt off the free list, where the Democrats had it, and they have increased the price about 30 cents on a sack of salt by the action of a stand-pat Republican Congress. If I had voted the Republican ticket and had stood for putting a tax on salt I could never look a salt cellar in the face again. [Laughter.] Yet these Old Guard fellows say these things have nothing to do with increasing the cost of living.

This gives us a sample of how the lion is going to swallow the lamb. They are not going to touch any big, questionable, and oppressive interest. You need not look for that from the Old Guard. They bow and smile to them; but let one of these little interests come creeping along and they pounce upon it. Did you ever see one of these big dogs amongst a lot of other dogs a little smaller than he; how he would growl and throw up the hair on his neck, then in dog language talk to them and intimidate them, and then, when some great big dog would come along, how this dog would lower his bristles and bow and smile at this other bigger dog? That is the way these stand-pat Republicans do when certain big oppressive interests come around. That is the bunch that is now undertaking to swallow the Progressives.

Mr. President, what they will do to these special interests would be accepted by them with smiles and thanksgiving, and with all the good graces with which a bride and groom accept the shower of rice thrown upon them when leaving on their bridal tour. Have you seen a bride and groom come down to the station and their friends come and shower them with rice? That is the sort of battle the Old Guard are going to carry on against these crooked special interests in the country, and they are inviting the Progressives to join them. The Progressives really have some spikes in their clubs. They can do some damage to the crooked interests if they will use them properly. But these fellows want to get them over, so that they can take the spikes out of their clubs, and let them have a pillow battle with these oppressive interests. The standpatters want you to substitute feather pillows for spiked clubs. The situation reminds me of another thing. One of our negro soldiers, when he was going into the service, was brought up, and they said to him,

"What is your name?"

He said, "My name is Sam."

"Where do you live, Sam?"

He said, "I lives out here about 5 miles."

They said, "Designate some spot, because we want to get your post-office address. Have you any family out there?"

He said, "Yes, sah; my mammy lives out there."

"What is her post-office address?"

He said, "What do you want to know that for? She ain't gwine to war, is she?"

"No," they said; "but we want to know where to ship your remains in case—"

He said, "How is that?"

"We want to know where we are to ship your remains if"—

"Ship whose remains?"

"Your remains."

He reached for his hat and fled through the open door, and as he passed out at the door he hollered back to the officer, "They ain't gwine to be no remains." [Laughter.]

I am serving notice on my Progressive friends now that if they walk into that stand-pat, Old Guard trap "there ain't going to be no remains." [Laughter.] The Old Guard will just simply swallow you whole.

There are some more really touching lines in this article, Mr. President. Let me read this on rural credits:

A rural credit bill, to extend a larger measure of credit to the farmer, thereby enabling him to weather the period between harvesting and marketing of his crops, is another measure which will be pressed by the new farm group. That is the group to be formed by the Old Guard.

Mr. President, we passed a resolution which had two sections in it, one reviving the War Finance Corporation, the other requesting the banks to loan money at the lowest rate of interest in keeping with sound banking, and the Old Guard of the Republican House struck it out and the Old Guard in this body made no complaint about it being stricken out. They wanted it stricken out. We were trying then to devise some means to give the farmer aid in the way of credit, and they had an opportunity to do it, and when the opportunity was presented, they struck the farmer over the head with a club, and they denied him the little relief we offered in section 2 of that resolution.

Now, after the election rain has come and the political storm has passed, these old stand-pat fellows, like Greer's Almanac boy, can tell when it has rained, and they are now offering to do something for the farmer of the South and West, all this after he has been literally robbed of $15,000,000,000 in two years' time. Those who permitted the robbery, those who sanctioned the pillage and plunder, are now saying, "Let us now go to his rescue." Mr. President, such legislation as these gentlemen might effect would not help the farmers of the United States.

There was a Senator in this body who finally fell half-heartedly in line with us, and halfway supported some of these measures. But the farmers of his State could not be fooled. He was defeated. You can not fool the farmers about these things. The Senator who, when forced to meet an issue, when there is no escape, has to vote, will sometimes vote for one of these meritorious measures because he is afraid to vote against it; but that is not the sort of friend the farmer wants in this body. It is the man who is thinking of something that will help the farmer, who is always working for something that will bring him relief, who is his friend in season and out, and who is trying to protect him from those who pillage and plunder him. That is the sort of man who ought to be here, and not the man who, when he is forced to do it, will vote and then walk back into the cloak room and say, "I hated to vote for that, but there was no other alternative under the circumstances." The sooner such Senators get out of here the better it will be, and I do not want these Progressives to be deceived by any honeyed word the Old Guard will now hand out to him in order to hamstring or forestall him. They have more devious aisles and crooked walks and curious labyrinthian ways in that thing they are inviting you into than you ever saw, and you had better stay out of it. You have seen a fly perform on Tangle-Foot, have you not? [Laughter.] Whenever they get you in there and you commence trying to fly, the more you try to fly the harder you stick, and anyway, if ever the farmers see you come out of one of these stand-pat caucuses, they will whisper out of the sides of their mouths and say, "By golly, they've got him."

I am giving you warning. You had better steer clear of that thing. It is loaded. You know they say the first fellow who ever tasted strychnine did not know what it was, but he was a clever man and he wanted to help humanity. He felt the deadening effect of the drug before he died and he wrote a note and fastened it to it.

It read, "This stuff is poison." That thing I am talking to you about has poison in it. You had better stay out of it. If I catch any of you in there I am going to talk some about it myself here, because I want you to be foot-loose so that you can work with me and with others on this side on measures that will benefit the masses. We are going to try to do something for the country banker in the next Congress, and for the country merchant and the farmer and the laboring man, the doctor, the lawyer, the preacher, the teacher—the whole mass of the American people. We are going to wring out of the hands of a coterie of plutocrats in Wall Street the control of the money supply and credit of a hundred million people, and they see it. They are trying now to disarm you and fix you so that you will be harmless.

You know what Æsop's fable said the farmer did with the lion, do you not? He said the lion courted the farmer's daughter, and he asked the farmer to give him his daughter in marriage, and the farmer said, "I am afraid you will scratch her and bite her."

He said, "No; I would not."

The farmer said, "I am afraid you would."

The lion said, "What suggestion have you to make?"

The farmer said, "Go and have your teeth knocked out and your claws cut off."

He did, and when he came back he was a pitiful looking object, and then the farmer knocked him in the head with a stick.

When you Progressives go into this arrangement with the standpatters of the Old Guard they are going to knock your progressive teeth out and cut your progressive claws, and you will not be in any condition for fighting them.

Mr. President, I must comment a moment more on the grim determination of the standpatters of the Old Guard to provide—

A rural credit law to extend a larger measure of credit to farmers.

Oh, how touching, how pathetic it is, to see the Old Guard sitting up at night planning ways and means for extending larger measures of credit to the farmers of the United States. It is both pleasing and refreshing. It gives us in a way a gleam of hope, because they know what we are going to do unto them in the next Congress. That is it, and they are trying to forestall action. They are undertaking to break up any plan that we may effect by which legislation can be passed in this body.

I want to see the Progressives remain out of the dilemma into which they are being invited.

There is one other story that illustrates the situation. I believe I have two minutes more until 2 o'clock. That is the story of the boy who went out from one of our States—a pretty wild, reckless fellow. He went away, and in his expeditions came in contact with a tiger and the tiger disposed of him. They wired the old man at home that this thing had happened, that his son had been killed by a tiger, and asked the old man what disposition he wanted them to make of the remains. He wired them to send the body home. When the crated arrangement arrived the old man went down, opened it, and found there the body of a dead tiger. The old man said: "I shall not pay any express on that package. That is a tiger. I wired them to send my son's body." They wired back to the old man, "Son in tiger." I can see your finish now if you go into any meetings with the Old Guard crowd. When you come out the Progressives will be inside the standpatters, and that will be the end. I beg of you to beware of such a finish.

Now, Mr. President, the hour of 2 has arrived, and I ask for the yeas and nays on the motion of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON].

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. JONES of Washington in the chair). The yeas and nays have already been ordered.

Mr. McCUMBER (after having voted in the negative). I transfer my pair as on the previous roll call and will allow my vote to stand.

So the Senate refused to adjourn.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I desire to offer an amendment.

On yesterday, as shown by the Journal, page 3, the Journal says that Mr. LADD presented numerous petitions of citizens of North Dakota praying for the enactment of legislation providing for the stabilization of wheat prices. This is such an important question that certainly the Journal should state the localities in which the citizens reside who pray for this legislation. So I move that the Journal be amended so as to state from what places in North Dakota those petitions come, and on that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Mississippi moves to amend the Journal in the respect mentioned, and on that motion he asks for the yeas and nays. Is the request seconded?

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the reading clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BROUSSARD (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as before, I vote "yea."

Mr. EDGE (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as to transfer, I vote "nay."

So Mr. HARRISON's motion was rejected.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, on the approval of the Journal I want to say a few words, not entirely along the line of the approval of the Journal, before I make another motion to adjourn.

We are not disguising what is being done on this side of the Chamber. It must be apparent, not only to the Senate but to the country, that an effort is being made to prevent the consideration of a certain bill, and I want to be perfectly candid about it. The bill is known in the RECORD as the Dyer bill, I believe; I have forgotten its number. It is known throughout the country generally as a "force" bill.

Now, I want to say that I stand for law and order. I believe in enforcing laws, even if I did not approve of the laws on their passage. I think that in a government of law, law must be enforced, and enforced by the judicial tribunals of the country and not by mobs or collections of citizens who think that they can administer the law better than the law can administer itself.

So when I say that I am opposed to the passage of this so-called "force" bill it is not that I favor mob law under any circumstances. But under the Constitution of our country the power of government was divided between the Government at Washington, known as the Federal Government, and the governments in the several States, and I think that should this so-called Dyer bill, or "force" bill, become a law it would be the beginning of tearing down the last fabric left in the Constitution to support the integrity of the State governments. There never has been a time in my own State when it was necessary for me to lift up my voice for the enforcement of the law through orderly procedure that I have failed to do so. There never has been a time when it was a question of the enforcement of the law or the rule of the mob that I have not condemned mob rule. But I think that if the bill became a law it would threaten the very fabric of our Government, and it is not going to become a law at this session of Congress.

I do not say that captiously. I think all men here know that under the rules of the Senate when 15 or 20 or 25 men say that you can not pass a certain bill, it can not be passed. You could not pass your tariff bill last summer until we agreed to vote on it, and you are not going to get an agreement to vote on this bill. It is perfectly apparent that you are not going to get an agreement to vote on it. If you should change the rules, and adopt a cloture rule under which the majority would have a right to cut off debate, the majority could pass any bill they wanted to.

Mr. McKELLAR. They could not do it at this session.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. They could not do it at this session, of course, and under the rules of procedure in the Senate this is an impossible proposition.

In what I say to the leadership on the other side of the Senate I am not reflecting on their effort. They have made their effort. But there is great business of the country to be transacted. With the growth of business in this country it is a difficult problem to pass the supply bills at a short session of Congress. There is other legislation approaching that is of moment, legislation for which many of us may not vote, but which is entitled to consideration.

At the last session of Congress we had this "force" bill up, and I think I very candidly stated to the Senate when it was up that we did not propose to allow it to be passed, and I want to say right now to the Senate that if the majority party insist on this procedure they are not going to pass the bill, and they are not going to do any other business. There are a large number of men whose names have been sent to the Senate, who have been appointed to important offices, and who are entitled to confirmation, and who ought to be confirmed; but they are not going to be confirmed; we are going to transact no more business until we have an understanding about this bill.

I am saying this because I am not trying to put the responsibility upon the other side. They can say I said it.

Mr. WATSON. Will the Senator permit a question?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Certainly.

Mr. WATSON. Has the Senator conferred with a sufficient number of his colleagues on the other side to be able to speak for them and know that they will second his efforts along the line he suggests?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I have not conferred with them as in a conference; that was not necessary. The Senator knows perfectly well that the representatives in the Senate from a very large portion of the United States, representing a number of States, will never allow a force bill to pass. A conference is not necessary to enlighten us on that point. The record votes here all morning are a demonstration of what I say, that I am not saying this for myself, that I am not making this statement alone. Let the Senator consider the record of the roll calls in the Senate this morning.

If you gentlemen want to continue, after this candid statement of the case, and keep this bill before the Senate, when you know it is going to be blocked and can not be passed, thereby stopping the transaction of all other business, go ahead, and we will have roll calls and move adjournments day and night. We can alternate between roll calls and motions to adjourn. If you do not intend to do that, we might as well come to an understanding and lay the bill aside, because you can not pass it. You know you can not pass it. Then let us go along and attend to the business of the country.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I yield.

Mr. SIMMONS. I wanted to say to the Senator from Indiana, who asked a question of the Senator from Alabama a little while ago, that in my judgment, after talking with a great many Senators on this side of the Chamber, I think the position of the Senator from Alabama is absolutely the attitude of the Senators on this side of the Chamber.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I am sure of that; but I did not want to speak for anyone except myself. The RECORD speaks for other Senators. That is the situation here, and I think we had better clear the deck and confirm the men whose nominations are coming in. The members of the majority party do not have to take the responsibility. We are willing to take the responsibility, and we are going to do it. Unless we can come to some understanding about this matter I propose, before yielding the floor, to make another motion to adjourn, and ask for the yeas and nays on it.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President—

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I withhold the motion a moment, if the Senator desires to say something.

Mr. EDGE. I desire to get the floor to make a parliamentary inquiry. Has there been any business transacted since the last motion to adjourn?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. We have just voted on a motion to amend the journal.

Mr. EDGE. If the Senator insists on a motion to adjourn—

Mr. UNDERWOOD. If the Senator desires to say something I will withhold it.

Mr. EDGE. I am simply going to make a short reply to the Senator after the motion to adjourn is voted on, if he insists on making it.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I withdraw the motion temporarily, until the Senator from New Jersey has had a chance to make a speech.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, I am sure all Senators admire at least the frankness of the Senator from Alabama in his very positive statement. I might say challenge, that if dilatory tactics can prevent we will not be permitted to vote upon this bill, or, more than that, the bill will not even be permitted to become the unfinished business, which is the pending question, as I understand it.

I listened with a great deal of entertainment, as I always do, to the speech of the Senator from Mississippi this morning, when he seemed to be so distressed that business was not conducted in the open, indicating that he was so anxious that business should be transacted absolutely in the open, so that the American people could be cognizant of what was going on.

I wonder, then, why the present situation will not appeal to the Senator from Mississippi. Here is a measure which has passed the other branch of Congress. No man can deny that it is for the purpose of trying to curb to some extent, or alleviate, a condition existing to-day in our country which no Senator on either side of the Chamber will attempt to defend. Why not permit it properly to come to a vote in the open, and not attempt to defeat by technicalities what probably could not be beaten by argument or debate?

I can not discuss and have no intention of discussing the constitutional side of the question, and to be perfectly frank about it, with all due regard to my oath to uphold the Constitution, I will not say that the constitutional side of the question does not concern me, because, of course, it concerns all of us, but it is difficult, especially for a layman, to decide such questions, when able lawyers on that side of the Chamber in any issue which may be brought up, not only this one, will contend with great emphasis and positiveness that the measure is or is not constitutional, and just as able lawyers on this side will take the opposite side of the case, so far as the constitutionality of the measure is concerned, or vice versa.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President—

Mr. EDGE. I hope the Senator will permit me to continue. I attempted to interrupt the Senator from Mississippi this morning, but he refused to be interrupted. I want to be courteous, and in the few moments that I shall take the time of the Senate I would like to be permitted to speak without interruption.

Therefore the question of constitutionality, it seems to me, becomes to a great extent so uncertain and involved that again, I repeat, it is difficult, at least for laymen, and I am quite sure almost equally for lawyers, to decide for themselves positively whether a suggested measure is or is not constitutional.

In any event, laws of the character of this measure are naturally carried to the Supreme Court for review, and questions of constitutionality are properly decided there. So, waiving that, as I can not decide, and I am sure able lawyers on the other side can not decide it, and I am sure able lawyers on this side can not decide it, let us, therefore, face the unescapable fact that it is our duty to try in some way to help alleviate or solve this disgraceful condition.

It is well known that there is a spirit of unrest all over the country to-day, a spirit of unrest which has been developed by recent happenings, the Great War and other things; that we are having outbreaks in our own country among people in no way associated with lynching; outbreaks of all kinds, apparently against the Government, and hundreds of thousands of people in this country are subscribing to the Constitution only sufficiently to keep themselves out of jail. We know that a spirit of unrest exists all over the nation, and yet we, the Senate of the United States, facing and knowing the situation which exists, not only in the Southern States, but to some extent in other States of the Union, where men take the law in their own hands and decide cases without trial and even commit murder, we refuse, on some technical ground of constitutionality, to even attempt to relieve that situation.

It is the duty of the Senate to enact legislation of this character, or some measure that would serve to give the power of the Federal Government, of the central government, to any State of the Union which, either because it wants to or otherwise, fails to punish such blots on the life of the nation, as these recurrences of unpunished lynchings can only be classified.

I do not see, Mr. President, how we can expect to furnish an example to the nation, generally speaking the other 110,000,000 or 112,000,000 of people, and encourage them to uphold the laws, when we sit supinely by and make absolutely no effort to place the power of the Federal Government in such position that it can assist in enforcing the laws of the land. If the Constitution means anything, and it does, it means that we guarantee life and liberty to all citizens of the country. It means that we promise a trial by jury for any offense of whatever character, and we are certainly making absolutely no effort to carry out the mandates or provisions of the Constitution. We can not, in my judgment, afford to sit here and not make some effort, whether it be successful or otherwise. The continued recurrence of these massacres in different sections of the country is a condition and not a theory. It is our duty to make some effort in the hope that it may strengthen the Government, the police powers, the prosecuting powers, and the courts in those sections of the country where none or little attention seems to be paid to these crimes or their punishment. No one can for a moment—

Mr. REED of Missouri. Mr. President—

Mr. EDGE. If the Senator will wait a moment I shall conclude. No one can say for a moment that crimes of the character that usually bring about or inspire these lynchings will not be properly punished by the courts. I am sure no one on either side of the Chamber would defend a situation that would permit lynchings rather than proper court trials, for they have said that they would not, and I know they would not. I do not raise the question at all. Then why can it be any reflection upon a State if the Government, as provided in the pending measure, offers its cooperation and its assistance to try to help curb a situation and make it more positive that a fair trial will be given any man accused of crime—murder or whatever the offense may be?

We legislate here to try to relieve the economic situation. We legislate here to try to bring back prosperity in industrial and agricultural sections, and very properly so. Yet we refuse to legislate to try to assist in a situation where, of course, the most sacred thing of all is involved, that of human life. We can not, I repeat, in justice to ourselves and our responsibilities, sit here and continue to depend upon the States to mete out justice as the Constitution promises when we know perfectly well that in many instances it is not being done. We evade the responsibility when, by dilatory tactics or in any other way, a frank, open opportunity to vote yea or nay on the bill is denied. If the majority of the Senate favors it, enact it into law, and let it become the law and see if it will not at least contribute something toward a situation which everyone must admit is intolerable. Face it in the open and do not strangle it.

Now, Mr. President, I realize the feeling in some sections, which is very unfortunate, I think, that seems to exist and makes the opposition to the bill so determined, I might even say bitter. I realize that the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], if I understood him correctly, very properly said that he would in no way defend mob violence or these uprisings against the law. Of course, he would not. Neither would any other Senator or any other red-blooded American citizen. But the fact remains that they are occurring and, I believe, increasing. The fact remains that we have done nothing in any way, so far as I know, to try to curb them.

The fact remains that our country is badly disturbed to-day because of internal borings from within and opposition to law and order and even the Constitution. If we do not set the example in this Chamber, then we in effect, by our silence and our unwillingness to help the situation, practically condone or indorse the conditions as they now exist.

Mr. President, I simply wanted to go on record. I fear what the Senator from Alabama said may be true—that the opposition will not permit us to have an opportunity to vote on the bill. I want to go on record, at least, while the bill was before the Senate as absolutely in favor of some method which would give the strength and power of the Federal Government to at least try to stop these dastardly crimes which are such an unpardonable blot upon our civilization.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I do not wonder that the Senator from New Jersey has some suggestions to make about the bill, in particular, and nonenforcement of law generally. We have had in New Jersey, his own State, one of the most remarkable examples of unpunished crime up to this date that the country has known for many years. Some one killed a minister and a choir singer in the Senator's home State, and, so far as the country knows, there has been no real effort to punish the criminals who perpetrated the crime. It is perfectly remarkable how a Senator can condemn crime in such severe terms when it occurs outside of his State, and how little attention he pays to horrible crimes that occur within his State. A very wise man, the Savior of the world, said some few thousand years ago, "Why beholdest thou the mote that is in thy brother's eye but perceivest not the beam that is in thine own eye." If there is a lynching in Illinois, and they very frequently occur there, or in Texas, or in Georgia, as they sometimes occur there, the Senator from New Jersey feels the enormity of the crime to such an extent that he would come here and openly say, as he has to-day said, that he is even willing to violate the Constitution of the United States, which he has sworn to uphold, in order to punish those crimes.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, I can not permit that statement to go unchallenged. I said nothing of the kind, as I am quite sure an examination of the record of my remarks will demonstrate.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator said that he was even willing to wink at the Constitution or trespass upon it or to take it with a grain of allowance when it comes to these lynching crimes in other people's States. As the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN] well reminds me, he said that because he is not a lawyer, he would be willing to take refuge in his ignorance of the law in order to see if he could not punish such crimes in other States; but we never have heard him say a word, we have never heard a protest, at any time since the remarkable New Brunswick crime that has gone unpunished in his own State. I believe nine-tenths of the people of the United States could put their finger on the murderer this moment and yet the murderer has gone unblushingly unpunished in his own State.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President—

Mr. McKELLAR. I decline to yield. The Senator was not courteous enough to yield to me a few moments ago and I decline to yield to him now.

The Senator talks about great lawyers on the other side of the Chamber having different opinions on this bill from lawyers on this side of the Chamber. Aside from the Senator in charge of the bill in this body, I want to know what lawyer on the other side of the Chamber says the measure is constitutional?

If there is anyone on the other side of the Chamber who will say it is constitutional, I am going to stop long enough to give him an opportunity to rise in his place and say that he believes it is constitutional. I will wait a little while to give him the opportunity. I am waiting.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE rose.

Mr. McKELLAR. Oh, yes, of course we understand the Senator from California takes that view. We all know that he believes it constitutional. We know that the Senator from California has a very positive view about its constitutionality, and I excepted him from the lawyers on that side of the aisle when I made the proposition. Are there any other lawyers who believe it constitutional?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I presume there are.

Mr. McKELLAR. Will the Senator say there are any lawyers on his side of the Chamber besides himself who believe it constitutional?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. There are greater lawyers than the Senator from Tennessee—

Mr. McKELLAR. I would like to have them rise and say it is constitutional.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Who think it is entirely constitutional, and who believe it wise and wholesome legislation.

Mr. McKELLAR. Will the Senator name a lawyer on his side of the Chamber who believes it is constitutional legislation?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. They will answer for themselves.

Mr. McKELLAR. I wait for the Senator to answer my inquiry.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Senators on my side of the Chamber will answer for themselves.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator from California was undertaking to answer for them.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I know there are lawyers on this side of the Chamber, lawyers learned in the law, who sincerely believe that the proposed legislation is and will be held to be entirely constitutional. I know there are other able lawyers, for whose learning I have unqualified respect, upon the other side of the Chamber who think otherwise. I know that on propositions of this kind, in matters of this nature, honorable men, intellectual men, thoughtful men, may differ; and as for me, no difference of opinion that might exist as between myself, humble as I am, and the Senator, distinguished as he is, would cause me to question the motives of Senators, certainly not affect my regard for them socially or in any other way.

But I beg the Senator's pardon—

Mr. McKELLAR. I am delighted to yield to the Senator.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I did not intend to interrupt the Senator in this way or to this extent.

Mr. McKELLAR. Oh, no; I hope the Senator will proceed. I am delighted to yield to him.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I think that a dispassionate, careful study of the bill and its different sections, in view of the decisions of our Supreme Court, will convince many Members of this body that it is competent for Congress to enact it; but even so, admitting its constitutionality, there might be reasons advanced which would make the legislation unwise. I can well understand that honorable men who love their States, who love their Government, and who are devoted to both, as I claim to be to both, might, while admitting the constitutionality of the proposed measure, oppose it with earnestness and vigor, and resort to all permissible parliamentary action to defeat the bill. I did not rise to say that much. I do not answer for others, but I have in mind Senators who are members of the Committee on the Judiciary, and from an expression of their views I can not but believe they agree with me that the proposed measure is constitutional.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator in his statement has in no place answered my challenge, which is to name lawyers on the Committee on the Judiciary on his side of the Chamber, and representing that side of the Chamber, who believe that the proposed measure is constitutional. I renew the challenge now. If there is any lawyer on that side other than the Senator from California, whose views we all know, who believe that the measure would be constitutional if enacted into law, let him rise in his place and say so now.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Will the Senator yield just a moment?

Mr. McKELLAR. Certainly.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I think if the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING] were in his place he would rise and say that he thought it constitutional.

Mr. McKELLAR. Is the Senator from South Dakota the only one?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I think there are others, but I am not here to answer for them, nor would it be proper for me to undertake to do so.

Mr. McKELLAR. Is it possible that the Senate is asked to pass a law that is so evidently unconstitutional that there are only two lawyers on the Judiciary Committee of the Senate who are willing to say that it is constitutional or who believe that it is constitutional?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I answer that a majority of the Committee on the Judiciary reported the bill favorably; and I undertake to say that there are quite a number of Senators who will answer the question of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR].

Mr. OVERMAN. Will the Senator from Tennessee yield to me at that point?

Mr. McKELLAR. I wish to say—

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Let me finish the statement.

Mr. McKELLAR. I challenge any Senator on the other side of the Chamber who is a lawyer and who believes this bill is constitutional to rise up and say so. I should like to hear him do so.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. If that is a permissible way of carrying on debate, later on I think the Senator will have answers to his question.

Mr. OVERMAN. The Senator from California stated that a majority of the Judiciary Committee reported the pending bill favorably. I should like to ask the Senator if a majority of the Republican members of the committee, including the leading lawyers on the committee, in voting to report the bill did not state that they had grave doubt about the constitutionality of the measure?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. That may be so.

Mr. OVERMAN. Is it not so?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. It is as to one or two Senators on the committee, certainly.

Mr. OVERMAN. If I recollect aright, the Senator from California and the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING], of all the members of that great committee, many of them being present, were the only ones who said that the bill was constitutional, and the Senator from California cited, in support of his opinion that it was constitutional, a dissenting opinion by Justice Harlan of the Supreme Court.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Let me first answer the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield to the Senator from California to answer me. I should like to have all the light possible on this question. I do not serve on the Judiciary Committee myself, and I am wondering what is sought to be "put over" on those of us who do not believe in the constitutionality of this bill.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Is the Senator willing—

Mr. McKELLAR. If the Senator from California will allow me just a moment, I should like to ask him how he can claim that the United States Government can take jurisdiction constitutionally over the crime of murder by lynching when it does not have jurisdiction over the crime of murder, such as was committed recently at New Brunswick, N. J.?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I do not think it is timely to enter upon a law lecture in order to teach the Senator from Tennessee some of the fundamental principles of our Government.

Mr. McKELLAR. If I desired such teaching, I certainly would not go to the Senator from California for it; he would be the last Senator in the Chamber to whom I would go.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. The Senator from Tennessee started off in a method of debate that I do not regard as courteous.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator from California should not have made that statement.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I will withdraw it if the Senator will amend his reply.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator ought to withdraw it. He does himself no credit when he makes such a statement as that.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I answer the Senator from Tennessee for the moment by saying—and I have put my thoughts into writing and they are in print—that I think this proposed legislation is constitutional.

Mr. McKELLAR. I started out with that assumption, in so far as the view of the Senator from California is concerned, and so stated specifically.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. One moment, please. In other words, I think that it is perfectly competent for Congress to enact legislation of this kind. I think that under the provisions of our Constitution where a State, either by affirmative action or by nonaction, and continuous nonaction, denies to any citizen—indeed, any person—within its jurisdiction "the equal protection of the laws," or where by affirmative action, speaking through the legislative department or the executive department or the judicial department, deprives any person, any citizen of the United States, within its jurisdiction of "life, liberty, or property without due process of law," or where, to be brief, by action or by nonaction a State denies to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws, then under the fourteenth amendment of the Constitution of our country it is competent for Congress by "appropriate legislation" to give that protection and to prevent that denial. I wish to say further, as to the fifth section of the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution, that it is competent for Congress to adopt the ways and means, to hit upon such legislation as it considers "appropriate legislation," in order to safeguard the rights which are guaranteed by the Constitution itself. I beg to add that there are other provisions of the Constitution upon which I rely for support of my contention that this proposed legislation is constitutional, such, for example, as the fifth amendment and paragraph 10 of section 5 of Article I.

With great respect for the Senator from Tennessee—and I will not, I hope, be forgetful of where I am—speaking as a lawyer, and with due reverence for the Constitution, and having in mind all the decisions upon the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution and the many decisions which have a bearing upon this problem, I say finally and with respect for the Supreme Court of the United States, I think they have emasculated the fourteenth amendment by one, and perhaps by two, of their decisions. I think, however, that the decisions which I have in mind are not controlling and that the features of this bill will be found to be in harmony with the Supreme Court's decisions; and if not in harmony with past decisions, yet this proposed legislation is within the four corners of the letter and the spirit of the fourteenth amendment.

I did not intend to argue the question now, and I have not; I merely answer the Senator in this brief way.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I wish to call attention to the fact that we all understood the views of the Senator from California; but it is quite remarkable that if he has those views he has been utterly unable to influence the opinions of any other member of his committee, Democrat or Republican. We understand here from the statement which has just been made by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN] there are only two members of the committee to whom the idea even suggested itself that the bill is constitutional.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President, I feel warranted in saying that the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] believes the proposed law constitutional.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, the Senator from Iowa expressed great doubt about the measure and said he voted for it with the understanding that he might vote against it when it came up in the Senate.

Mr. McKELLAR. Of course; and we all know that there is no more authority for passing this proposed law as to murder by lynching than there is for passing a law punishing any other kind of murder.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. McKELLAR. Just one moment, and I will yield to the Senator—

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I merely wish to ask a question.

Mr. McKELLAR. I decline to yield to the Senator now.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Very well.

Mr. McKELLAR. We all know that there is no more justification under the Constitution for the passage of this measure, which would punish the crime of murder by lynching, than there would be to pass a law to punish the crime of murder committed in any other way. Is it possible that we are going to do as the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. EDGE] suggests, namely, treat the Constitution as a scrap of paper? I do not believe Senators generally will do that; certainly the lawyers in this body on either side are not going to do that. The great lawyers on the Judiciary Committee have none of them asserted the constitutionality of this measure or said that, in their belief, if passed it would be constitutional. Most of them hold that it is unconstitutional, and we all know it is unconstitutional. We are treating our Constitution as a scrap of paper when we undertake to push forward this measure.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator for just a moment?

Mr. McKELLAR. With pleasure.

Mr. CARAWAY. I was going to ask the Senator if he thought there was really any design in the language of the first section, commencing on line 3, which reads:

That the phrase "mob or riotous assemblage," when used in this act, shall mean an assemblage composed of three or more persons acting in concert for the purpose of depriving any person of his life without authority of law—as a punishment for or to prevent the commission of some actual or supposed public offense.

Senators will observe that a riot like the one which took place in Illinois could not be reached, nor could one like that which took place in the hop fields of California; they are absolutely exempted; and the only mob which may be touched is one which undertakes to punish a man for the violation of some public law or to prevent such a violation of the law. If it were desired to form a mob to put a man to death for any other purpose, under this bill, of course, it would be entirely lawful.

Mr. McKELLAR. Of course, the Senator understands that it is not the intention of the Senator from California to include California in the measure. His idea is to include occurrences which take place a long distance off in other States.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. No, Senator; I have expressed my views upon that subject and disavowed any such thought.

Mr. McKELLAR. I decline to yield to the Senator. I will yield to the Senator in a few moments.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. The Senator must not put such words in my mouth.

Mr. CARAWAY. I say the very language of the bill would make it absolutely impossible for the Federal Government to interfere where a riot had occurred and life had been taken unless the riot or mob sought to accomplish one of two purposes, either to punish a man for a crime or to prevent the commission of a crime.

Mr. McKELLAR. Apparently the Senator from Arkansas is entirely right in that contention. I have not examined the language carefully, but I think that is the purpose in view.

Mr. CARAWAY. If I may be permitted just a word further, the Senator from California—and I have a great liking for him; he is one of the most delightful men I know—gave a reason just a moment ago for thinking that this proposed law might be constitutional, saying in effect that he thought the Supreme Court would reverse itself and agree with him.

Mr. McKELLAR. I wish to say to the Senator from California, then, that he ought to start out by first converting the Republican members of his own committee. I should like for him to do that. If he could get the Republican members of his own committee to agree with him as to the constitutionality of the measure we would have more respect for his views about the Constitution.

Of course, we all know the kindly disposition of the Senator from California. He is a very great friend of the colored man. His purpose is to endeavor to do something for the benefit of this so-called downtrodden race. I wish to say to the Senator that I know a great deal more about the colored race than does he. I was born and reared amongst them; I have a great liking for them; I believe that equal and exact justice ought to be done to them; I would not have an injustice done them; I do not believe in lynching any more than does the Senator from California; I do not believe in illegal executions any more than does the Senator from California; I do not believe in the disregard for any law any more than does the Senator from California; I believe that the laws ought to be upheld; but we can only uphold the laws by standing for the Constitution and for law all along the line. We should stand for the Constitution in this body. We are recreant to our duty when we are willing here to set aside our Constitution for the benefit of some particular or pet measure in which any Senator or Senators may be interested. I believe that if the Senator from California would confer with his colleagues on the committee, listen to what they have to say with an open mind, disregard his love for the colored race, and for a few moments think only of his duty as a United States Senator to uphold the Constitution of this Republic, he would come nearer withdrawing this bill than he would undertaking to forward its consideration.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President—

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield to the Senator from California.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President, merely to respond to a thought, and it was a good thought, of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CARAWAY], it is quite conceivable that the language to which he refers in the bill might well be amended, might well be extended. Months ago my attention was called to that very point, I think by the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS].

I merely wished to remark that.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President—

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. CARAWAY. I should like to ask the Senator from California if he would like also to prevent their having an open season for shooting preachers up in New Jersey?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I do not like to answer that question, because my father and my grandfather each was a preacher.

Mr. CARAWAY. The Senator does not think they ought to have been shot just because they preached, does he?

Mr. McKELLAR. I want to ask whether the Senator agrees that it was proper some time ago to have murdered a man by the name of William Desmond Taylor in Los Angeles, Calif., the Senator's own State? I take it the Senator does not. The crime has gone unwhipped of justice.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Oh, Mr. President, I think this colloquy has fallen below the level which should characterize a debate on such an important subject.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator may think that, but I should be glad if he would answer the question. He does not approve of that crime?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Why, certainly not.

Mr. McKELLAR. Of course the Senator does not. He owes it to himself to answer that question in that way.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Right here, and for the last time, let me say—

Mr. McKELLAR. One other question. The executive authorities of California have not prosecuted the murderer of Mr. Taylor, have they?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Yes; they are all in active prosecution. The criminals may not yet have been apprehended.

Mr. McKELLAR. Has not that crime gone unwhipped of justice up to this day?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Up to date; yes.

Mr. McKELLAR. Is the Senator willing to include in his bill such crimes as that committed in the case of Mr. Taylor?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I am willing to make this law applicable in situations such as this—

Mr. McKELLAR. Just one moment, now. I am asking a question about the Taylor case.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. That is a question that can not be answered categorically, "Yes" or "No." I answer the Senator that where a man is deprived of his life or his liberty or his property without due process of law, or where he is denied the equal protection of the laws by a State of the Union—be it my own, California, or yours, Tennessee, for which I have an affection—in such a case, where the State is impotent, or where it neglects, fails, or refuses to protect the citizen of the United States and insure to him the equal protection of the laws, there I claim—I may be wrong, Senator—

Mr. McKELLAR. I am quite sure the Senator is.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Now, that is not an interruption which I make to gentlemen. I say out of a certain spirit of humility that I may be wrong, but I think the Constitution empowers the Congress, representing the Government, to legislate along the lines of this bill. I think so; and when the time comes I propose to enter into the discussion and make good my views.

Mr. McKELLAR. What time limit would the Senator put on failure to execute the laws?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. The bill there recites it—where the State refuses, neglects, or fails—

Mr. McKELLAR. For how long?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I do not have in mind the language of the bill. I will not undertake—

Mr. McKELLAR. Outside of the bill, then, how long would the Senator think was a reasonable time for the failure of the State authorities to continue before the National Government should step in?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. That depends always upon each case, the facts and the circumstances surrounding a case. The bill requires an allegation that the State has failed to proceed with due diligence to apprehend and prosecute, and the bill requires proof of that allegation by a preponderance of evidence.

Mr. McKELLAR. What would the Senator call a reasonable time? It is his bill.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. My answer is that that depends upon each particular circumstance, each particular case.

Mr. McKELLAR. You would have to enumerate them in a law in order to make it effective.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. No; you would have to enumerate them in the way provided in this bill.

Mr. McKELLAR. Would a year be ample time in the case of the crime of murder?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. It might be in some cases.

Mr. McKELLAR. It has been more than a year, I believe, since Mr. Taylor was murdered; and the authorities of California have not yet done anything, so far as the public knows, toward punishment for that crime. No one has been arrested for it.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. One moment.

Mr. McKELLAR. How long will it be before we will go to California, the Senator's own State, for failure to execute the criminal laws of that State?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. If the Senator will turn to the bill, he will see there must be a failure of the State to make any effort along the line of apprehending and prosecuting. There may have been crimes committed in the Senator's own State 10, 20 years ago, or less. Crimes are committed, unfortunately, in all our States.

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. But if the Senator will note the language of the bill, and give heed to the plan or framework of the bill, he will find answer to his question. Section 4, as amended, answers your question.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator can answer it better than the bill could. We would like to know the purpose of the bill. The cold language of a bill does not always answer a question of that kind. It seems to me that it is a perfectly proper question. Would the failure of a State for one year to execute the law by apprehending the criminal and bringing him to justice justify the United States Government in taking action about it?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Again I answer, a definite time can not be fixed as applicable to a suppositive case; it depends upon so many facts and circumstances.

Mr. McKELLAR. Well, I will leave that subject. I want to ask the Senator another question.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. McKELLAR. Just one moment, and then I will yield. How does this affect the Japanese in the Senator's State?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I do not hesitate to answer. This proposed law has no regard for persons. It would affect all races and all men, whether they be Japanese, whether they be Chinese, Negroes, or any other of the races of men.

Mr. McKELLAR. Would it affect white people at all?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Unquestionably it would.

Mr. McKELLAR. It would apply to them?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. It applies to all men, because, as I understand, all men are equal in America—

Mr. McKELLAR. I disagree with the Senator there, absolutely.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. All men are free.

Mr. McKELLAR. Does the Senator think that the Japanese and Chinese of California are the equals of the white people of California?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. In their—

Mr. McKELLAR. I should like to have a categorical answer to that question.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I will answer the Senator.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator has affirmed here on the floor of the Senate that all men in America are equal. I ask him if the Chinese and the Japanese in his own State are the equals of the white people of his own State?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I answer the Senator, if he understands my language—he seems to have a knowledge of language—that all men in America are equal in their rights. They are unequal in their abilities, in their endowments. Some are geniuses, some are fools, but in the way of legal rights—

Mr. McKELLAR. Sometimes I am afraid so.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. One moment; the Senator forces a categorical answer. I can answer him anywhere, I trust. I will endeavor to do so. I remember the Declaration of Independence. The Senator seems to have forgotten it.

Mr. McKELLAR. No; I have not forgotten it.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I remember who wrote it—the great and immortal Jefferson—and I believe in his principles. "We hold these truths to be self-evident, that all men are created equal, that they are endowed by their Creator with certain inalienable rights, that among these are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness." I say that in America all men are born free, and under our Constitution all born under the jurisdiction of the United States are citizens of the United States. I emphasize that this bill is not intended as an encroachment upon the rights of States. It is not intended as an invasion of States. It is not intended to subvert the institutions of any State.

Mr. McKELLAR. Just one moment.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. It is in cooperation with and in assistance of the States.

Mr. McKELLAR. I am afraid the Senator does not understand the purport of his own bill if he says that this is not an invasion of the rights of the States.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I do understand it.

Mr. McKELLAR. After all this, and after the Senator's promise several times to give me a categorical answer as to whether he believes that the Chinese and the Japanese of California are the equals of the white people of California, we note that he has not answered that question.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Does the Senator mean racially? Equal racially?

Mr. McKELLAR. I mean just exactly what the Senator said. The Senator understands language.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Why, certainly.

Mr. McKELLAR. I am sure he does. I want to know if the Senator believes that the Japanese and the Chinese of his State are the equals of the white people of his State?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Under the law of this Republic a child born in California or in Tennessee is a citizen of the United States. Whether that is wise or not, that is the law. Whether intellectually and morally he is equal or not is another question. I am not dealing with that matter now.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator certainly has some opinion about it.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. What does the Senator mean when he asks whether the Chinese or the Japanese is equal to the Caucasian? What does he mean—in legal rights here in America or intellectually?

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator stated, with a great deal of gusto just now, that in his judgment all men of the United States were equals; that all races and all peoples in the United States were equal. I am asking him a categorical question, and I ask him to answer "yes" or "no," and then make any explanation he may see fit, under the well-known rules of taking evidence, with which he and I have long been familiar. Are the Japanese and the Chinese of the Senator's own State the equals of the white people of that State?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator can ask me as many questions as he desires. I am not afraid to answer questions.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. All right. Just let the Senator answer this, and then I will answer his question.

Mr. McKELLAR. Oh, well, if the Senator is going to put a price upon his answer, if his answer is so important that he has to put a price on it, let him put a price on it.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. When the Senator asks me that question, does he refer to equality of legal rights or to racial equality?

Mr. McKELLAR. I am referring to all of those things that we know in men—in human beings.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Ah!

Mr. McKELLAR. Is it a fact—and I challenge the Senator to say so—that the Chinese and Japanese of his State are the equals of the white people of his State?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I can answer the Senator if the young gentlemen in the gallery will restrain their laughter.

Mr. McKELLAR. I excuse them for laughing, because they laughed at me a while ago when I unwittingly made an error, and I do not object to their laughter at all.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Racially, I do not think the Chinese race or the Japanese race is equal to our branch of the Aryan race of men, though I have in mind some great Chinese. There are three great names that have been mentioned by reverent men; perhaps the Senator will admit that Confucius was a rather great Chinaman.

Mr. McKELLAR. He is dead.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. One moment, please. The Senator has asked me a question.

Mr. McKELLAR. I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I do not wish to exalt your race or mine. We belong to the same branch of the human family. I think we are superior in many things. I think I may say that with deference to the Chinese race and the Japanese race and other races.

Mr. McKELLAR. Would the Senator go so far as to include the colored race in that?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I think that is so, though I add that there have been some great and splendid men who were pure negroes. Has the Senator never heard of Toussaint L'Ouverture? I have here a book of poems which do honor to any race, poems written within a few years by colored men of this Nation.

Mr. McKELLAR. Then, as I understand the Senator, he has some doubts about colored men being inferior, like he has some doubts about the constitutionality of this bill.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. No; what God has made I am not now appraising, if the Senator gets the force of my meaning.

Mr. McKELLAR. I do not know whether the Senator is in partnership or not; but I hope I get his meaning.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I am not appraising races of men at this moment, but, as the Senator knows, a Chinese or Japanese born in California or in the Hawaiian Islands is a citizen of the United States. Those who have come here under treaty rights have only those rights which are affirmatively set down in the treaties. There are many Japanese in California who are not equal in rights to native-born Japanese, not equal in legal rights to native white children or native-born negro children, because their rights are limited by the treaties between us and Japan. So that racially I do not think the races are equal, speaking generally. Legally they may be, under certain circumstances, as I have said.

Mr. McKELLAR. Would the Senator take away the legal protection of the laws simply because the Japanese were not citizens of this country?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Certainly not. All here under treaty must be protected by our laws, and all born here are citizens under the Constitution.

Mr. McKELLAR. But the Senator is not willing to bring William Desmond Taylor's murderer to justice, under the terms of the statute, because the Commonwealth of California has, for perhaps more than a year now, failed to have that murderer prosecuted.

Mr. CARAWAY. Before the Senator gets away from his statement, California, by its laws, took away the right of Japanese who were not born in America to own lands in California, and it is a serious question whether it was within the treaty power or not. The Japanese denied it. But California denied to the Japanese in California any right under the law to own property.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Oh, Senator—

Mr. CARAWAY. Real estate.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Agricultural land. The treaty is specific on that.

Mr. CARAWAY. Japan never agreed with you as to what the treaty was.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Japan does not permit Americans to occupy such lands, and our treaty specifically limits the character of real property which the Japanese may own in California.

Mr. CARAWAY. The Legislature of California went a long way to deny the Japanese any rights in California they could take away.

Mr. McKELLAR. Inasmuch as the Senator from California is so very greatly interested in the rights of certain people in other States, I want to ask him this question: Does he approve of taking away the rights of Japanese in his own State to own agricultural lands?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I certainly stand upon the treaty, and I think it was wise.

Mr. McKELLAR. I am not asking that.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I answer the Senator, then, if I get his question, no. But the treaty does not give the right to a Japanese to own land for agricultural purposes, and that is the law.

Mr. McKELLAR. Then, as I understand, the Senator would take away from the Japanese of his State the right to own agricultural land?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I would not take away a right which they did not possess.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator would prevent them from acquiring the right?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I would.

Mr. McKELLAR. And he is in favor of depriving the Japanese of his own State of the rights accorded to all other citizens of that State?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Oh, no; I stand upon the treaty. The treaty gives no such rights, and I would not confer them.

Mr. McKELLAR. I understand that the Senator is standing upon the treaty. He is standing upon the treaty, just as some of us, possibly misguided men, are standing upon the Constitution of the United States, because we love it and revere it. We say under it you have no right to legislate on this subject.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I respect your views.

Mr. McKELLAR. You say you are willing to deprive a very large portion of the Japanese men and women of your State of the right even to hold land.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. No, Senator; I would not deprive them of the right. They have no such right.

Mr. McKELLAR. They have been deprived of it.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. No, no, Senator; they have not.

Mr. McKELLAR. Statutes have been passed in California prohibiting them from buying lands in your State.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. With respect, the statutes follow the treaty. The treaty gives no such rights, and we have not conferred any such rights, and I would not confer any such rights.

Mr. McKELLAR. If the Senator from California knows anything about the laws of his own State, he must know that the Legislature of California passed a law prohibiting Japanese from thereafter owning any agricultural lands. Up until that time, under your law and under your constitution and under treaties, the Japanese did own agricultural lands, and by this law of your State and your legislature, which you are now upholding, these colored Japanese living in your State, entitled, as you say, to the equal protection of the law, are being deprived of one of the rights of a human being—that is, to own land when he is there—and the Senator understands it.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. If it becomes necessary a little later, I will explain exactly what the law in California is and what the decision of our courts is. Let us understand one another.

Mr. McKELLAR. I am sure I understand, and if the Senator does not recall it, I will take long enough time to recall the matter to the Senator.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. If the Senator will excuse me—

Mr. McKELLAR. I will yield to the Senator, of course, but I will call to his attention the fact that I am not going to let him escape it.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I do not want to escape anything. When we go at it earnestly and sincerely we will arrive at the truth.

Mr. McKELLAR. We are very sincere, because the Senator has not a ghost of a show of passing his bill; we are not going to let it pass.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. The record is made; let it be as it is. There is a fundamental proposition of law upon which California has stood, and which I think is sound. An alien here in America, whether he comes from England, or France, or Italy, or Japan, or China, from any land, has just such rights as are guaranteed to him by way of treaty between this country and his. It is a very easy process of reasoning to discover what his rights are. We naturally turn to the treaties. Turning to the treaties and conventions between this country and Japan—and we know why it was so—we find that there is no right given to the Japanese to hold real property or land in California for agricultural purposes. That being so, we are within the treaty when we legislate along that line, as we have.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I want to say, for the benefit of the Senator from California, who seems to have forgotten recent history, that instead of the Japanese not being deprived of the right to own agricultural lands in his State, we all recall, I thought everybody recalled, that during the administration of the late President Roosevelt, President Roosevelt undertook, by the use of his friendly offices, to prevent the Legislature of California from depriving the Japanese of the right to hold agricultural lands in this country, and as I recall in the first instance he did prevent it, but later on, during President Wilson's administration, the Legislature of California did pass an act in which they deprived the Japanese of that right, and, by the way, I want to say to the Senator from California that I know something about the Japanese, and I know a great deal about the colored people, and the Japanese are just as worthy of having the rights of human beings as the colored people.

They ought all to be treated alike, and how easy it is for the Senator from California to come here and talk about the rights of colored people in other men's States, when in his own State his own legislature has already deprived a very large population in that State of the fundamental right to own lands in the State, or agricultural lands, to which I believe it is confined now. Why can not the Senator see the injustice that is being done the colored citizens there; and when I speak of colored citizens in California I am speaking of Japanese citizens? Why can he not see the injustice that is being done the colored Japanese citizens of his own State before he undertakes to come out as the champion of the colored people all over the country? Should not his charity begin at home, where he could have an excellent play for that charity? I want to tell the Senate why the Senator does not do it. The Japanese do not have the right to vote.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. It is unworthy of the Senator to impute that motive to me, and I resent it.

Mr. McKELLAR. I understand that, but we all know that the Japanese have no right to vote in California. They are not citizens, and they have no right to vote, and the other colored people of California have a right to vote.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. We have a great many colored men and women in California, and they vote; but that is collateral. But the Senator should not impute to me motives of that kind.

Mr. McKELLAR. I want to suggest to the Senator that he look up the injustice that is done to these colored people in his own State before going out and seeking to have so-called injustices righted in other States.

Mr. President, no man believes more in the enforcement of the law than I do. No man is more opposed to lynching than I am. It ought not to take place. But there are crimes committed in every State, and this crime of lynching is not confined to the people of my section or to the people of any State. Some of the worst lynching crimes that have ever occurred in this country have occurred in States of the North. They are getting to be more prevalent in the North, in comparison to the total population, than in the South. Yet, when we rise here to uphold the Constitution of the United States, and when the Senator can find only 2 on a committee of 17, I believe, who are willing to uphold him, he comes here and wants us to pass a bill that is patently unconstitutional, which ought not to be passed. We should not deprive the States of their rights. We should not take away further rights of the States. We have perhaps gone too far in that direction already.

Mr. President, I am informed that it is now proposed to go into executive session, and with that understanding I will discontinue my remarks.

Mr. CURTIS. I would like to have the Journal approved first. If we can have a vote on the approval of the Journal I will move an executive session.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Of course, I do not make any agreement about what will be done if we get into executive session, but will the Senator move an adjournment to-night if we should not reach any agreement?

Mr. CURTIS. It is my intention to ask for an adjournment. Of course I do not know what others will do.

Mr. CALDER rose.

Mr. McKELLAR. I do not yield the floor except for the purpose of moving an executive session or an adjournment. If the Senator from New York desires to have me yield to him long enough to present a matter, and it will not interfere with my occupancy of the floor, I am perfectly willing to yield to him.

Mr. CALDER. If I may I wish to report a resolution, and get consideration of it, to defray the funeral expenses of the late Senator WATSON.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I made the statement that we were not going to transact any business, but of course I am not going to interfere with a matter of that kind. If the Senator wants to have the resolution considered by unanimous consent, let him go ahead with it.

Mr. CALDER. I ask unanimous consent that I may report from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate the resolution which I send to the desk.

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield for that purpose with the understanding that it is not to take me off the floor.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I suppose that can be done by unanimous consent.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Ohio will state his inquiry.

Mr. WILLIS. I wonder whether it is possible to have an arrangement whereby we can adopt a resolution, and yet the Senator from Tennessee retain the floor. There are other Senators who would like to make some observations. The Senator can not retain the floor and the Senate proceed with legislative business. The Senator can yield the floor, but he can not hold the floor and exclude everybody else.

Mr. McKELLAR. I was asked by the Senator from Kansas to yield for an executive session.

Mr. CURTIS. I asked the Senator to yield for an executive session, and if he will do that, and we can approve the Journal, I will move to go into executive session.

Mr. McKELLAR. I will yield to the Senator for that purpose.

Mr. CURTIS. I ask that the Journal be approved.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the approval of the Journal.

The Journal was approved.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. CURTIS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After 17 minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 4 o'clock and 17 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, November 29, 1922, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, November 28, 1922.

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

In token of our need and love, our heavenly Father, we wait in Thy presence. We see Thy mercy more brightly because of our unworthiness. Beholding Thy marvelous condescension, every heart brings its tribute of praise. O bless everyone and let morning arise upon every life. Give us the reach of soul that our standards of service, conduct, and character may receive the benediction of Thy favor. For the wonder of life we bless Thee. For the joys and blessings of our own dear land, we give Thee thanks. In the name of Jesus. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS—SARAH F. BUTLER.

Mr. CHALMERS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the papers pertaining to the pension of Sarah F. Butler, H. R. 8279, Sixty-seventh Congress, no adverse report having been made thereon, be withdrawn from the files of the House for the use of the Pension Department. The bill passed the House but did not pass the Senate. Under a recent ruling I understand that the pension may be granted without special legislation, and we want the use of the files for the Pension Department.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. It is an individual case.

Mr. CHALMERS. Yes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

THE MERCHANT MARINE.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 12817) to amend and supplement the merchant marine act, 1920, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the merchant marine bill, with Mr. TILSON in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. When the committee rose an amendment, offered by the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER], to strike out the section was pending. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to have the amendment again reported.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will again report the amendment.

There was no objection, and the Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. RAKER: Page 23, line 6, strike out section 304.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, section 304, of course, goes back to sections 301, 302, and 303. As I said last evening, the statement of the proposition in the bill is seductive to those who hear merely the statement without having gone into the facts. The committee has had no hearing upon the matter. The matter was put in—and I accuse no one of any ulterior purpose. I feel, however, that I can advisedly say that when the American people comprehend, and they will shortly do so, the purport of this attempted legislation, in addition to the other bad features of the ship subsidy bill, they will resent it very much. I feel safe in saying that the rest of the bad features of the bill combined can not equal the evils that are involved in this particular legislation under consideration.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. The gentleman says that no hearings were held. The gentleman knows that the House Committee on Immigration gave considerable attention to these features and to substitute features.

Mr. RAKER. I have here just what was said. There were but three hearings. They were executive and the proceedings were not recorded.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Was not Mr. Lasker present?

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Lasker's statement was not taken down. Mr. Lasker came before the committee before this bill was ever dreamed of, and in executive session he told the Committee on Immigration what could be accomplished. I have investigated the facts, and I remember them distinctly. We have the statement of Mr. Henning, we have the statement of the attorney for the department, but not Mr. Lasker's statement before the Committee on Immigration. That was before the shipping bill started. It was intended to get the Committee on Immigration to report out and act upon this piece of vicious, iniquitous legislation, which everyone must admit is contrary to all of the treaties on commerce that we have to-day; and if you want to be fair and bring about an obliteration of the various treaties, why do you not make the same applicable to the importation of goods and abrogate all of the treaties between the United States and all foreign countries in respect to navigation? Why pick out the question of immigration, hoping, intending, thereby to give more labor, cheaper labor, to break down the immigration laws that have taken almost a half century to place on the statute books of this country for the purpose of protecting America. Then you wrap the American flag around you, as did the chairman of the committee when he closed his argument on this question when he said that the immigrants entering and leaving the ports will land on an American boat and will see the Stars and Stripes floating over them, and therefore feel better for having come across to America in an American boat.

Nevertheless, even so, it will help to destroy the country in which we live. There can not be any doubt about that. If you will look into it you will see already the hand intended to break down the immigration laws, because all of the forces and all of the powers behind the ship subsidy will be behind the maintenance of this plan, if by any possibility it can become operative after these various treaties are broken down.

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAKER. Yes.

Mr. EDMONDS. As one of the men back of the bill I will say that I will not assist in breaking down the immigration laws.

Mr. RAKER. Oh, of course, it is easy to say that; but why have you not presented to the American people just what the facts are; why do you not come out openly and say that this is for the purpose of giving money to the shipping interests by virtue of bringing starving people from Europe to the United States, and having them become a part of this country? We already have over 10,000,000 now that we can not assimilate. Why do you not tell them that you want cheaper labor, and that all of the great organizations of this country are figuring and hoping that this bill will pass, to the end that we may undermine and do away with the strict immigration laws that we have to-day?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California has expired.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Chairman—

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman wish to be recognized in opposition to the amendment?

Mr. EDMONDS. Yes, sir. Mr. Chairman, as I stated last evening, there are two particular sections which are opposed by foreign interests. One was this provision that forced the carrying on American vessels of 50 per cent of whatever immigration might be allowed by Congress. That is all this does. It says we abrogate so much of the treaties that may be in the road and allow American ships to carry their full share of immigration. That is all that it does.

Mr. RAKER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EDMONDS. I will yield; the gentleman yielded to me.

Mr. RAKER. With the provision of the bill in force, it is an inhibition against immigration, namely, 50 per cent can not come in unless in American bottoms. Therefore, it violates all commercial treaties.

Mr. EDMONDS. I said that it did. This section calls for an abrogation of those treaties. That is true. I acknowledged it yesterday; I acknowledge it now.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EDMONDS. Yes, sir.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Has the gentleman any assurance that any of these treaties will be abrogated if this is passed?

Mr. EDMONDS. I hope so.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Has this matter been submitted in any way to the State Department and any information received from that department?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. It is assumed that various countries which make a business of promoting the emigration of their peoples will resist these provisions. They will stand on the rights contained in the treaties that their nationals may travel without let or hindrance.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. We all recognize, of course, that the Jones bill had provisions about the abrogation of certain treaties and two Presidents have announced that they would not undertake to enforce those provisions.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. But this is a division; it calls for one-half. This opens the way for negotiations on a 50 per cent basis; not a complete abrogation. Many countries which now send quotas under the 3 per cent limitation will likely accept the modification of 50 per cent. We have hopes that we will build up a way so that under American control the advantages will be on American ships.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. If the gentleman from Pennsylvania will yield, in reference to this question of my colleague from Tennessee I will say that no representative of the State Department testified at the hearings in this case, and nobody undertook to deal with the diplomatic features of this, although several Members expressed several times a desire that representatives of the State Department appear.

Mr. EDMONDS. I acknowledge that no representative of the State Department came before us. The matter was referred to the Immigration Committee. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto do now close.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I wish to submit some observations at this point.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania moves that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto do now close.

Mr. EDMONDS. I will amend it by saying close in five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the motion is modified to close in five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Mr. Chairman, in my opinion the provisions of this immigration title are not objectionable from the standpoint of what is hoped to be accomplished. Upon the contrary, I have stated from the time this bill was first considered that in substance I could see no possible objection to this indirect aid being given to the ship operators of the United States, but what I do wish to assert is that from the statements which have been already made upon the floor of this committee the provisions of this title will never become operative. It has been conceded here by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, and I believe by the gentleman from Washington, that all of these foreign countries whose nationals are interested in coming into this country are opposed to the provisions of this title. It is in effect conceded that treaties we have with foreign Governments will inhibit the enforcement of a statute of this character.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BANKHEAD. In a moment. What you have proceeded to do here is to hold out some assurance of a substantial aid to ship operators of the country, and we can well gather from the experience of section 34 of the Jones Act, about which you boasted so many benefits would come, that in all human probability it will never become effective.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Let us assume, in the first place, immigration will be held at reduced figures, but if we have an American merchant marine and provisions are made for the proper carrying of immigrants, and then a provision made that those entitled to come into the United States may have their passage paid here—

Mr. BANKHEAD. Oh, the gentleman is assuming a good many contingencies.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I am assuming what is in sight.

Mr. BANKHEAD. What I desire to call the attention of the committee to is to make a prophecy for the benefit of the record—and I think the future will substantiate the prophecy—that no ship operator will ever receive any benefit from the provisions of this section.

In other words, you are padding this bill deliberately with a provision holding out a promise which you know will never be fulfilled.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Have we fallen so low that we can not say that if immigrants are to come to the United States a portion of them shall come on American ships?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I agree that that ought to be done, but you know it will not be done under the provisions of this bill.

Mr. RAKER. We have solemnly declared in every commercial treaty with foreign countries that we will not discriminate against them.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Absolutely. You are flying in the teeth of the solemn agreement made by our Government with our foreign neighbors, with a provision which you admit here from the floor they will all combat when they come later to modify these treaties.

Mr. EDMONDS. The gentleman admits that it is a good thing if it can be accomplished.

Mr. BANKHEAD. In principle, I have no opposition to it.

Mr. EDMONDS. Yet you are not willing to try it.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I know you are doing an absolutely vain thing, and I think you recognize it.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Probably the gentleman from Alabama is trying to forestall any possible future impeachment proceedings. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I offer a preferential amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas offers an amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. JONES of Texas: Page 23, line 9, after the word "islands," insert the following:

"Nothing in this title or in this bill shall be construed to permit or authorize a larger percentage or any greater number of immigrants from any foreign country than are permitted under the existing immigration laws of the United States."

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Chairman, a point of order.

Mr. LEHLBACH. I make a point of order against the amendment that it is not germane.

Mr. JONES of Texas. It is germane to the whole title. It is directly on the point that the title deals with, and it is offered at the end of the title.

The CHAIRMAN. As the Chair reads this section, it is simply a definition and nothing else.

Mr. JONES of Texas. It deals with commerce and with immigration. It starts off by stating—

As nearly as practicable, one-half of the total number of immigrants admitted into the United States in any fiscal year shall be transported in vessels—

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is not reading the section under consideration.

Mr. JONES of Texas. I offer this amendment, covering the entire title as well as the section. The amendment says—

Nothing in this title.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman offers the amendment while section 304 is under consideration, and for parliamentary purposes it must be considered as an amendment to this section which is under consideration.

Mr. JONES of Texas. I will offer it as a new section, then, as section 304a, if there is any question on that. It seems to me that as I offer it as the end of the title, if it is germane to the title it is admissible anyway; but if there is any question about it I will offer it as section 304a.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order as made against the amendment.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Then I offer it as a new section, 304a.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the amendment.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Chairman, a point of order. Section 304 is now pending, and a new section is not in order to be offered at this time.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Mr. Chairman, there is a motion pending to strike out the entire section. This can be offered as a new section before the vote on that is finally taken, can it not?

The CHAIRMAN. There is an amendment already pending. A new section can not be offered while that motion is pending.

Mr. JONES of Texas. All right. I will offer it when that is finished.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER].

The question being taken, the Chairman announced that the noes appeared to have it.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I ask for tellers.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee demands tellers.

Tellers were ordered, and the Chairman appointed Mr. RAKER and Mr. LEHLBACH.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 31, noes 66.

Accordingly the amendment was rejected.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Now I offer my amendment as a new section.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. JONES of Texas: Page 23, line 9, after the word "islands" insert the following as a new section:

"Nothing in this title or in this bill shall be construed to permit or authorize a larger percentage or any greater number of immigrants from any foreign country than are permitted under the existing immigration laws of the United States."

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against the amendment.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Mr. Chairman—

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule. Does the gentleman want to be heard on the point of order?

Mr. JONES of Texas. Yes; I should like to be heard, unless the Chair is going to rule that the amendment is in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman.

Mr. JONES of Texas. This is offered as a new section. This title deals with the transportation of commerce by water, and starts out with a declaration—

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES of Texas. I yield to the gentleman from Wyoming.

Mr. MONDELL. There is nothing in the legislation that affects the present law, and there is no objection to the gentleman's amendment if it pleases him. It does not hurt anybody and it does not change the situation at all.

Mr. EDMONDS. I will withdraw the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule. Does the gentleman withdraw his point of order?

Mr. EDMONDS. I will withdraw the point of order and accept the amendment.

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Chairman, I renew the point of order on the following ground—

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Mr. Chairman, before the Chair rules I should like to be heard on the point of order.

Mr. MONDELL. This is all post-mortem.

The CHAIRMAN. There is nothing in this title amending the immigration law.

Mr. JONES of Texas. The Chair was going to hear me for a moment, and I desisted on the theory that there was no point of order made. I think I am entitled to be heard. It seems to me this is a definition. According to the Chair's own statement, here is a definition as to the purposes of this title, and a definition of the purpose of this bill in so far as it affects immigration. Now, I offer an additional feature of that definition. The amendment I offer is simply an additional limitation on the operation and scope of the bill.

Mr. RAKER. Will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. JONES of Texas. If the Chair please, the Chair's own statement is that this part of the act is a definition of the purposes or some of the purposes of the measure. If that be true, surely it is in order to still further limit those purposes.

My amendment is in the nature of a definition which purports to construe the meaning of this part of the bill. This is to limit the scope of the measure. It is an amendment which declares that it is not intended by this bill to destroy our immigration laws. If the position they take is true, that it does not affect immigration, there can be no harm done by putting in the definition the statement that it does not affect the immigration laws. Some very respectable authorities who have made a careful study of the proposed measure are fearful that this part of the bill will authorize the President through treaty to, in effect, abrogate the present percentage limit on foreign immigration. Surely it is in order to declare that this is not meant. My amendment will effectually prevent any such construction.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule.

Mr. RAKER rose.

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman from California rise?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont rose.

Mr. RAKER. There is just one statement by the Chair on the point of order that I would like to refer to.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Mr. Chairman, I thought I was recognized on that proposition. I wanted to ask the Chair if he would permit a suggestion by way of a parliamentary inquiry in regard to this matter?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman on a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Would it be held to be germane to offer any paragraph in any bill with a few lines limiting the effect of those paragraphs, saying that they did not repeal other laws?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is perfectly clear in his own mind as to that.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Would the Chair pass on that? Would that be germane, Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I wish to propound a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Is it not always in order to offer an amendment limiting the scope of a definition in a bill? Here is a definition, and this is a limitation.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, will the Chair permit me to make just one suggestion to the Chair?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule on the parliamentary point of order. [Cries of "Regular order!" and "Rule!"] The subject of Title III is "Transportation of immigrants by water." No section of the title deals with the subject of quota or any other provision of the immigration laws. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. JONES] moves an amendment which, if it accomplishes anything at all—as to which the Chair has some doubt—it amends, modifies, or limits the immigration laws. If the gentleman's amendment be in order here, it would seem that by the same reasoning it would be in order to amend the immigration act in any other particular or to repeal it altogether. The Chair believes that the amendment is not germane, and therefore sustains the point of order.

Mr. SEARS. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. SEARS. In reply to the cries of "Regular order" and "Rule" on the other side I would like to inquire whether this is a railroad bill or a ship subsidy bill? [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

TITLE IV.—COMPENSATION TO VESSELS OF THE UNITED STATES. DEFINITIONS.

SEC. 401. When used hereinafter in this act—

(a) The term "person" means individual, partnership, corporation, or association;

(b) The term "United States," when used in a geographical sense, means the several States and the District of Columbia;

(c) The term "citizen of the United States" has the meaning assigned to it by section 2 of the shipping act, 1916, as amended by the merchant marine act, 1920; and

(d) The term "board" means the United States Shipping Board.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BLANTON: On page 23, line 20, strike out the words "meaning assigned to it."

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, the meaning intended by Congress with respect to this bill ought to be clearly conveyed in language that means just exactly what Congress intends and nothing more. Until it was disclosed on Saturday evening by the distinguished gentleman from Virginia [Mr. BLAND] that the meaning which the President gave to one of the most vital sections of this bill was not the meaning that the bill conveyed, I take it that practically every Member in this House was not aware of that fact. I want to call attention to the meaning that the President gave to the compensation feature of this bill in his address on Tuesday of last week.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I hope the gentleman will confine his discussion to the paragraph now pending before the House.

Mr. BLANTON. I think the Chair will note that I am within the parliamentary rules in discussing my amendment, which determines the meaning of the language in the bill. I am sure I will not needlessly take up time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will proceed in order.

Mr. BLANTON. Concerning compensation, the President in his message used this language:

"That Government aid will only be paid until the shipping enterprise earns 10 per cent on actual capital employed, and immediately that when more than 10 per cent earnings is reached half of the excess earnings must be applied to the repayment of the Government aid which has been previously advanced. * * * If success attends, as we hope it will, the Government outlay is returned."

I take it that every Member of this House understood that during the 10-year period all of the Government aid advanced to the shipping interests, if during the 10 years the earnings of any ship amounted to more than the compensation granted by the Government, half of the profits over 10 per cent should be returned to the Government until the advancement has been paid back to the Treasury. Well, under the terms of the bill, the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. BLAND] called our attention on Saturday to the fact that a ship could earn 9½ per cent for 9 years, and in addition to the 9½ per cent profit on his investment the shipowner would receive the subsidy granted by the Government, and then in the tenth year, if he earned 500 per cent profit, only the part for that year should be returned to the Government.

Now, that ought to be changed, and the reason why I raise the point now is because we are trotting along pretty fast on this bill and the debate is closing, and I do not know whether we will have time to consider that provision or not when it is reached, and we ought to make clear that whenever a subsidy is enjoyed by any ship and when the earnings of any particular year amount to such a sum in excess of 10 per cent profit as to permit the return of the subsidy, it ought to be returned in full, and not only in part, as here provided.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto be now closed.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Jersey moves that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto be now closed. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON].

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, it is a pro forma amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Then, without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn.

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Craven, its Chief Clerk, announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 4025. An act to permit Mahlon Pitney, an Associate Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, to retire; and

S. 4036. An act to prohibit the unauthorized wearing, manufacture, or sale of medals and badges awarded by the War Department.

The message also announced that the Vice President had appointed Mr. BORAH and Mr. MCKELLAR members of the joint select committee on the part of the Senate, as provided for in the act of February 16, 1889, as amended by the act of March 2, 1895, entitled "An act to authorize and provide for the disposition of useless papers in the executive departments," for the disposition of useless papers in the Department of Labor.

THE MERCHANT MARINE.

The committee resumed its session.

The Clerk read as follows:

MERCHANT MARINE FUND.

SEC. 402. There is hereby established in the Treasury a fund to be known as the "merchant marine fund" (hereinafter in this title called the "fund"). The Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to set aside in or for credit to such fund upon receipt, the following sums paid into the Treasury after the enactment of this act:

(a) All tonnage duties, tonnage taxes, or light money, paid under law in force at the time of the enactment of this act and under section 206 of this act;

(b) Ten per cent of the amount of all customs duties paid under law in force at the time of the enactment of this act or subsequently enacted; and

(c) All excess earnings paid by the owner of any vessel under the provisions of section 416.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee: Page 24, line 1, strike out section 402.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, this section provides for a merchant marine fund and the Secretary of the Treasury is directed to set aside to the credit of such fund 10 per cent of all the customs duties and all of the tonnage taxes and light money and then any refunds that may be made. This is for the purpose of avoiding appropriations. It is for the purpose of camouflaging the situation. Every other department of this Government, every other bureau of this Government, is required, in order to procure annual appropriations, to first go to the Budget Committee and present its estimates, give reasons for it, and then if they get by the Budget Committee, it goes to the Appropriations Committee of the House, and the Appropriations Committee summons witnesses and examines and cross-examines and investigates, and generally culls the estimates, and when they report an appropriation for expenditures in the department for the ensuing fiscal year the appropriation bill must be passed by the House, passed by the Senate, and signed by the President.

That is true with reference to every other department of the Government, but not so with these favored shipping interests; an exception must be made in their case; the Shipping Board must be excused from appearing before the committee and answering questions and being subjected to cross-examination. That is the purpose of it. I want to know if Congress is going to fall for anything of that kind. I want to know if this Congress is going to abdicate in favor of Albert D. Lasker. I want to know if it is going to surrender its right conferred upon it by the Constitution. That is what it means. It means to surrender not only for a year, but permanently, because I shall call to your attention and move to strike out a provision on the next page which permanently appropriates these funds for the purpose stated.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. I will.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Does not this provision in effect not only discredit the Appropriations Committee but the Budget system that we have recently adopted?

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Absolutely; the Budget system which has the indorsement of both parties, which has the indorsement of the President, and which applies to every other department of the Government. I can not understand why the members of the Appropriation Committee are willing to surrender this power to the Shipping Board? Has Mr. Lasker got you all hypnotized? What is the matter with this Congress that it is willing to make such an extraordinary exception in the interest of this one board?

Mr. SEARS. Will the gentleman yield for a suggestion?

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. SEARS. It not only does that, but the paper of last night states that there is a loss in tax receipts of $1,400,000,000 less than the amount collected last year.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Yes. Then, if you are going to pay these subsidies, why not pay them by annual appropriation? Let the Shipping Board, or whatever bureau performs that function, appear before the Budget Committee and then before the Appropriations Committee, put in their estimates as to the amount of subsidies they intend to pay for the ensuing year according to the contracts they have entered into. It was argued, even by the President, that during the first year they would not need over $15,000,000 for that purpose. And yet this bill in the section I move to strike out provides that there shall be put into the merchant marine fund immediately 10 per cent of the customs duties, which alone will amount to $45,000,000 per annum, and the tonnage dues which will amount to over $4,000,000 additional. Why do they want $49,000,000 paid into the fund annually if they are only going to pay out $15,000,000 the first year and $30,000,000 each subsequent year as claimed by the President?

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. Mr. Chairman, I want to call the attention of the committee to the fact that the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Tennessee aims to strike out an essential provision of the bill. This fund necessarily is bound up with the appropriation contained in section 403. It is absolutely necessary to the success of this bill that we be able to assure the men whom we hope to induce to go into the shipping business that the payments provided for by the shipping contracts are going to be continued. The gentleman from Tennessee as a lawyer and any gentleman here as a business man would not advise or permit anyone in whom he was interested to go into the shipping business and invest his money in the construction or purchase of a vessel with nothing more than the assurance of an annual appropriation by Congress.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. I will.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Is it not a fact that such funds are in existence where they involve contracts with reference to good roads, the disability fund, and so forth?

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. I was just coming to that. This provision establishing a fund is a mere matter of bookkeeping, but the vital provision is the appropriation. No money can be paid out of the Treasury except such as is under contract by the board under these 10-year contracts that have been provided for. That is the only way in which money can go out of the Treasury. The only inquiry when they come to investigate would be, "Has the contract been made? Is the United States bound to pay the money?" If it is, then the good faith of the Government is pledged to the payment of that money.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. Yes.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Does it not authorize the Shipping Board to enter into contracts, and would not they be authorized to say to the Appropriations Committee each year that they had made the contracts necessary to pay the subsidy and that would be used under the contract?

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. The situation would be the same. The Appropriations Committee would make the appropriation to meet the contracts. If this fund is not covered by a contract it does not pass out of the Treasury of the United States. If the fund appears to be more than is necessary to meet the obligation of the contract it is still in the control of the Government.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. Yes.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Do not we make an annual appropriation every year under the general authorization to take care of sick and wounded soldiers? Do not we make an appropriation every year? What more sacred is there in this than in that?

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. This is a proposition where we are going to try to induce people to invest their money in large amounts, and we must, in my opinion, assure them that they are going to get what they bargained for. That is the proposition in this appropriation feature of the bill. I feel it is absolutely necessary and vital to the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, an examination of the features of this section discloses the very remarkable fact that the Government of the United States is doing with reference to the Shipping Board what bankrupt Governments sometimes do. When a country has gotten itself into such a position that its pledged word is no longer received by its creditors it makes an assignment of its revenues. What do we propose to do here? We propose to make an assignment, the Government of the United States does, to the Shipping Board of 10 per cent of its receipts from its customs dues, certain tonnage duties, taxes, and so forth, and excess earnings paid in by shipowners. That is what is proposed in this bill.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Yes.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. Does not the gentleman think that is too broad a statement, in view of the fact that nothing goes out of the Treasury except such measures as are contracted for under the contracts to be made?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. It is proposing that the sovereign Government of the United States, speaking through its Congress, shall in effect make to the Shipping Board an assignment of the items enumerated. You assign, you take from the control of the people, you take from the control of future Congresses the moneys received from the duties, tonnage taxes, light money, and so forth, enumerated. Let me read section (b):

(b) Ten per cent of the amount of all customs duties paid under law in force at the time of the enactment of this act or subsequently enacted; and

(c) All excess earnings paid by the owner of any vessel under the provisions of section 416.

The Secretary of the Treasury is directed by this section to segregate and set apart these funds for a minimum period of 10 years from which to pay these ship subsidies.

I realize that in a matter of this sort, where party lines are sharply drawn, the strategy of the situation from the Democratic standpoint, to be entirely candid, is to have this bill in as bad condition as we can have it when we come to the final vote on the measure, which we want to kill.

Mr. EDMONDS. For that reason the gentleman thinks we should vote down all of these amendments?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. No; let me complete the statement. That is a candid statement of the strategy of the situation, but there comes times in the consideration of important legislation when the duty of a legislator rises above the question of party strategy and legislative strategy. I do not believe that we can afford, as the spokesmen of this great Republic, solemnly to assign 10 per cent of the revenues of the United States received as customs duties to the Shipping Board. I do not believe it is good legislative policy, I do not believe it is wise governmental policy, to create special funds as is here proposed from which certain obligations of the Government shall be met. The revenues of the United States as a general proposition ought to be covered into the Treasury and the money expended by the United States ought to be appropriated from the Treasury by its regular appropriating agencies, namely, the Congress, and I hope that irrespective of party affiliations, or of your own attitude toward this general legislation this provision will be stricken from the bill. [Applause.]

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Chairman, it may as well be understood that the creation of this fund is the keystone of the arch of this bill. The adoption of this amendment will destroy the entire bill. The proposition of creating a fund is not a new one in the conduct of our business. Wherever the United States as a Government enters into contractual obligations with any of its citizens in order to guarantee the good faith and credit of the Government to carry out its contractual obligations, the money necessary for that purpose is set aside, and that is the usual and ordinary procedure. That is the procedure that was adopted by the Congress when the retirement fund was created for the civil service employees. These employees contributed 2½ per cent of their salaries, and the Government contributes whatever is necessary to pay the retirement annuities. That money thus contributed by the Government to the employees and the money paid out to the annuitants does not come from the Treasury by appropriation, but it is in a fund created by the Congress for that purpose in order to guarantee to the employees that no subsequent legislation will destroy the contract under which they have changed their financial positions.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEHLBACH. Not at this point. The same is true with the contracts entered into with the various States with regard to good roads. The same is true with regard to the War Finance Corporation fund. It is the ordinary procedure. An attack on this fund is an attack on the essence of this bill. If you kill the fund, you can not have any subsidy; if you kill the fund, you can not have this bill, because this bill is useless without it, and we may as well understand it now. A vote for the amendment is a vote to kill the bill before we have finally considered it, and a vote to sustain it is a vote to further consider this bill and vote at the conclusion of its consideration on the bill as it then stands. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. The gentleman does not contend that with regard to the fund he has just referred to, that the Federal Government makes an assignment of part of its revenues, does he?

Mr. LEHLBACH. I do not understand the gentleman.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. The money is appropriated regularly from year to year. The contribution of the Federal Government to pay the insurance of the Federal employees to which the gentleman has just referred is made from year to year by ordinary appropriation, is it not?

Mr. LEHLBACH. I do not know whether it will be or not. No contribution by the Government has yet been made; but I assume that when it comes about that the Government contributes to the retirement fund, some system of automatic appropriation for the fund will be devised, and that the employees who retire will not be left to the whim of any Congress or to the failure of any particular appropriation bill, as sometimes happens.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. No such segregation of any particular part of the Government revenues is even contemplated in the legislation to take care of the pension, is it?

Mr. LEHLBACH. A segregation of the moneys that are paid into the Treasury by the employees is provided for; and "what is sauce for the goose is sauce for the gander."

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Mr. Chairman—

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Chairman—

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Chairman—

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman from Pennsylvania rise?

Mr. EDMONDS. I would like to move that all debate close on this section.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I hope the gentleman will not object to a fair debate.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maryland has been recognized.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Chairman, it is difficult indeed to discuss in a short speech this subsidy bill, or, as others choose to call it, this merchant marine bill. It is fraught with so many angles of discussion, so problematical, and of such vast importance to the American people it would require not alone several long speeches but months of study to properly place the matter before the people of our country. The sad part of it is, however, that after all discussion and all study has been completed the result arrived at could not be more than problematical. That the enactment into law of this bill would establish a great departure in American legislation and in appropriations of Congress is very certain.

We are confronted by suggestions upon this bill presented by the President of the United States, Mr. Harding, and the chairman of the Shipping Board, Mr. Albert Lasker. Mr. Lasker is very fond of discussing matters, as we often hear it expressed in business parlance, of selling an article or a subject. Mr. Lasker is endeavoring to sell to the American people this proposal of his for a ship subsidy to be provided by this legislation. It is very certain that Mr. Lasker has sold himself to the proposition, and likewise has our President. That he or the President could ever see but one side of this great proposition is positive.

The war was concluded in 18 months after the entrance of America into the fray. Vast millions were expended in order to bring it to a conclusion, and while very expensive indeed, the expense can not be considered when we realize the thousands of human lives saved, the thousands of young men who were saved from being cripples or sightless for the balance of their human lives, the vast Treasury which was saved by quick action by reason of these consequent large expenditures.

America has nothing to regret in her large expenditures when it is considered what she accomplished. The point I am making, however, is whether we should not charge to that vast expenditure for war purposes the cost of the ships of some $3,000,000,000, or a large part thereof, which we are endeavoring to dispose of. We must carry ourselves back to the time when England cried to America, saying "Our backs are against the wall." We must likewise carry ourselves back to the time when the submarines of the German Empire were sinking the allied ships so rapidly that it appeared enough ships could not be constructed to keep up the commerce of the nations and carry the supplies for the armies. Then it was that America launched upon the greatest shipbuilding era in the history of the world. The cry was "Ships," and "More ships," and so this mighty merchant marine was rapidly constructed and served its purpose. To-day it is estimated we have about 1,400 steel ships with an aggregate gross tonnage of 7,000,000—that is, about 500,000 in passenger ships, about 550,000 in tankers, and about 6,000,000 in freighters, making the total of 7,000,000 tonnage. Of this vast tonnage there are about 421 ships in operation, the other two-thirds being tied up. For this great fleet it is estimated that if they could be sold at all they would not bring over $200,000,000.

The question further is, Can they be sold, which is doubtful, and if they can not be sold, then what are we to do with them? Thus we reach the proposal of Mr. Lasker that we establish a departure by creating a ship subsidy for the purchasers of these ships and for the owners and builders of ships generally.

The proposal presented by this bill is that we sell these ships for $200,000,000, lend $125,000,000 to recondition those ships or build others, and in 10 years provided in this bill to pay to the shipowners in subsidies $750,000,000 or about $75,000,000 per year. That is practically giving the ships away and presenting in 10 years to the people who purchase them some $500,000,000 for doing so and for operating them. That is not all; it is proposed to create a revolving fund of $125,000,000 and to loan this to these shipowners at 2 per cent interest to the extent of two-thirds of the valuation of the ships and for 15 years.

What will the farmer say when he considers that under his farm-loan legislation he is compelled to pay 6 per cent interest and then only to receive a loan of 50 per cent on the market valuation of his farm? The farmer is to pay taxes on his farm and on the income derived therefrom, but this bill provides that the shipowners shall be relieved from taxation, provided the amount which would otherwise be payable as taxes is invested in ship construction. Then, too, the man who ships on these vessels is to receive a reduction on his income taxes equal to 5 per cent of the freight paid. The result is that while the President in his address to Congress led the people to believe that this was only an expenditure from the Treasury of some $30,000,000 per year, Mr. Lasker himself said in his testimony that the indirect benefits were more valuable than this direct subsidy benefit, and it has been estimated that the expense direct and indirect to the people of this country will exceed $75,000,000 each year, as I have stated above; others, however, believe it will exceed that.

There is another great danger in this bill, and sad to remark, it is one which is dependent upon largely for the success of the measure; that is the so-called "elasticity of the bill." It is so elastic that it may be used to the injury of certain ports, and to the favoritism of others. This elasticity, while hard to discard, is certainly dangerous in the extreme. We people of Baltimore are quite familiar with the fact that the smiles of the Shipping Board have not always rested upon our harbor, and we have at times been suspicious that other ports have been favored when we should have been selected. It comes, therefore, with great force upon our people, and fraught with many dangers—this elasticity question.

The pending bill provides that any sailing ship of 1,000 gross tons or more or any power-propelled ship of 1,500 tons or more may be given a subsidy under a 10-year contract at the rate of one-half of 1 per cent for each gross ton or each 100 nautical miles covered. Power-propelled ships, beginning with 12-knot ships or more, may be allowed subsidies ranging from one-tenth of a cent for a 12-knot ship to 2.1 for ships making 23 knots or over. These subsidy contracts are made by the Shipping Board—not by Congress or any committee of Congress representing directly the people, but by the Shipping Board for 10 years, absolutely obliterating the power of Congress for the next 10 years to change, modify, or alter the least detail in these contracts, no matter how much time may show the unwisdom of the project.

Moreover, the board is permitted to increase the subsidy up to double or to decrease it, or the Shipping Board may absolutely refuse any subsidy within its discretion. Under this elastic feature the board might give to a ship a greater subsidy out of one port to enable it to serve a portion of the country by a longer route that should be served by a closer port. It might consider it proper to give ships sailing from one port large subsidies to enable them to serve the country, to the detriment of the near-by port; in other words, it gives to the Shipping Board sufficient power under this elasticity clause to make or mar any port in the United States.

The President of the United States told us in his address to Congress that such aid was not new, and as an example quoted Government aid toward the construction of good roads. This illustration is, indeed, far-fetched, to say the least. As to the ships, the Government provides deep channels and harbors, lighthouses along the shore, and every facility necessary for the safe navigation of ships, and now it is proposed under this bill, in addition to the provisions made for sea routes and their safety, to give the owners of ships a large subsidy to operate ships on these routes.

The money appropriated for construction of good roads is appropriated in the interest of all the people, and not in the interest of any special class of owners or operators. The highways are open to everybody who wishes to use them, but they are not given a subsidy for using them; on the contrary, each State provides a license fee, which must be paid for using them and to defray maintenance. Quite a different proposition and in no way related.

This ship subsidy bill is nothing more nor less than a twin brother of the outrageous protective tariff bill. They carry special protection to vast favorite interests, which enable them through the tariff bill to reach down into the pockets of the American people and take therefrom to the extent of $4,000,000,000, and this ship subsidy will enable them to reach down into the same pockets and take therefrom perhaps $1,000,000,000 in the course of the 10 years for which the contracts are made and bestow it upon the Shipping Trust and its allied interests.

It is the policy of the Republican Party to protect special interests whether they be manufacturers or whether they be shipowners, and this iniquitous ship subsidy bill is nothing more nor less than an extenuation and enlargement of that policy. As has been well said by my friend John W. Owens, the present administration has these ships on hand; it has devolved this proposition, not knowing what to do with the ships, and it is merely jumping out of the frying pan into the fire.

Why should we not practice more economy in the overhead charges of the Shipping Board? There are now some 8,000 employees. There are but 400 ships in operation, and all of these ships are practically under contract; not more than about 15 ships are operated directly by the Shipping Board. This board is losing approximately $4,000,000 per month. If they would cut down upon this vast list of employees and bring salaries within a fair radius, it might be possible to operate without a loss until the ships can be disposed of to private owners under better and more prosperous conditions.

As I have said, the trouble with this bill is that the whole matter is problematical. If we would deal with history, we would be convinced that ship subsidies will avail us nothing. If we would listen to the chairman, Mr. Albert Lasker, who has had only a few months' experience in the shipping business, and who is a notable advertising gentleman, and is to be congratulated upon the great success of his firm in that line, then we are at a loss as to placing any certain reliability to his statements, because shipping has not been his calling, and no matter how great a man he is, without experience he can not speak with authority; for instance, when he testified he stated that certain gentlemen would give more definite statements as to the bill, but when it came to the time they should have made such statements many of them did not appear and others presented their opinions in writing, thereby obviating cross-examination, which is certainly vital in such matters. Chairman Lasker himself, it is stated, became so involved that he gave utterance to expressions as follows:

I had no idea you gentlemen would ask me to give the testimony. All of it has been given me, but my mind can not hold it all. You will save a lot of time if you will let us start putting on experts.

I have really only been a regular advertising expert until I came down here to handle this shipping.

I was the only man who would take this job. The President couldn't get anyone else, and as Eva Tanguay says in her song, "Gee, it is great to be crazy."

It may be "great to be crazy," but when that involves the Treasury of the United States and places additional burdens upon people already heavily taxed, it is, to say the least, not encouraging.

It is the intention of this bill to build up a great merchant marine at the expense, of course, of the British merchant marine. I can not believe that Great Britain, which now pays not more than two and a half millions in subsidies and subventions, will be driven from the sea by measures of this nature. I believe we can build up a great merchant marine, but it will require energy, perseverance, and efficiency. Moreover, it will require the patriotism of our American people strong enough to lead them to use our ships—ships flying the American flag, both in our freight and passenger service. Great Britain depends not merely upon its efficiency, but it depends upon the patriotism of not alone England but of its many colonies in various parts of the globe. It is said that the sun never sets on the British Empire, and I may add that every member of that empire is patriotic to the British merchant marine. Let the citizens of the United States and her colonies do likewise, and, with efficiency and energy, the American flag will fly on an American merchant marine sailing the seven seas of the world.

It was said that the cost of ships was what prevented the building of an American merchant marine. That obstacle has long since been removed, as the American Government is ready to supply ships at far less than Great Britain or any other country can construct them. It was said that the marine act made it too expensive to operate an American merchant marine, but Mr. Lasker in his testimony has exploded that theory.

If you remember, it has not been long since we created a Budget system, and we led the people of this country to believe that after the creation of that system they would know definitely what this Government would cost them. But here we are, almost at the threshold, assigning under section 402 of this bill a very large part of the income of the National Government. By paragraph A we assign to the Shipping Board fund all tonnage duties, tonnage taxes or light money, some $5,000,000. Under paragraph B we assign to it 10 per cent of all customs duties derived from the tariff act, some $45,000,000. As to section C, which provides for payment to the Shipping Board fund of all excess earnings, I do not believe that Uncle Sam will ever receive any part of the money thus earned. If you will remember, under the Federal reserve bank act we created a system by which the United States was to receive a part, after the payment of a certain percentage, and just the moment we reached that point, after collecting excessive interest rates, after they had amassed a very large fund, and it looked as though something was going into the United States Treasury, what happened? Why, in New York they said we want a bank and grounds which will cost $27,000,000; in St. Louis they wanted the same thing, which would cost $7,000,000; in Richmond they wanted the same thing, which would cost $5,000,000. I do not know what they want in New Orleans, but I will wager before they get through with the expenditures on these vast buildings they are proposing there will not be one cent of excess earnings from the Federal reserve system coming into the United States Treasury, and thus will it be with the earnings from the Shipping Board.

Mr. STEVENSON. If the gentleman will yield, did not this very Congress in order to stop the expenditures say that they could not spend more than $250,000 without authority of Congress?

Mr. LINTHICUM. The gentleman is absolutely correct. Here in this Congress, after creating a Budget system to show the people of the country what the Government was costing them, they propose to make these assignments of the revenues of the United States to this Shipping Board fund and to leave to the board the expenditures therefrom. Now, gentlemen, if all that is to be done, then the President was not fair to this Congress and this country when he said that it was costing $52,000,000 to run the merchant marine at the present time, and if we give $30,000,000 we would save to the people $20,000,000 in the running of the merchant marine under this bill. I think we ought to have had more time and not limited debate in reference to amendments. We should not have tied ourselves to the time of the vote on the measure, which is of such vast importance to the American people. We should not have had a certain time to vote without knowing what amendments are to be offered.

There is another thought I have in mind which should be brought out. If you remember, this ship subsidy bill was considered by the committee during the early part of this year, and the President at that time stated that it must be passed before the adjournment of Congress. Certain leaders surrounded him and persuaded him not to press the measure. The measure was not presented to Congress but was deferred until this special session and after the general election. It was discussed, however, throughout the country and it was generally understood would be brought up at the next session. The people repudiated the Republican Members, indicating as clearly as anything could that no such legislation was desired, and yet here we have the sad spectacle of a party repudiated at the general election placing upon the statute books legislation which binds the hands of a nation for the next 10 years.

If the measure is a good one, why should not the President have left it until the new Congress comes in fresh from the people who will voice the sentiments and desires of their constituents? It is an outrage upon the American taxpayer to bind the Nation and its Treasury in a matter such as this when the people have spoken so explicitly at the general election.

I have said previously that history demonstrates a subsidy will not create a merchant marine, and in substantiation of that fact I introduce as a part of my remarks extracts from the report which Professor Borchard made to the Shipping Board. Here are the extracts:

GREAT BRITAIN.

Mr. Meeker (Dr. Royal Meeker) adds that the payments were in large part concealed bounties. He says that postal subventions did not first establish steamship communication between England and North America, and that the subsidies hindered rather than helped the natural development of steam navigation. The Cunard Co. was helped to make large profits, but the subsidy did succeed in establishing a regular line of steamers earlier than might otherwise have been the case. But while Cunard was aided others were correspondingly discouraged. Mr. Meeker adds that the benefits to the war navy were equally fictitious.

In 1902 the British Board of Admiralty declared that the payments to steamship companies by that board were worse than wasted.

The net postal subvention, after deductions, paid by England to its various services amounts to about $2,500,000.

HOW BRITISH MARINE GREW.

All the writers seem to agree that the growth of the British merchant marine is in no sense due to the small subsidy paid, admitting that the payments are in excess of the postal service rendered. The growth of the British marine was probably due to the early development of British industry, the acquisition of extensive colonial possessions, and the monopolistic or preferred position in colonial trade. The cheapness of construction and the concentration on the business account for most of its success.

FRANCE.

France appears to be the country of subvention par excellence, although in 1910 its merchant marine was outranked by Great Britain, United States, Germany, Norway, and Japan. In 1881 its enlarged program of direct subvention began.

There seems to be a general agreement that the French subsidy system, which has been more or less the model for Italy, Spain, and Japan, has been a failure. It has not given the benefits to the French merchant marine that were expected, although it is safe to say that without the subsidies the French merchant marine might by this time have been almost depleted.

ITALY.

The results of the subsidy in Italy have not been any more successful than in France, although Italy has a long seacoast, a dense population, efficient marine workers, and low wages. She is handicapped, however, by a lack of coal and a highly developed iron and steel industry.

In 1870 Italy had a tonnage, mostly sail, of about 1,000,000. In 1911 they had 1,100,000, an increase of 100,000 tons, although the proportions between sail and steam were over 700,000 for steam and 400,000 for sail.

SPAIN AND PORTUGAL.

The bounty on Spanish-built ships has been in force since the tariff law of 1889. It is partly to compensate domestic builders for the tariff paid on imported materials. These bounties run from 40 pesetas (7.72 cents) per gross ton per 1,000 miles on wooden ships to 75 pesetas (14.48 cents) on iron or steel ships per total registered ton.

Apparently the subsidy had little effect in increasing Spanish ship-building.

Portugal's shipping had not increased greatly since 1900, namely, from about 100,000 tons to 114,000 tons net. The Portuguese subventions have not been large, remaining at about $150,000 since 1889, and being confined principally to the maintenance of regular steamship communication between Portugal and her colonies. They are primarily postal subventions.

JAPAN.

Japan aids shipping somewhat on the system of France, but being more industrially favored than France the system has been far more successful in Japan.

THE NETHERLANDS.

Government aid is largely confined to postal and colonial subventions for the maintenance of regular communications between the home country and the Dutch colonies in the Far East and the West Indies. The grants are in excess of the cost of postal service and to that extent are subsidies, but the Government has secured the free carriage of mails and the important colonial object of regular communication with the colonies.

DENMARK.

Denmark has not given much State aid, but no particular conclusions can be drawn from the Danish experience.

NORWAY.

The small shipping subsidies which Norway has granted to its merchant marine can not have had a material effect on this growth, which is due to other circumstances, namely, geography, seafaring ability, liberal navigation laws, and a low cost of production.

SWEDEN.

Sweden's merchant marine is about half that of Norway and ranks ninth among the merchant navies of the world. It rose from about 350,000 tons in 1870, almost all sail, to about 900,000 tons in 1914, of which one-sixth only was sail. This growth is not due probably to Government aid, but to the growth of the industries of the country.

GERMANY.

Prior to the war, however, Germany had reached perhaps the greatest growth in her merchant marine. This was not due to subsidies or to any form of Government aid that can be established. The greatest line in the world, the Hamburg-American, is said never to have received a cent of Government subsidy.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maryland asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Chairman, I ask recognition in opposition to the last speaker.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I have been seeking recognition even before the gentleman from Maryland, and I thought the Chair said he would recognize me next. If I am assured of five minutes I do not care where I come in after the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Let us have some arrangement about time.

Mr. EDMONDS. I move that debate on this section and all amendments thereto—

Mr. HARDY of Texas. I do not think the gentleman has the floor.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has not recognized the gentleman from Texas. What proposition does the gentleman from Pennsylvania make?

Mr. EDMONDS. I move that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in 10 minutes.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. If the gentleman will withhold that a moment and let me make a suggestion. I am sure the gentleman from Pennsylvania knows that this side is not disposed to try to delay this bill in any way whatever, nor to indulge in any captious debate. This, as stated by the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. LEHLBACH], is a very important section, and there are several gentlemen who want to be heard upon it, and I would be very glad if the gentleman will be more liberal than closing debate at the end of 10 minutes.

Mr. EDMONDS. Can the gentleman give me any idea as to how much time there is desired?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Fifteen minutes is desired on this side.

Mr. FREAR. I wish two minutes in which to offer an amendment, and I understood the gentleman from Pennsylvania to say I must take care of myself.

Mr. EDMONDS. I will ask that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in 30 minutes, 15 minutes to each side, to be controlled by the majority members of the committee. Well, I will make it 20 minutes on each side.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Name the parties.

Mr. EDMONDS. To be divided equally between those in favor of the bill and those against the bill.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Controlled by whom?

Mr. EDMONDS. By Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts and the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HARDY].

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania that there be 20 minutes debate on a side, the time to be controlled on the several sides by himself and the gentleman from Texas. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Mr. Chairman, on this amendment to this paragraph which the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. LEHLBACH] says is the key to the bill, I would like to be heard by the patient, thinking Members on that side. The gentleman from New Jersey calls this paragraph the key to the bill.

Have we reached the point where there is any branch of this Government that must be independent of Congress as to the appropriations for carrying out its functions? Never before in the history of this country have we had an independent arm of the Government with an independent treasury to draw from; never have we had an independent arm of the Government that did not have to come to Congress to request appropriations.

Now, let me tell you what this section does. It could authorize the appropriation of $125,000,000 a year for the purpose of carrying out the intent of this act, and that would leave it to the Congress always to appropriate that much or a portion thereof; but the money would not be set aside and could not be paid without an appropriation. Under this paragraph, however, there come not into the Treasury of the United States proper but into the Treasury to be set aside by the Secretary in a special fund certain revenues. What are they? First, 10 per cent of all the import taxes, and our import taxes for the coming year are estimated at $450,000,000. That is $45,000,000 which will go into this special fund. Certain dues from tonnage, dues estimated at $6,000,000. That is $51,000,000 that goes into that fund in the very fiscal year in which this law is passed. What else? The President says it will require about $15,000,000 or less during the first year of the administration of this act. What becomes, then, of the balance of the $51,000,000? Why, it lies there, a sacred fund, which Congress can not touch, segregated from the general funds of the Treasury, and for all purposes of legislation it is practically spent, because you have not got it to draw against for any other purpose.

Why, gentlemen, this law is so tremendous in its far-reaching effect that if we did not spend in subsidies more than $15,000,000 per annum on the average for the next five years we will accumulate in this fund, made sacred by this law against the uses of the Government for any other purpose, some $200,000,000 set aside from the tariff revenues and the tonnage dues and the other sources mentioned that we can not touch. Do you want that?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Yes.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Suppose we entered into these contracts providing for a yearly appropriation, and the gentleman from Texas was in Congress when the next appropriation bill came up. Would the gentleman be willing to vote to appropriate the money to carry out the law?

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Oh, I will say to the gentleman that we leave our sick and wounded soldiers to be appropriated for by the committees of this Congress and by the action of this Congress. [Applause on the Democratic side.] But here is an interest so strong that it comes before Congress and demands that it be not required to approach Congress as every other organization and every other interest of the country does, but that this permanent fund be set aside for it, not to be touched for any other purpose, and paid out to shipowners on warrants drawn by the chairman of the Shipping Board.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Would the gentleman be willing to vote to appropriate the money to carry out the terms of the contract next year?

Mr. HARDY of Texas. I may not be here next year, but if I were, I would be willing to vote. I would never vote to repudiate a contract or obligation.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. What is the difference between doing it now and doing it next year?

Mr. HARDY of Texas. The next year you will probably have more than enough, and this does according to the President's statement appropriate three times as much as will be needed. He says $15,000,000 will run the ships, and this bill appropriates $45,000,000 from the tariff revenues.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. This does not appropriate anything, does it?

Mr. HARDY of Texas. It certainly does; it sanctifies it and segregates it and prevents it from ever coming into the Treasury. It makes it a special fund to be placed to the credit of the Shipping Board and paid out on its draft.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Yes.

Mr. STEVENSON. And at the bottom of page 25, beginning with line 23 of the bill, it says, "All moneys in the fund are hereby permanently appropriated."

Mr. HARDY of Texas. That next section is not needed. It is appropriated by this section. It never will go into the general funds. It is permanent; it is segregated and sacred. Here comes an interest which is to receive great rights and privileges from Congress, and it says, "We will not trust a future Congress; we demand that you fix it so no future Congress can deny us." [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Chairman, one would think this was a most extraordinary and unusual proposition, while the fact is that no less an authority than the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations has said that there are probably more permanent appropriations than there are temporary or annual appropriations; that is, that there are more appropriations made by permanent law than are contained in the annual appropriation bills.

Let us see what some of these permanent appropriations are. All expenses incident to the floating of Government loans, the preparation and issuance of reserve notes, the preparation and issue and custody of farm loan bonds, the cost of recoinage of silver, the repayment to importers of excessive deposits under the tariff laws, the debentures, drawbacks, bounties, and allowances under the customs or tariff laws; the sinking fund, by which the national debt is paid; the interest on the public debt, the redemption of Government bonds, obligations retired from Federal reserve banks for franchise receipts, all expenses for cooperative vocational training and education in agriculture, trades, teachers, and industries, all expenses for the cooperative rehabilitation and vocational education of persons injured in industry, and a number of other matters that I have not time to take note of at this moment. The fact is, Mr. Chairman, that the permanent appropriations exceed those which are made annually in the appropriations by Congress.

This is a proposition under which the United States Government will make contracts for 10 years with operators of vessels and will assure to them and will promise to them and undertake to pay them the Government aid which is provided for in this bill. If there is no permanent unassailable authority for the payment of this compensation, of course no business man will enter into a contract with the Shipping Board representing the Government for the investment of his money.

I want to emphasize what was said by the gentleman from New Jersey. If you want to kill this bill you can do it by the elimination of this provision. This is the one provision which is absolutely necessary for the practical operation of this legislation. Some concessions have been made and other concessions doubtless will be made from what the committee firmly believe to be actually essential for the accomplishment of all the purposes of this bill, but on this proposition there can be no concessions; because, unless we are able to say to men who want to invest their funds in the shipping business that their return is assured, that the payment of their compensation is assured and not dependent upon the action of Congress annually in the passage of appropriation bills, we might as well make up our minds that we are going to be successful in performing the things designed by this bill.

Mr. Chairman, I said yesterday that this committee has no pride of authorship in this bill; but this is an essential. This is absolutely necessary. Unless we have the fund created by this legislation, the question will be raised every time an appropriation bill is passed whether this compensation should be paid. The Government proposes to keep its contract. We propose that the Government shall keep faith. When we authorize the making of these contracts for 10 years we intend that the subsidy, or the aid, or the compensation shall be paid to shipowners and to ship operators, and if we so intend, why not make that declaration now? If a subsequent Congress should feel disposed to repudiate the solemn obligation of the Government, let that be their business. But so far as this Congress is concerned, if this Congress intends to pass a bill of this character, to promote and establish and maintain the merchant marine by the granting of Government aid, it must do the full job, it must perform its full duty, without equivocation and without leaving it to subsequent action to make effective the acts which are taken by this Congress.

Further on there will be discussions as to details for the expenditure and the use of this fund. This section merely creates the fund and provides for setting aside the money in the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. HARDY. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. ANDREWS].

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the Record.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Nebraska asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the Record. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, we need, and ought to have, an American merchant marine. It should be highly efficient and responsive to the commercial and financial interests of the people of the United States. I believe that there is quite common agreement upon these points. Issue is joined, however, when we begin to discuss the methods by means of which this policy is to be carried into execution. Personally I am not in sympathy with the idea of subsidies in any particular whatever as a fundamental principle of government. However, we know that Government aid under different forms is extended in various directions. We have in point just here a very forceful comparison. This bill means transportation by water. A few years ago discussion was centered upon transportation on land, and the railroad problem was the dominant question. Then Congress voted subsidies to railroads amounting to over $2,000,000,000 for 26 months for the operation of the railroads. When you put the subsidy of $30,000,000 a year as proposed in this bill in comparison with that proposition the figures fade into insignificance. Nevertheless, the principle remains. Here we have the proposition that we are to take funds that come into the National Treasury and pay them as subsidies to private or corporate ownership in the operation of ships.

Whether the amount be large or small, the principle remains the same. Having helped to abolish subsidies for railroads, I am opposed to subsidies for ships also.

Our farmers and manufacturers should not be dependent upon the merchant vessels of foreign countries to carry their surplus products to the markets of the world.

We should avoid in every reasonable way the reduction of our circulating medium by the payment of tonnage fees to the shipowners of foreign countries.

A merchant marine owned and operated by Americans and American capital under American charters and the American flag would give to our people the best possible advantages for access to foreign markets at the most favorable times for good prices for the products of American labor.

I am thoroughly in sympathy with these fundamental principles and deeply regret that the subsidy and loan provisions of this bill seriously interfere with their application. My mind inclines toward the continuance of existing conditions temporarily, in the hope that these objectionable features may be ultimately removed.

Some of the arguments advanced by the minority members of the committee reporting this bill prompt me to ask the following question:

How would the maximum amount of subsidies proposed in this bill compare with the total amount of subsidies exceeding $2,000,000,000 voted by a Democratic Congress (Sixty-fifth) to the railroads of the country through the Federal control act of March 21, 1918?

It should be remembered that a Democratic Congress voted those railroad subsidies upon the National Treasury and that a Republican Congress (Sixty-sixth) abolished them. In this connection note a few facts, as follows:

In 1912 the railroads of this country were furnishing the best and cheapest transportation that has ever been enjoyed by the American people. That condition had been developed under Republican legislation and administration, extending through a period of nearly 50 years.

In 1913 the Republicans were retired from both legislative and executive branches of our Federal Government.

Between 1915 and 1921 the Democratic Party under the leadership of Woodrow Wilson enacted legislation and adopted executive policies that resulted in the advancement of railroad rates to the highest point ever known in American history. The peak was reached in 1920. Under those conditions the people not only paid the highest transportation charges, but they have also been required to pay billions of dollars into the National Treasury through taxes and loans to discharge the financial obligations which the Wilson administration imposed upon the country by guaranteeing net returns to the railroads.

The Wilson-McAdoo guaranteed subsidies to railroads were enacted into law by the Federal control act of March 21, 1918. That act was repealed by a Republican Congress, so that Government control ceased on March 1, 1920, and all guaranteed rates were abolished, to take effect September 1, 1920.

According to the terms of that act, the guaranty was to extend 21 months beyond the date of the issuance of a proclamation of peace with the Central Powers. That proclamation was issued July 2, 1921. Thus the Wilson-McAdoo subsidy carried in the Federal control act would have extended to April 2, 1923. The transportation act of 1920, however, repealed that subsidy, to take effect September 1, 1920, 31 months earlier than the termination of the Wilson-McAdoo guaranty, thus releasing our National Treasury from an additional liability of $1,937,000,000.

The Railroad Labor Board appointed by President Wilson advanced wages to their highest point in 1920, and in the same year the Interstate Commerce Commission, also appointed by President Wilson, advanced railroad rates to their highest point. Crown Prince McAdoo did not, however, increase railroad rates sufficiently to balance the increase of wages made by him during his control of the roads as director general. Consequently the Interstate Commerce Commission made a larger increase in rates in 1920 than would have been required if the crown prince had discharged the duties of director general properly.

The Republican administration at Washington has been gradually developing plans during recent months for the restoration of the transportation business of the country to a normal peace basis. The most serious difficulties encountered in that effort are the influences of the Democratic policies established under Mr. McAdoo.

Every dollar that has been taken from the National Treasury to pay those subsidies to the railroads was levied by the Wilson administration under the Federal control act of March 21, 1918. While our Democratic opponents voted for those subsidies, we abolished them.

All guaranties mentioned in the transportation act of 1920, sometimes called the Esch-Cummins Act, are reproductions of like provisions of the Federal control act, and were thus allowed to continue for a period of six months to avoid a financial collapse and general strikes throughout the country.

The Wilson-McAdoo subsidies have cost the National Treasury over $2,000,000,000 already; and if the law had run its course to April 2, 1923, they would have created additional liabilities approximating $1,937,000,000.

The figures expressed by the wildest flights of imagination in connection with this shipping bill fade into insignificance in comparison with the railroad subsidies voted by a Democratic Congress out of the National Treasury through the Federal control act.

As our Democratic opponents voted railroad subsidies exceeding $2,000,000,000 for 26 months, why should they hesitate at the ship subsidies specified in this bill?

As I have heretofore opposed railroad subsidies and helped to abolish them, I now oppose ship subsidies, and for that reason will record my vote against this bill unless the subsidy provisions should be eliminated.

Mr. CLARKE of New York. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Certainly.

Mr. CLARKE of New York. How do you expect to get a merchant marine? What is your idea?

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. I am in favor of going forward for the time being, laying pressure upon more efficient management under Government operation, and with the revival of business hoping to get a better market for the sale of the ships and a better opportunity for the National Treasury to increase its revenues to pay the bill.

We are advised by the House Committee on Appropriations that the operating expenses of our merchant vessels now exceed their receipts by $50,000,000 a year. This deficiency, of course, is covered by direct appropriations from the Treasury. The House Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries which reported this shipping bill informs us that the annual payments to cover subsidies will amount to $30,000,000 a year. In this judgment the President's message seems to concur. Thus it appears that the passage of this bill in its present form would not reduce annual expenditures beyond $20,000,000 a year.

This fact suggests numerous inquiries. How many times $20,000,000 would the Government lose in the sale of these ships upon the depressed market? On the other hand, how many times $20,000,000 could be realized from the sale of the ships at a later date when the general business conditions of the Nation and the world are revived? Will not expanding business bring a better market for ships as well as other things? Would it not be wise to try out the problem of Government operation here and now while we have the ships?

The results of that test would go a long distance toward settling in the minds of the people of the country the advisability of Government ownership and operation of public utilities.

According to the evidence from both committees, the maximum loss would not exceed $20,000,000 a year, and that might be the minimum expense for testing out the theory of Government ownership and operation of an American merchant marine.

In making these tests it will not be necessary for the Government to commit itself on either side of the question of Government ownership and operation. Let the tests themselves demonstrate the results and upon the ground of those results let us form our conclusions.

For one I am ready to make that test and abide by its results rather than vote for the passage of this bill. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Nebraska has expired.

Mr. EDMONDS. I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR].

Mr. HARDY of Texas. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR] two minutes additional, making four in all.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR] is recognized for four minutes.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I think I have a solution for this dilemma into which we have been so unfortunately forced. I hope the House will agree with me on it. We recognize that there is a shortage in the Treasury to-day of $670,000,000, as stated by Secretary Mellon; that the Commissioner of Internal Revenue day before yesterday gave out a statement that the Treasury income returns this year are $1,400,000,000 less than they were last year. The Executive of this Government, in his wisdom and in a belief that it is proper to keep in the Treasury a sufficient amount to provide for unusual expenditures, proposed in the case of the soldiers' bonus bill that the bill itself should provide the means to finance it. That may be a right proposition. If so then, it is now. I am going to submit my amendment without discussion. I propose an amendment at the end of line 13, on page 24, striking out after the word "and" and inserting—that no part of the $125,000,000 loan fund shall be paid under the provisions of this bill until and after the reenactment of the excess-profits tax law by Congress.

[Laughter and applause.]

I yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. EDMONDS. Does the gentleman from Wisconsin offer that as an amendment?

Mr. FREAR. Yes; I offer it.

Mr. EDMONDS. Then, Mr. Chairman, I reserve all points of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

Page 24, line 13, after the word "and" insert "that no part of the $125,000,000 loan fund shall be paid under the provisions of this bill until and after the reenactment of the excess-profits tax law by Congress."

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against the amendment.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BANKHEAD. The time taken for a discussion of the point of order will not be taken out of the time allotted for discussion of the amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. No; if there is a discussion on the point of order, it will not.

Mr. EDMONDS. I make the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. What is the gentleman's point of order?

Mr. EDMONDS. That it is not germane to the question at all. This paragraph is for the purpose of setting aside a certain sum of money by the Treasury Department, and the gentleman's amendment is to raise taxes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. FREAR. Will the Chair hear me a moment?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman briefly.

Mr. FREAR. It is impossible to take from the Treasury something that is not there; so I desire to provide money for the Treasury that they can take out.

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Chairman, I would like to be heard a moment on the point of order.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Chairman, has not the Chair ruled on the point of order? I make the point of order that it is not in order to discuss a point of order after it has been sustained.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair ruled before there had been any discussion on the point of order, and the Chair will hear the gentleman from New York briefly.

Mr. LONDON. I claim, Mr. Chairman, that it is in order, because the payment is made contingent on the occurring of a certain event. In Title III, relating to the transportation of immigrants by water, the going into effect of section 301 is made dependent upon future action by the President in regard to certain treaties. By this amendment section 402 is to go into effect only when Congress shall have taken certain legislative action, namely, when it shall have enacted an excess-profit tax law. I think it is entirely in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The decisions seem to be uniform that propositions of this sort can not be brought in; that extraneous matter not germane to the matter under consideration can not be brought in in this way, and the Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. EDMONDS. Does the gentleman from Texas wish to yield any time on that side?

Mr. HARDY of Texas. How much time has the gentleman used?

Mr. EDMONDS. I think I have used seven minutes.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. I believe we have used 12 minutes.

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. SANDERS].

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, the motion is to strike out the section providing for the creation of a fund. It is not proposed that it shall be stricken out and something substituted, but it is proposed to strike out the section which lays the basis for the general appropriation. There seems to be some contention by gentlemen on the other side that this is abdication of the power of Congress. As a matter of fact, it is not; it is simply the exercise of the power of Congress. We are dealing with a proposition that covers a long period of years.

The Constitution provides not for annual appropriations. It makes this provision: That no money shall be drawn from the Treasury except in pursuance of an appropriation made by law. There is only one limitation that I know of, and that is in the provision of the Constitution with reference to raising money for the support of the Army, and that is limited to two years.

The Constitution does not contemplate that appropriations shall be made annually. That is done because ordinarily we carry on the business of the Government, pay salaries by the year, and so forth, and in the course of events the great number of expenses are incurred annually. As shown by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CHINDBLOM], a great many funds are created and carried over for a period of years. I suppose those who vote for the measure are expected to carry out the terms of the law. I asked the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HARDY], when he was on the floor, if he was in Congress and we had contracts and there was a liability by the Government, whether he, as a Member of Congress, would vote the money to pay it? He refused to answer at first, but finally said that he might. If he would, if Congress is in earnest, if we are in good faith, I do not know why we should not create a fund to provide for the payment and take it out of that fund. There is nothing indefinite about it. The contracts are definite. The amounts to be paid are definite, and it is purely an administrative matter to determine the amount due. I think we have created a fund, and properly so, to cover the entire matter.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. No; I yield the floor.

Mr. EDMONDS. Will the Chair state how the time stands?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania has 10 minutes and the gentleman from Texas has 9 minutes.

Mr. EDMONDS. We have but one more speech on this side.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES].

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I am in favor of the pending amendment. It is in accord with the declared policy of the Republican majority of this House. When this Congress first convened, if there was one thing promised by the leaders of the Appropriations Committee it was that they were going to make an honest effort to so appropriate the moneys of the Government that hereafter a citizen of this country could easily learn each year what the Government was costing them. Following that policy the chairman of the Appropriations Committee called upon every department to submit a report to Congress setting forth every permanent appropriation and every revolving fund. He has declared time and time again on this floor that he would before the adjournment of this Congress introduce a bill repealing every one of these permanent appropriations, revolving funds, and indirect appropriations, not only because Congress and the people were entitled to know what the Government is costing them but because experience on the Committee on Appropriations has shown that the existence of a permanent fund has often been an inducement for extravagance upon the part of the men who handle that fund. Gentlemen will notice that your floor leader, the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL], said of this particular provision in the bill—

I have some doubts as to the wisdom of that appropriation. I am not certain how I shall vote on the question, but I do know that in taking up an important matter of this sort the House should not bind itself in advance.

Your leader made that statement because from an experience of 20 years he knows there could be no more vicious legislation than that which is attempted by this provision. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CHINDBLOM] has sought to defend it, and how weak is the defense! He tells you that in the past some Congress created a revolving fund. That is true. During the war it was often done. But is that any reason why now, in time of peace, the same errors, the same wrongs, about which others have inveighed on this floor, should be again committed? If there is anything that men acquainted with appropriations of the Congress have hoped, it is that with the end of the war there would be an end to this; and yet now you come in here, in the closing days of the Congress, and seek to violate every policy you have made on this subject. The gentleman from Illinois said that permanent appropriations have been made for other purposes, including roads. He is wrong in that.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. I did not mention roads.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. I thought you did, and I am very glad to learn the gentleman did not, because here is what happened in respect to roads. This Republican majority passed a bill upon the subject of public roads only a few months ago. They would not appropriate for roads, but merely authorized an appropriation. The bill went to the Senate. The Senate struck out that provision and inserted a provision making an appropriation covering three years. What happened? Knowing it was unwise to make such an appropriation, when the bill came back here you properly and rightfully insisted upon the position I now urge upon you. Your conferees stood out against the Senate demand, insisting that it be made solely an authorization. You demanded when it came to the appropriation for the roads of the country that officials be made each year to present their budget to the Congress in order that the Congress and the people might know what was going on, and you won out in that respect, because you were right. Now, you say that you can not make these contracts because of the lack of appropriations, and yet in the Post Office appropriation bill for this year you specifically provide how it can be done with the road fund. You authorize the Secretary of Agriculture to make contracts for a period of years specified in the appropriation bill without making an appropriation, and in like manner you can do it in this bill for as many years as Congress thinks wise.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from South Carolina has expired.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman the four additional minutes which I have.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I was referring to the fact that the Post Office bill specifically provides for authorizations which would enable you to contract for from three to five years. My own opinion is, however, that it is unwise to do that. I think the present Congress should not in this matter bind the Congress for 10 years, as provided in this bill. If you want to specify a term of years, for which a contract may be made, we ought to limit it to two years, the life of a Congress. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CHINDBLOM] said that if a contract was not made for 10 years shipowners would not make the contract. Do you mean to tell me that if I were a shipowner to-day, operating without a subsidy, and you came to me and said that you would give me a subsidy for two years but no longer, that when I was getting nothing I would refuse to take a subsidy for those two years? Why, a contract of that kind would be accepted so quickly it would make your head swim.

Mr. J. M. NELSON. What is the consideration for the contract?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. I am not going into the merits of it. I simply want to stick to the appropriation end of it. Ten per cent of all customs duties shall be set aside to pay the subsidy. What will this amount to? In October the duties amounted to $40,185,835.

Up to November 24 it amounts to $37,716,000, which is at the rate of $45,000,000 per month. So that by this provision in the bill you are going to put into the fund available for this purpose of paying subsidies between $45,000,000 and $50,000,000 a year. The President of the United States, speaking from the platform here, told us and told the country that certainly for years to come they would need but $15,000,000. The gentlemen in charge of the bill on this floor, man after man, have asserted the same thing. Why, if it will cost but $15,000,000, should we set aside $50,000,000 a year out of the Treasury, in which there is a deficit, according to the President? Then look at the next page of the bill and you will see that it is made a permanent appropriation, so that it will accumulate from year to year. Instead of being $50,000,000 next year, they will carry over $35,000,000, according to the President, making the fund next year $85,000,000. Why do it? What is behind it? Why not make them come to Congress, just as every other department of the Government ought to be made to do, and give to Congress the situation as it is, telling us what they have paid out during the past year and what will probably be paid out, so that the Members of Congress and the country will know what is going on.

At the present time the subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations on Naval Affairs is making up the naval appropriation bill. That committee intends making an effort to take out of that bill all these permanent and revolving funds. That bill will come to the House in the next few weeks, and we will boast of our achievement, and yet to-day it is proposed to enact in this bill an entirely different policy. This Congress will expire March 4 next, and it is proposed to authorize contracts for 10 years, make a permanent appropriation, and prevent action by the new Congress. Why, even four years from now some Republican Congress may determine that the shipping business is on such a basis that this bill should be repealed. But under these provisions your officials could, before a bill was signed, make a contract for 10 years and practically prevent a repeal. Surely that is not the object. I do not think you want to do that. The necessity for a permanent appropriation does not exist, no man has shown it, and good legislation and economy demand that this amendment be agreed to. Then you gentlemen of the committee can come forward and offer an authorization such as is carried in the Post Office appropriation bill on the subject of roads. My friend from Illinois says that we have not offered such an amendment. I think the committee in charge of the bill ought to do that. I think they ought to bring in an authorization that will permit contracts for not more than two years and require appropriations from the fund to be made annually by Congress.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from South Carolina has expired.

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN].

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment. The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MADDEN: Page 24, after line 15 insert, "no expenditure shall be made from the merchant marine fund except out of the appropriations made annually therefrom by Congress for carrying out the purposes of this act."

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I want to say this, that it is all right enough to create a fund; it is very proper to create it. We created such a fund for the development of reclamation and then we put a provision at the end of that act similar to this. If that provision is good in the reclamation act it ought to be good in this act. Congress has never refused to appropriate out of a fund created by law, and I have no doubt but that the Congress will continue to obey the law and appropriate from time to time as the need develops. There is no need for us to fix an upset sum which may be two or three times the amount needed when we have Congress present which can every year fix the exact amount needed. The Appropriations Committee is the servant of the House. They will always be ready to consider the problems which confront the House. Every law enacted which places an obligation upon the Congress that requires an appropriation has been strictly adhered to by the Committee on Appropriations in the past, and that will be true as to the future. Contracts entered into under this act will be a sacred obligation and will not be ignored by the Appropriations Committee or the Congress.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Will the gentleman yield for a question for information?

Mr. MADDEN. I will.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Would the amendment of the gentleman leave this revenue in the general fund except what was appropriated, or would it be set aside by the other terms and have to remain whether appropriated or not?

Mr. MADDEN. The expenditures from year to year are subject to the action of Congress out of the fund. Now, if some disposition is to be made of the balance of the fund it would be easy for the Congress to do that whenever the need arises.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. EDMONDS. I yield one minute to the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] and the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS].

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, this amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] should be adopted. With the amendment adopted we will have a fund, which the bill very wisely provides, such as we have now under the reclamation law. Out of that fund Congress will make the necessary appropriations for carrying out the provisions of the bill. I have no doubt, I have no question, but what Congress will make all appropriations called for to carry out the contracts and operations. I believe it is better practice than to have a permanent appropriation over which Congress has no authority.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. EDMONDS. I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is recognized for seven minutes.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, the discussion on this amendment left me under the impression that many persons speaking thought this was a new plan. Whether it be wise or otherwise, we have practiced what is proposed by this amendment for years. I went to the Committee on Appropriations and got the record of our appropriations for next year, under the title of "Indefinite and permanent appropriations." For this next year they sum up $1,434,370,682. That means that we are in this practice, and the question was not raised when we provided these permanent appropriations in the general legislation when the policy of the legislation was being discussed.

Mr. STEVENSON. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. FESS. I regret I can not yield. I was on the Vocational Educational Commission that reported to the House that legislation. It was fathered in the Senate by Senator Smith, of Georgia, and in the House by Representative Hughes, of the same State, chairman of the committee. The law bears their names. That law provides for a permanent appropriation which when we reach the maximum will be $7,000,000 annually. That was not new. Just preceding that legislation there was also legislation to increase the agricultural interests of the country by what we call agricultural-extension education.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. FESS. I regret I can not yield.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. That passed before the Budget was adopted.

Mr. FESS. That law passed before the Budget was adopted. The agricultural-extension legislation was fathered by Mr. Lever, of South Carolina, one of our most capable Members and one of the most respected on both sides of the House. That law provided a permanent appropriation, because it was a continuing contract, and under it we had appropriated a very large sum of money. There was no objection to it then when the policy was being discussed.

I have here 17 large pages of these appropriations that go into a great number of permanent and indefinite appropriations, and while there might be some question as to the wisdom as a general policy of making these permanent laws requiring permanent appropriations, I want to call attention to the fact that this is not new; it is a well-established practice, and it has always been put upon the basis that where you have a permanent or continuing contract that can not be completed next year or the next year or the next year, that there ought to be a permanent law providing the supply of the money for the payment of the contract. I would like to illustrate. In the Treasury Department, under the head of "Drawbacks," everyone knows it would be impractical not to make available the money to pay the drawback this year of the tariff legislation, and therefore necessitates the waiting for a definite appropriation. So authority is given to the Secretary of the Treasury to make a contract in order to make the law effective.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. FESS. I regret I can not yield. Under the Treasury Department I find $1,344,338,800 permanently appropriated and definitely to take care of such situations as these. I find in the vocational and educational bill the same practice. Then I find in reference to vocational rehabilitation of persons disabled in industry the same thing. I find also under the United States Veterans' Bureau the same thing.

I find also under the District of Columbia, for special funds and trust funds, the same thing; also under the War Department. The permanent indefinite appropriation, for example, under the District of Columbia is $1,624,600, and under the War Department it amounts to $7,786,300. Also under the Navy Department there is a very large sum.

Now, gentlemen of the committee, under the Lever agricultural extension law it amounts to a very large sum. Under what we call the land-grant college contribution it amounts to $2,500,000.

I heard my friend from South Carolina speak just now concerning these laws. I do not know whether he said they ought to be repealed or not. I am sure he does not mean that these laws should be repealed. They are a permanent policy of our Government, under which we have developed our standing as a Nation, educationally, industrially, and otherwise, and certainly nobody desires to repeal those laws.

Then, under the Agricultural Department, construction of roads and trails in the national forests, and so forth, a million dollars; under the cooperative agricultural extension work, $4,580,000. We have here a total indefinite amount under the Department of Labor, $1,434,180.

Whatever objection may be made against this practice, which has continued for more than a half century, the objection now presented by the opponents of this bill is without any force.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired. All time has expired. The question is on agreeing to the preferential amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN].

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Mr. Chairman, may I have the amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois read?

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the amendment of the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. I offer that to the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. HARDY of Texas to the amendment offered by Mr. MADDEN: At the end of the Madden amendment add the following: "Provided, That any part of the fund not appropriated by Congress for the purposes of this act during any fiscal year shall be covered back into the Treasury and constitute a part of the general funds in the Treasury."

Mr. MADDEN. I hope that will not be adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas.

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the "noes" appeared to have it.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Mr. Chairman, a division. That will make the Madden amendment effective.

The CHAIRMAN. A division is demanded.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 76, noes 98.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, how was the vote?

The CHAIRMAN. Seventy-six ayes and ninety-eight noes.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I demand tellers.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee demands tellers.

Tellers were ordered, and the Chairman appointed Mr. CHINDBLOM and Mr. HARDY of Texas to act as tellers.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 101, noes 139.

So the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN].

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. DAVIS] to strike out the section.

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the "noes" appeared to have it.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. A division. Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee demands a division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 81, noes 139.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I ask for tellers.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee demands tellers.

Tellers were ordered, and the Chairman appointed Mr. CHINDBLOM and Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee to act as tellers.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 93, noes 132.

So the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

CONTRACT FOR COMPENSATION.

SEC. 403. (a) In order to aid the development and maintenance of the American merchant marine, to promote the growth of the foreign commerce of the United States, to contribute to the national defense and to carry out the policy set forth in section 1 of the merchant marine act, 1920, the board is authorized and directed on behalf of the United States to enter into a contract with any person, a citizen of the United States who is the owner of a vessel, for the payment of compensation in respect to such vessel, subject to the limitations of this title. The board shall not be required to enter into such contract unless in the judgment of the board such person possesses such ability, experience, resources, and character as, in the opinion of the board, to justify a belief that the payment of the compensation will be reasonably calculated to carry out such policies and otherwise promote the general welfare of the United States. The board shall not refuse to enter into any such contract on the ground that such person is not so qualified unless such refusal is specifically authorized by an affirmative vote of not less than five members of the board, and unless the vote and a full statement of the reasons for the refusal are spread upon the minutes of the board.

(b) Such contract shall provide that it shall be made for a period not exceeding 10 years from the date thereof, and shall provide that the payments of the compensation shall be made at reasonable intervals not exceeding 6 months.

(c) The Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to pay out of any moneys in the fund, compensation to the owner of any vessel with whom there has been made a contract under this section; but such payment shall be made only upon vouchers signed by the chairman of the board under authorization of the board. All moneys in the fund are hereby permanently appropriated for the purpose of making such payments and the refunds authorized by subdivision (j) of section 416.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BANKHEAD: Page 25, line 24, strike out "permanently" and insert in lieu thereof the words "authorized to be."

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, we have already had before the committee a rather elaborate discussion of the principle involved in the proposed amendment. I do not know that there is very much that I can add by way of objection to the system here invoked of making appropriations so far as this merchant-marine fund is concerned. I know that a considerable number of gentlemen in high authority on the Republican side have been very diligent heretofore in preserving the control by Congress annually over the large appropriations that are made for public purposes.

Here is proposed a proposition to take a very tremendous sum of money, which in effect is being converted into the Treasury out of the pockets of the taxpayers of America, and instead of leaving the control and disposition of it in the hands of the Congress of the United States, it is proposed here, unless my amendment is agreed to, that this enormous sum, amounting annually to at least $50,000,000 a year, and probably more—I say $50,000,000, because it is estimated that the revenue receipts at the customhouse under the present bill will amount at least to $450,000,000 a year, and 10 per cent of that will be converted into this merchant-marine fund—I say it is proposed here under the provisions of the bill that a contract shall be entered into by the Shipping Board for the minimum period of 10 years with these private ship operators, and it certainly will not be within the power of Congress after those contracts are entered into for a period of 10 years at least to change them, so far as the compensation feature is concerned.

It seems to me that in making our appropriations under the Budget system we should avoid such appropriations. I want to say that I was on the special committee on the Budget and favored that measure in principle, and I hope to see it carried out in practice. We were proposing to embark on a new system by which the Congress of the United States should in the last analysis have absolute control over the disposition of the revenues of the Government. It seems to me that we are here invoking a dangerous principle. It seems to me that this amendment which I have offered, in view of the amendment adopted as proposed by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] is not inconsistent with the attitude expressed by a majority of the committee on that proposition.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I yield to the gentleman for a question.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Here is a question in my mind which is entirely a legal one. This appropriation clause seems to be inconsistent with and contradictory to the Madden amendment. Now, if it is not changed, what is the gentleman's idea about the legal construction that will be given to this? Will the last provision control?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Undoubtedly. That is the ordinary and usual rule of construction by the courts, and I think that any lawyer who is familiar with judicial interpretation will agree with that proposition. So that as the matter is now presented on the record, and as it will be written into the law unless my amendment is adopted, you have here before you two absolutely inconsistent and repugnant provisions with reference to these appropriations.

I think that is about all I desire to say on this proposition, Mr. Chairman. I think the amendment is reasonable and in line with the expressed attitude of a majority of this committee on both sides of the House. I trust it will be adopted.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. May I suggest to the gentleman, in answer to the question of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GRAHAM], that the view which the gentleman from Alabama expresses will, I think, be taken by the courts not only for the reason given by the gentleman from Alabama, but any court would also have its attention drawn to the fact that the proviso offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HARDY] had been voted down.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Absolutely.

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me ridiculous to hear the Members on the other side of the House talking about this "enormous amount of money" that they say is going to be taken out of the Treasury and hidden away in some little place, to be used only when called upon by the Shipping Board. They know as well as any Member of the House knows that this is simply a revolving fund, a bookkeeping fund that is not taken out. The money is not laid aside in the Treasury. It is used for other purposes, and other money is used whenever it is called for.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Let me ask the gentleman—

Mr. EDMONDS. I have no time to yield now. I am perfectly willing to accept the amendment of the gentleman from Alabama. There is no reason why we should not agree to it after we have passed the Madden amendment. As far as I am concerned I think it was a mistake to pass that amendment. I do not know how you can expect men to come in and buy a piece of property costing $600,000 or $1,000,000 or $2,000,000 with no guaranty back of it at all from year to year as to what they are to get, excepting the word of some Congress to be elected in the future. However, the House has decided that question and we might as well accept the amendment of the gentleman and let it go through, but I do deprecate the practice of gentlemen who come on this floor and talk about this enormous fund that is going to be hidden away somewhere in the Treasury Department that nobody can find because it is set aside. It is merely a bookkeeping account and the gentleman knows it. All gentlemen know that.

I move that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto do now close.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman—

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Hicks). The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. EDMONDS] moves that all debate on this section and amendments thereto do now close. Those in favor will say "aye," those opposed "no." [The question was taken.] The ayes appear to have it, the ayes have it, and the motion is agreed to.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Division, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. SEARS. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry. The gentleman from Pennsylvania spoke for the amendment. There has been no chance to speak against it. Therefore debate is not closed, and the motion is not in order.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. The motion to close debate is in order at any time after five minutes.

Mr. SEARS. There must be one speech for and one speech against.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair overrules that. For what purpose does the gentleman from Tennessee rise?

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. I want to say that this is a very important section, and several amendments will be offered to it. It was announced on the other side that the—

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair can not recognize the gentleman after debate has been closed.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. I asked for a division.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is closed. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama.

The question being taken, the amendment of Mr. BANKHEAD was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment that I desire to offer.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

Mr. SEARS. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Florida wait until we dispose of this amendment?

Mr. SEARS. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. DAVIS] asked for a division on the motion to close debate, and the Chair did not put his demand but put the question on the Bankhead amendment instead.

The CHAIRMAN. Then the Chair was in error, because after the Chair had declared the motion carried the gentleman from Tennessee started to debate the amendment.

Mr. SEARS. I know that in railroading this bill through the Chair is liable to be in error, but it is, I am sure, an error of the head instead of an error of the heart; but I make that point.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair overrules the point of order. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. DAVIS] started to debate the question after debate had been closed. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. DAVIS].

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee: Page 25, line 23, after the word "Board," insert a colon and the words "Provided, That appropriations for such purpose shall have been made by the Congress."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. DAVIS].

The question being taken, on a division (demanded by Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee) there were—ayes 38, noes 92.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I ask for tellers. The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee demands tellers.

Tellers were ordered, and the Chairman appointed Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee and Mr. EDMONDS.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 34, noes 105.

Accordingly the amendment was rejected.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I wish to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. I ask unanimous consent to address the House for five minutes on this amendment, which I ask to have read.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. HARDY] asks unanimous consent to be allowed to address the House on this amendment. Is there objection?

Mr. MONDELL. I object.

Mr. SEARS. I make the point of no quorum.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that the vote by tellers a moment ago disclosed a number present considerably over a quorum.

Mr. SEARS. I will state to the Chairman that a good many of the Members have gone into the cloakroom.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and twenty-nine Members present, a quorum. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HARDY].

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. HARDY of Texas: Page 25, lines 1 to 13, after the word "title," strike out: "The board shall not be required to enter into such contract unless in the judgment of the board such person possesses such ability, experience, resources, and character as, in the opinion of the board, to justify a belief that the payment of the compensation will be reasonably calculated to carry out such policies and otherwise promote the general welfare of the United States. The board shall not refuse to enter into any such contract on the ground that such person is not so qualified unless such refusal is specifically authorized by an affirmative vote of not less than five members of the board, and unless the vote and a full statement of the reasons for the refusal are spread upon the minutes of the board."

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks on this amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks on this amendment. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. HARDY of Texas) there were 21 ayes and 91 noes.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. BRIGGS. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 25, after the word "Board" in line 13, strike out the period, supply a colon, and insert the following: "Provided, That nothing herein shall be held to deny the right of review in any court of competent jurisdiction of the action of the board in granting or refusing compensation; but any such review must be sought within 90 days from the time when the board shall have finally entered an order granting or refusing compensation or entered into a contract and given public notice through the press or otherwise of such action."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. BRIGGS. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 25, line 15, strike out the word "ten" and insert the word "two."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 25, line 15 after the word "not" strike out the words "exceeding 10 years from the date thereof" and insert "extending beyond 10 years from the date of the enactment of this measure."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected. The Clerk read as follows:

AMOUNT OF COMPENSATION.

SEC. 404. Compensation shall be computed as follows: For each gross ton of the vessel for each 100 nautical miles covered by the vessel, there shall be paid—

- (a) Regardless of the speed of which the vessel is capable, one-half of 1 cent; and
- (b) In the case of a power-driven vessel capable of making (when self-propelled solely by machinery) a speed of 12 knots or over when on such draft as the owner may select, and in addition to any amount payable to such vessel under subdivision (a)—
  - (1) One-tenth of 1 cent if such speed is 12 knots or over but less than 13 knots;
  - (2) Two-tenths of 1 cent if such speed is 13 knots or over but less than 14 knots;
  - (3) Three-tenths of 1 cent if such speed is 14 knots or over but less than 15 knots;
  - (4) Four-tenths of 1 cent if such speed is 15 knots or over but less than 16 knots;
  - (5) Five-tenths of 1 cent if such speed is 16 knots or over but less than 17 knots;
  - (6) Seven-tenths of 1 cent if such speed is 17 knots or over but less than 18 knots;
  - (7) Nine-tenths of 1 cent if such speed is 18 knots or over but less than 19 knots;
  - (8) One and one-tenth cents if such speed is 19 knots or over but less than 20 knots;
  - (9) One and three-tenths cents if such speed is 20 knots or over but less than 21 knots;
  - (10) One and five-tenths cents if such speed is 21 knots or over but less than 22 knots;
  - (11) One and eight-tenths cents if such speed is 22 knots or over but less than 23 knots; and
  - (12) Two and one-tenth cents if such speed is 23 knots or over.

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 27, following line 12, insert a new paragraph, as follows: "SEC. 404½. The Secretary of the Treasury is further authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the merchant-marine fund, to the consignee of any export tonnage shipped to any port for transportation on any vessel receiving compensation under this act, whether such shipment is made by rail or otherwise to such port of export, a compensation equal to 25 per cent of the freight or transportation charges from the point of origin to such port of export; and for such purposes the board is hereby authorized to gather and collect the necessary data covering said shipments from said point of origin to such port of export, determine the expense of such transportation, and properly certify the same to the said Secretary of the Treasury for payment as herein provided."

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order on the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. What is the gentleman's point of order?

Mr. EDMONDS. On the ground that as near as I could make out from the reading it proposes to establish freight rates or rebates in freight rates, which is outside of the province of this bill and belongs to the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. Chairman, I call the Chair's attention to the fact that this is an act to amend and supplement the merchant marine act of 1920. The merchant marine act provides for the promotion and maintenance of an American merchant marine. One of the essentials in order to provide for an American merchant marine is that cargoes shall be provided in some way. That is as much the province of the committee to extend the merchant marine act to a principle of this kind as it is to the principle of ocean traffic. The only difference is that one goes to the shipowner and the other to the man furnishing the cargo. We are here proposing that a differential shall not be paid unless it is to a vessel which has compensation under this act. We are providing a specific method by which this shipment shall be made. We are providing a means by which the cargo shall be furnished to these vessels in order that the merchant marine shall be successfully promoted as provided in this act. For that reason it is clearly within the purpose of this act and clearly within the purpose of this committee to extend the differential not only to the owners of vessels but also to the shippers that furnish the cargo.

I call the Chair's attention to the fact that 53 per cent of the exports of this country are agricultural, that 96 per cent of that 53 per cent is produced in the Middle West. I call attention to the fact that 47 per cent of the exports are industrial, and that 40 per cent of that 47 per cent is produced west of Pittsburgh, and this is to supplement the merchant marine act by which the funds that go to enhance the shipping facilities are extended not only to the owners of the ships but to the producers that furnish the cargo; not to the aid simply of a few men in Boston, New York, and New Orleans, but to embrace the country generally. This provision would take the merchant marine act to the producer and manufacturer of products and the agricultural products of Ohio and Iowa and the Middle West.

Mr. BEGG. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DICKINSON. Certainly.

Mr. BEGG. Supposing the gentleman's amendment is adopted, would not that serve to just increase the freight rates to take care of this?

Mr. DICKINSON. It would not.

Mr. BEGG. Or if it is not adopted, will not the freight rates be just that much cheaper, so what will be accomplished?

Mr. DICKINSON. That would not be the effect at all, for the reason that this provides that out of the merchant-marine fund the shipper or the consignor shall be paid this compensation, and that will put the cargo on these ships, which is just what we want to accomplish.

Mr. BEGG. That merchant-marine fund has to come out of the earnings of the merchant marine.

Mr. DICKINSON. Oh, no; it comes out of the 10 per cent of the customs duty.

Mr. BEGG. It comes out of the transfer of commerce over the ocean.

Mr. DICKINSON. It does not come out of anything except the general customs duty.

Mr. BEGG. It seems to me that all you will do will be to increase your freight rates, and that is a matter to be taken care of by the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. DICKINSON. I think the gentleman's conclusion is erroneous. Suppose this committee should propose that any shipowner who would build a ship which was called "Lasker" or "Edmonds" might be given a present of $100,000 every Christmas; that would be promoting the merchant marine, which is one of the provisions that would help to put the ships under the American flag.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Would not the gentleman just as soon call the ship "Chindblom" or "Dickinson"?

Mr. DICKINSON. I would be willing to have it called "Chindblom," but not "Dickinson" with a ship subsidy.

Mr. EDMONDS. Did I understand the gentleman to say that he was going to make me a Christmas present of $100,000, or is he talking about some ship?

Mr. DICKINSON. I say that that is within the jurisdiction of this committee, because it promotes the merchant marine. For that reason I say that we should have the privilege of not only supplementing our shipping by having the ships on the seas but also by having the cargoes furnished, and this amendment will do it. Mr. Chairman, I want now to call the attention of the Chair to some precedents. I refer first to Hinds' Precedents, volume 5, page 5803:

5803. Whether or not an amendment be germane should be judged from the provisions of its text rather than from the purposes which circumstances may suggest. On January 15, 1901, the river and harbor bill (H. R. 13189) was under consideration in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. FRANK W. MONDELL, of Wyoming, proposed an amendment appropriating a sum of money for the construction of three reservoirs at the headwaters of the Missouri River for the purpose of holding back the flood waters of said stream with a view of minimizing the formation of bars and shoals and other flood-formed obstructions to navigation, and to aid in the maintenance of an increased depth and uniform flow of water for navigation during the dry season.

Mr. THEODORE E. BURTON, of Ohio, made the point of order that the amendment was not germane to the bill, since the means proposed could not affect navigation, but rather related to the improvement of arid lands.

After debate, the Chairman said:

"The Chair holds that as the amendment is framed it is germane to the subject matter of the bill and the subject matter over which the River and Harbor Committee has jurisdiction. Now, whether that correctly presents the facts of the case is to be determined on the merits. But as the amendment is presented and read by the Clerk it appears to the Chair that it is entirely proper and germane to the bill, and therefore the Chair will overrule the point of order."

I next call the attention of the Chair in the same volume to section 5909, which is as follows:

To a bill providing for an interoceanic canal, specifying a certain route, an amendment providing for another route was held to be germane. On January 9, 1902, the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union was considering the bill (H. R. 3110) to provide for the construction of a canal connecting the waters of the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans when Mr. RICHARD W. PARKER, of New Jersey, proposed an amendment providing for a canal across the Isthmus of Panama.

Mr. OSCAR W. UNDERWOOD, of Alabama, made the point of order that the amendment was not germane, because, while the bill provided for a canal at Nicaragua only, the amendment provided also for a canal at another place. After debate the Chairman said:

"The subject matter of this bill—the enterprise upon which the House has entered—is, in the language of the bill—

"To construct a canal to connect the waters of the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans."

"The Chair is of the opinion that is the purpose of the legislation sought; that the question of location is wholly a subordinate one; and that it is perfectly competent for Congress to reject one location and to adopt another. For instance, suppose it was a question of the building of a house for the purpose of storing the records of the Government, and a bill was introduced to locate it on a certain square in this city. Can anybody doubt that the proposition might be amended so as to locate it upon another square?"

Mr. Chairman, it ought to be permissible under these precedents for Congress to expand the provisions by which the merchant marine can be established and extend them where cargoes may be furnished for shipment on these ships. That is all we are attempting to do. I contend that this is only furthering the purpose of the merchant marine act, and for that reason this amendment will go further and assure cargoes to be shipped on these ships than any other provision that has been heretofore made. You have gone into the question of financing here, and you have gone into the matter of interest rates and tax exemptions. You have gone into every phase of this question with the exception of cargoes for these vessels. I contend that for the promotion of the merchant marine it is entirely within the jurisdiction of this committee, and for that reason my amendment is germane.

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Iowa makes a very good argument in favor of his amendment, but if you will look at the title of this section of the bill it will be seen that it has no reference at all to railroad rebates or freight rates. It has nothing to do with anything that the Interstate Commerce Commission has jurisdiction of. It strikes me it is not germane to the section, that it provides for rebates in freight rates, which is a practice that has been prohibited by the laws of Congress. Therefore, it is not even a subject for legislation by this Congress unless we wish to upset those laws.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Hicks). The Chair will rule on this point. While the argument presented by the gentleman from Iowa has a good deal of substance, the Chair feels that the gentleman is in error in his conclusion. The Chair invites his attention to section 5842, volume 5, of Hinds' Precedents, where it is held that to a bill relating to corporations engaged in interstate commerce an amendment relating to all corporations is not germane.

The Chair thinks this is not an amendment germane to this bill. It is an amendment relative to rebates to shippers, whereas the bill relates to aid to shipowners, and therefore the Chair holds that the point of order is well made. The Clerk will read.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the section.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is recognized.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, this section relates to speed of vessels and what can be done. I have asked several members of the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries whether or not any investigation was made as to the loss of time that was occasioned in the examination of hulls, boilers, and machinery of our American vessels. I am advised that none was had. I am advised that England and most of the other nations examine their vessels and there is no loss of time, but that in the American merchant marine which we have there is a loss of a month or 30 days or more every year. In other words, ships were tied up for one-twelfth of the time that they should be occupied in doing their work. One-twelfth of their earning power is lost by want of proper inspection. Second, I also inquired whether or not in these hearings, two large voluminous volumes, there was an investigation of the admeasurement of American ships as compared to the English ships. I am advised that no investigation was made.

Mr. EDMONDS. Does the gentleman mean—

Mr. RAKER. I am advised that in the admeasurement here as compared with the English ships there is from 15 to 30 per cent more on the American ships than on the English.

Mr. EDMONDS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAKER. In just a moment. So that every port where a vessel enters they have to pay that additional amount over that which the English ships have to pay.

Mr. EDMONDS. Does the gentleman want me to correct him?

Mr. RAKER. Therefore if that was provided for under the law to-day there would be no necessity whatever for this subsidy to be given to a few favored interests.

Mr. EDMONDS. What the gentleman states is not correct, for the simple reason we made an investigation of this a short time ago in connection with vessels, and we found this: That each vessel was furnished with two admeasurements; one, the foreign, and when in foreign ports she was allowed—

Mr. RAKER. But I am advised by Members on this side of the House that there has been no investigation, and why not?

Mr. EDMONDS. We had Mr. Chamberlain, the head of the department of navigation, before the committee, and the matter was investigated.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Does the gentleman say on this bill?

Mr. RAKER. That is what I say, on this bill, and my point was that if two matters, namely, if the examination of the boilers of our merchant marine was had, as they should be, and there were not 30 to 40 days lost every year, at least one-twelfth of their earning power, and we had the same kind of admeasurement as foreign vessels, that would supply a sufficient amount to the merchant marine so that this subsidy would be unnecessary. Now, I ask unanimous consent that I may, in addition to my remarks, extend in the Record an editorial of the Washington Daily News of yesterday on this subject.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent that he may extend his remarks in the Record by inserting printed matter, as indicated.

Mr. MONDELL. How much printed matter?

Mr. RAKER. About 12 inches long.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The time of the gentleman has expired.

The editorial is as follows:

TWO REAL HANDICAPS.

The plea for ship subsidy is almost wholly based on the claim that wages and conditions imposed by the seamen's law handicap the American shipowners as against foreign owners.

This newspaper will discuss that phase at a later time; but in the meantime two real handicaps may be pointed out. Here goes: Every nation requires that a ship's hull and its boilers and engines be inspected once a year. It is the practice of foreign nations to provide for this inspection in a way that will not hold ships idle and so cause loss of earning time.

A British ship coming into a British port can notify the inspector of boilers and the inspector of hulls by wireless. They will have men ready as soon as the ship comes in and they will inspect just as much as they can while the ship is discharging cargo and taking on new cargo. But the moment the ship is ready to sail it is given a certificate for such part of the inspection as has been completed and is allowed to proceed. This is repeated in various ports and is acceptable if the entire inspection is completed in the course of the year.

The American system of inspection requires the inspection take place all at once, which means the drawing of the fires under all the boilers. The boiler inspector does his work when and as he pleases, and the hull inspector may or may not be working at the same time. The effect in practice is that the foreign ships do not lose an hour of possible working time for the purpose of inspection, while American ships lose about a month a year out of their earning time. It is this loss of time imposed by arbitrary, bureaucratic rules under executive sanction that handicaps American shipowners to the extent of nearly 10 per cent of their earning possibility.

Again, all the other ships in the world have a formula for measurement of tonnage which is different from the American measurement. Every time a ship goes into port it must pay fees and dues of many sorts based on tonnage; every time a ship goes through the Panama or Suez Canal it must pay tolls based on tonnage.

The American method of measurement rates an American ship which may be exactly like a foreign ship at from 20 per cent to 30 per cent greater dead-weight tonnage than a foreign ship is rated. That means that it must pay in all sorts of dockage, towage, clearance, and other fees, as well as all canal tolls, from 20 to 30 per cent more than the foreign competing ship has to pay.

The excess tolls and charges are paid to foreign governments and foreign officials and are in the nature of a penalty imposed by this Government unnecessarily and without reason upon ships owned by Americans.

Here are two handicaps which, if the friends of subsidy are correct in their statement of its amount, would alone if removed make subsidy unnecessary.

And the beauty of it is that the benefits would go at no expense to all American shipowners, instead of the favored few who would get subsidy.

Even coming from the President, advice to Congressmen to ignore their constituents and vote for the subsidy won't get very far. POINDEXTER, KELLOGG, TOWNSEND, and company took that advice from the same source on Newberryism, and look what happened to them!

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in one minute.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I desire to submit some observations on this particular section, but I do not care to take the time of the committee to do it, and therefore I ask unanimous consent to extend and revise my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. The section now under consideration is the section fixing a cash subsidy to be paid to shipowners operating their ships under the American flag. The committee have computed what they think is a fair and reasonable amount according to tonnage and speed. Whether it is or not, I do not know. If this subsidy is sufficient to pay the difference in cost of operation of ships under the American flag and under a foreign flag, and no more, then it is in the right amount, for that ought to constitute the true basis upon which the allowance of such a subsidy is justified. To build up a merchant marine is a matter of great national moment. But to do so it is not desirable, nor is it necessary, to give to the operators of such ships special privileges which permit them to operate at a profit, without initiative and enterprise on their part, and without any compulsion of competitive trade.

And here I desire to make a few observations about this whole subject matter. The Republican Party, now in control of the affairs of the Nation, is trying to formulate some policy and some plan upon which we may at once conserve the value of our great fleet of merchant ships and at the same time build up and establish a merchant marine.

What produced this necessity? During the war the Wilson administration started to build 18,300,448 dead-weight tons of ships. When the armistice came only about 450 of these ships were completed; 2,288 ships altogether have been built, and hence 1,838 have been delivered since the armistice. The Democratic Party was the majority party in both House and Senate at that time, and it was their problem whether we should go on building ships after the war was over or should cancel our contracts and stop building.

Notice what happened. On February 24, 1919, the gentleman from Kentucky, Mr. Swager Sherley, chairman of the House Committee on Appropriations, brought upon the floor of the House for discussion an emergency appropriation bill. It carried, among other items, appropriations of approximately $600,000,000 for the continuation of the work of building merchant ships and completing this enormous program of shipbuilding. A Democratic committee prepared that bill; a Democratic Congress passed it; a Democratic President signed it. When Members upon the floor interrogated Mr. Sherley and asked him why the contracts were not canceled and work stopped, he stated on numerous occasions that those in charge of the Shipping Board—appointees of President Wilson—had insisted upon a completion of the ships and that his committee recommended this course. As to the future, he said:

That is what I am going to try to come to. I did not want, gentlemen, to go into the question of a shipping policy for this Government except to say this: That I think it is of the very highest importance that a policy should be determined, and determined at a very early date, and that almost any policy would be better than a complete absence of one that exists now and the drifting that has taken place in connection with the whole question of our merchant marine and what we propose to do with it. I know nothing that is more important than that there should be presented to the Congress a real program, one that the Congress in its wisdom may modify or accept as the facts may warrant, but to drift along, having what will amount in a last analysis to nearly $4,000,000,000 investment in ships and in plants, without any knowledge of what we are going to do with it, seems to me the height of national folly.

As to the matter of policy, I simply presented this situation to the House and to the country, that we have invested practically in moneys spent, and moneys contracted to be spent, something like $4,000,000,000. Now, that was made necessary because of the war, and we went ahead.

There was no division and there was no question. There was not 3 per cent of the people in America that questioned the wisdom of building ships at the time these commitments were made in the spring and early summer of last year. But, having done that, I think it is up to the Shipping Board, I think it is up to this administration, I think it is up to the Congress to work out a plan. I do not care whether it is a Republican or Democratic plan if it is the right plan.

Not only did he express these ideas, but the gentleman from Virginia, Mr. Saunders, then one of the leaders upon the Democratic side, a very able man, since elevated to the bench of his State, said:

Here is the situation that confronts us to-day. We have been building ships at a great rate as a part of our war operations. If we take those ships that the Government has contracted for on Government account and turn them over to the American capitalist at a cost which will match the cost of the ships of his foreign competitor, then the American can enter, so far as the race is concerned, up to that point on equal terms, but that means, of course, that the Government will bear all loss connected with the transaction of sale. The moment that the Government of the United States is willing to take that action, that very moment we can put American capital into business on the high seas under favorable conditions, so far as his foreign competitor is concerned. But even after you have gone that far, if the cost of operating the ships on the high seas is greater than the cost to the foreigner, you must go one step further. It will be necessary to guarantee out of the Federal Treasury to any capitalist who proposes to go into the shipping enterprise the difference between the cost of maintenance of his operations and the cost of the foreigner's maintenance. * * *

The whole problem is one not of legislation, but of appropriations. The moment that the Government is willing to launch merchant-marine operations on the high seas on the basis that I have suggested, then at that very moment, so far as private capital is concerned, it can enter into competition with the foreigner on a fair and equitable basis, but not sooner.

Thus it will be seen it was Democratic policy to build this fleet and then work out a policy. But over two years went by, from February, 1919, to March 4, 1921, during all of which time President Wilson was in office and the Shipping Board presumably subject to his control, and no constructive policy was offered to the country.

It is interesting also to note what the Democratic administration did in their shipbuilding program after the armistice. The shipbuilding continued throughout 1919 and most of 1920. In 1919, 1,180 ships were delivered to the Government, 408 of which were wooden and known to be absolutely worthless; while in 1920, 473 were delivered, 61 of which were wooden.

The child is not ours; it was laid on our doorstep by the last administration. When we take it up and try to instill the breath of life into it, those who are responsible for its existence criticize us for not letting it die.

We must have some constructive policy. I do not know that we have in this bill the best one. But this I do know, no one on the other side of the Chamber has any right to raise his voice in criticism.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 405. For the purpose of computing compensation under this title—

(a) A vessel shall be held to be power-driven if it is equipped so as to be self-propelled through the use of machinery, and if the rated horsepower of the propulsive machinery exceeds one-third the gross tonnage of the vessel;

(b) A vessel shall be held to be a sailing vessel if it is equipped so as to be self-propelled through the use of sails, and is not equipped so as to be self-propelled through the use of machinery;

(c) The gross tonnage of a vessel shall be as determined under the laws of the United States and stated upon the vessel's certificate of admeasurement;

(d) The speed which a vessel is capable of making on such draft as the owner may select, shall be ascertained by the board at such reasonable intervals and by such methods as the board may by regulation prescribe;

(e) The mileage covered by the vessel shall be determined solely by the distances of the direct, customary route, for vessels of the same type and kind upon similar voyages, between the ports touched by the vessel, based upon tables of such distances approved by the board; except that if such distances do not, in the opinion of the board, fairly represent the distances which, under efficient operation, are required actually to be traversed by the vessel upon its voyage, the board may increase the mileage to such an extent as it deems fair and reasonable; but in no case shall the mileage as so increased be in excess of the mileage actually traversed by the vessel;

(e) In computing mileage a fractional part of 100 miles shall be disregarded unless in excess of 50 miles, in which case it shall be counted as 100 miles;

(f) Any power-driven vessel of 5,000 gross tons or less but of 1,500 gross tons or over, shall be considered as if it were a vessel of 5,000 gross tons.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. RAKER. The motion to strike out section 404 has not yet been put, has it?

The CHAIRMAN. Was not that a pro forma amendment?

Mr. RAKER. No; that is a real amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the gentleman from California, to strike out the section.

The question was taken, and the motion was rejected.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out subsection (f) on page 28, beginning with line 20 and ending with line 22. It is a proposition by which a 1,500-ton vessel shall be paid a subsidy on the basis of a 5,000-ton vessel.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman wait until the amendment is properly before the committee? The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. HARDY of Texas: Page 28, beginning on line 20 and concluding with line 22, strike out subsection (f).

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Will the Clerk read subsection (f)?

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the subsection.

The Clerk read as follows:

(f) Any power-driven vessel of 5,000 gross tons or less but of 1,500 gross tons or over shall be considered as if it were a vessel of 5,000 gross tons.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I do not think there is any great amount of importance attached to this amendment, but this is a provision by which every little vessel on the Atlantic or Gulf coast or Pacific coast of 1,500 tons shall be rated as of 5,000 tons, by which the actual subsidy of 1½ cents per ton per hundred miles shall be paid instead of one-half cent per hundred miles. It seems to me that if we mean 1½ cents, we ought to say so. I move to strike out the subsection.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. Mr. Chairman, the purpose of this subsection (f) is to give a subsidy to all such boats running from 1,500 to 5,000 tons. The cost of operating those small steamboats or steamships does not vary to any appreciable extent with the size of the ship, and it is a very important matter, because we have a lot of these small boats plying particularly in the West Indian trade, and when we come to compensate them we will find that the pay rolls of those boats is about the same, regardless of their size. The largest single item in the cost of operation is the compensation of the officers.

That is the purpose of this section. I think it ought to remain in the bill.

Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this section and amendments thereto be now closed.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania moves that all debate on this section and amendments thereto be now closed. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion offered by the gentleman from Texas.

The question was taken, and the motion was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. Before the Clerk proceeds the Chair wants to call the attention of the chairman of the committee to what is evidently an error in the lettering on page 28. Line 5 in that section is lettered "(e)," and then on line 17 of the same page there is another "(e)" in that subdivision.

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Chairman, I move that the Clerk be authorized to make the change.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair also wants to call the attention of the gentleman to the misspelling of the word "or" at the end of line 20 on the same page. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. EDMONDS] asks unanimous consent that the Clerk be permitted to correct the misprint in the text and also the lettering. Is there objection? Without objection, that will be done.

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

WHEN VESSELS NOT ENTITLED TO COMPENSATION.

SEC. 406. (a) Compensation shall not be paid in respect to any sailing vessel whose tonnage is less than 1,000 gross tons, and shall not be paid in respect to any other kind of vessel whose tonnage is less than 1,500 gross tons.

(b) Compensation shall be paid in respect to any vessel only for mileage covered while the vessel—

(1) Is a privately owned merchant vessel; and
(2) Is registered or enrolled and licensed under the laws of the United States; and

(3) Is self-propelled by sails or machinery, except when in distress or being aided by means of tugs or other assistance on entering or leaving port or in navigating any inland or restricted waterway; and

(4) Is classed by the American Bureau of Shipping in the highest classification open to vessels in its type and kind according to the rules of the bureau; and

(5) Carries a crew (exclusive of licensed officers required by law) at least two-thirds of which are citizens of the United States, and the remainder of which are individuals eligible to United States citizenship. During the first year after the enactment of this act the required number of citizens of the United States shall be one-half instead of two-thirds, and during the second year six-tenths instead of two-thirds. In the case of passenger vessels the provisions of this paragraph shall apply only to the deck and engine departments. If the vessel is deprived of the services of any member of the crew by desertion, casualty, or other cause beyond the control of the master in any port outside the United States or on the high seas, the right of the vessel's owner to compensation during the period prior to the next arrival of the vessel at a port in the United States shall not be impaired by failure to comply with the provisions of this paragraph, provided the owner and the master of the vessel exercise reasonable diligence to procure the necessary individuals to comply with such provisions. If the vessel is outside the United States at the time of the enactment of this act, or on the first day of the second or third year after the enactment of this act, the owner shall not be required to comply with the provisions of this paragraph applicable to such year until her first arrival at a port in the United States if he complies with the provisions of this paragraph applicable to the previous year.

(c) Compensation shall not be paid in respect to any vessel unless the vessel—

(1) Is registered, enrolled, or licensed under the laws of the United States on the sixtieth day after the enactment of this act; or

(2) Is built in the United States, its Territories or possessions, or the Canal Zone after the enactment of this act; or

(3) Is at the time of the enactment of this act undocumented and owned by a person, a citizen of the United States, and is not thereafter documented under the laws of any foreign country; or

(4) Is owned by the United States at the time of the enactment of this act and is not thereafter documented under the laws of any foreign country; or

(5) Was built in a foreign country before the enactment of this act and is within three years after the enactment of this act registered under the laws of the United States, except that compensation shall be paid in respect to any such foreign-built vessel only if such vessel is, upon the affirmative vote of at least five of the members of the board, specifically authorized to receive compensation and specifically certified to be essential to the proper development of the merchant marine of the United States by reason of the particular type or kind of vessel, and if such vote and a full statement of the reasons for such authorization and certification are spread upon the minutes of the board.

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment that I want to offer.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. TILSON). The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. EDMONDS: Page 31, line 18, insert a new paragraph (6) as follows:

"(6) From the total amount of compensation earned in respect to any voyage there shall be deducted an amount which bears the same ratio thereto as the revenue attributable to the carriage of cargo owned by the owner of the vessel or any person affiliated with him within the meaning of subdivision (c) of section 409 bears to the total revenue attributable to the carriage of passengers, cargo, and mails. For the purpose of this subdivision the amount of revenue attributable to the carriage of cargo owned by the owner of the vessel or any person so affiliated with him shall be considered to be such amount as is determined by the board as representing the fair value of the services performed by the vessel in transporting such cargo."

Mr. EDMONDS. Gentlemen, this is the Standard Oil amendment that I promised you the other day that I would offer. I am not going to vote for it. I notify you now.

But I want to say this: Unfortunately, while endeavoring to hit at the Standard Oil, which seems to be a kind of a bugaboo to some of the gentlemen of the House, we also hurt some very good small concerns in this country. The amount of tonnage involved will probably be 2,000,000 tons. The amount of subsidy will probably be three or four million dollars.

These oil ships belong to a number of concerns. Out of the 2,000,000 tons the Standard Oil owns about 600,000 tons. We find here that in trying to get hold of the United Fruit Co. we hit the Atlantic Fruit Co., a young, growing concern with four boats of 4,000 tons. In trying to get hold of the Union Oil we hit the Bermudez Transport Co., another concern that runs to Venezuela. We find that in trying to get hold of the Standard Oil, the Sun Oil, and some other large concerns we hit the Texas Oil, the Sinclair Oil, and the Gulf Refining Co. In trying to get at the United Fruit Co. we also hit the Atlantic, Gulf, and West Indies ships, the Union Oil, the Freeport Sulphur, the Union Sulphur Co., the Bermudez Transport Co., the Atlantic Fruit Co., the General Petroleum Co., and others.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EDMONDS. Yes.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. The lines which the gentleman mentions are operating now, are they not?

Mr. EDMONDS. Yes; those are lines that are now operating.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. And, of course, without any subsidy.

Mr. EDMONDS. Their vessels are documented under the laws of the United States and operating now.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EDMONDS. I can not yield now.

Mr. BLANTON. On the gentleman's amendment.

Mr. EDMONDS. We know that the United Fruit Co. does a commercial business along with its own business. We know that the Bermudas Asphalt Co. does some commercial business along with its own business. We also know that the Atlantic, Gulf, and West Indies boats do some commercial business along with their own business. We also know that pretty nearly all of these companies probably do a little commercial business.

We know that the United States Steel Products Co. and the isthmian lines are out asking for commercial business, advertising for it, as are also the ships of the United States Steel Co. Now, what does my amendment do? It says that such portions of the cargo as may belong to the owner or affiliated corporations—and we are very careful in our definition of affiliated corporations—can not get the subsidy. The proportion of the ship that is used for the owners' cargo can receive no subsidy. In other words, we will say one-half the ship is owners' cargo, or 25 per cent is owners' cargo, or 75 per cent is owner's cargo. We deduct that much from the subsidy which they would otherwise get. I think that is fair. I think it is honest. I do not believe any gentleman in the House would want to oppose it, and I believe we ought to pass it.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EDMONDS. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman's amendment do what it says we ought to do?

Mr. EDMONDS. Beyond any question.

Mr. BLANTON. Could not the gentleman have put it in a little plainer language?

Mr. EDMONDS. I have written this amendment three times, and I can not get it any plainer than it is there.

Mr. BLANTON. It is a conglomeration of words, and I do not think it means what the gentleman thinks it means.

Mr. EDMONDS. I think it does, and the legislative drafting bureau thinks it does, and of course I can not help the gentleman's thoughts in the matter. I would be glad if I could impress his mind with the value of this amendment, and also with the real truth that the amendment covers what he desires to do.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, during the hearings certain members of the committee made very strenuous efforts to do what the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. EDMONDS] is now proposing to do, but all of our efforts were repelled. Now they have seen the light. I do not know whether it is due to a change of heart on their part, or due to the fact that they need votes, or whether it is also due to the fact that we see from the press that on yesterday the Atlantic Refining Co., a Standard Oil subsidiary, declared a stock dividend of 900 per cent. The Atlantic Refining Co. has been paying an annual dividend of 20 per cent on stock of $1,700 par value. These $100 shares now sell at $1,300 per share. Then there is another dispatch from Chicago to the effect that a special meeting of the stockholders of the Standard Oil Co. of Indiana has been called to meet December 27 to decide whether the capital stock of the company shall be increased from $140,000,000 to $250,000,000. If the increase is approved, it is proposed to issue a stock dividend of 100 per cent.

Now, the amendment proposed by the gentleman is, as the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] suggests, very muddy in its language. I am not sure that I know just what it means, although I have studied it closely. But assuming that it means all that the gentleman from Pennsylvania claims, I am sure he will admit that these industrial carriers will still receive subsidies upon all other products which they carry, and that the amount to which they are thus entitled is to be decided by the Shipping Board, that being one of the numerous powers lodged in the Shipping Board. And how and upon what will the Shipping Board determine it? Upon the reports made to them by the Standard Oil Co. and these other industrial concerns, because there is no method provided in this bill by which auditors could be sent to audit their books or anything of that kind. They would simply have to depend upon the reports made to them by these companies.

I want in this same connection to call the attention of Members to the fact that even if this direct subsidy is taken from these industrial companies for carrying their own products instead of serving the public, under the provisions of the bill they will still receive all the other privileges and benefits carried in this bill. They will still get their tax exemptions, they will still get the various other indirect benefits that are provided in this bill. Now the amendment, in my opinion, is not sufficiently clear. In the second place I do not think it goes far enough to protect the interests of the public, even in that respect, and it is simply in line with the policy that has been pursued all along with regard to this proposition; because the bill as originally introduced provided that before any of these industrial concerns were entitled to a subsidy they should hold themselves out as common carriers to the extent of one-third of their cargo space. But that was exposed to such an extent by the committee that they abandoned that and struck out that requirement.

Right on that point I want to call your attention to an article that was written by Winthrop L. Marvin, and it states in the headlines of the article as follows:

The merchant marine bill of 1922 analyzed. One of the experts who assisted the Shipping Board in framing the bill outlines its merits.

In that article he says:

Under one of the provisions of section 701 oil tank carriers and light craft owned by great producing companies are required to hold open until 10 days before sailing substantially one-third of their cargo capacity for use as the common carrier in order to be eligible to the compensation provided. Here again is a provision manifestly inserted to smooth the passage of the bill to meet objections certain to be raised by a certain class of lawmakers.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. It is apparent that no modification which we can suggest will be satisfactory to my good friend, the gentleman from Tennessee, and gentlemen on the other side of the aisle. When the gentleman from Pennsylvania made the announcement that he would offer an amendment in good faith that would cover the objections made in regard to this proposition and when he has kept faith in pursuance of such promise, we find our good friends who are opposed to the legislation altogether shaking their heads and expressing doubt as to whether the actual purpose is going to be accomplished. Now, personally, I regret that this amendment is offered to this bill. I think the time will come when we will regret that we have permitted the oil tankers and these other ships so admirably fitted for our purposes in time of war—I say the time will come when we will regret that we permitted these ships to go under other flags. That will be the result. We are driving them under other flags where they can operate at a less expense and where they will not be handicapped by the provisions that we have put upon the statute books. I think we have discussed this question in all of its phases, and I therefore move that all debate on this amendment be now closed.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I hope the gentleman will not make that motion. This is a very important amendment, and I think we ought to have an opportunity to discuss it. I would like to have five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois moves that all debate on this amendment be now closed.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend the motion that all debate on this section and amendments thereto be now closed.

Mr. J. M. NELSON. Oh, Mr. Chairman, I trust that gentlemen will not shut out the opportunity to offer amendments and discuss them. I want to offer an amendment.

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman can offer his amendment.

Mr. SEARS. Mr. Chairman, there has been no discussion of this amendment except upon one side.

Mr. MONDELL. Well, Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in 10 minutes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I hope the gentleman will not include all amendments. I have some amendments I want to offer and discuss.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Wyoming that all debate on this section and amendments thereto close in 10 minutes.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. MONDELL) there were 66 ayes and 32 noes.

So the motion was agreed to.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I want recognition for about a minute to discuss the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. MONDELL. But, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Wisconsin had an amendment that he was about to offer.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I will yield the floor.

Mr. J. M. NELSON. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 29, strike out lines 22 and 23.

Mr. J. M. NELSON. Mr. Chairman, I want to call attention to the subject of American seamanship.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will call the attention of the gentleman from Wisconsin to the fact that there is already an amendment to an amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania. The gentleman's amendment can be read for information.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania will have to be disposed of first.

Mr. J. M. NELSON. Then, Mr. Chairman, I will withhold my amendment.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I wish to say this in regard to what was said by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CHINDBLOM]. He stated his apprehension that these tankers, as I understand, and the United Fruit Co.'s vessels might be driven under the flag of some other country. It does not seem to me that there is any just ground for that apprehension. These vessels have been operating for many years without any subsidy, and there certainly can be no legitimate excuse for their being transferred to another flag. If they do so, it will not be because of this legislation.

Mr. MONDELL. Many oil tankers are not under our flag.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will now recognize the gentleman from Wisconsin. The Clerk will read the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 29, strike out lines 22 and 23.

Mr. J. M. NELSON. Mr. Chairman, if that carries, I am going to offer this proviso:

Provided, That the foregoing paragraph determining the number of citizens of the United States and the eligibility of individual members of the crew shall apply to all American vessels of 100 registered tons and upward leaving any port of the United States on any voyage.

I do this to test the sincerity of gentlemen like my good friend from Illinois [Mr. CHINDBLOM], who tells you about the emergency features and the necessity of Standard Oil ships for war purposes.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Does the gentleman doubt the sincerity of the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. J. M. NELSON. Mr. Chairman, neither the present subsidy bill nor any other that treats sea power as a flower to be raised in a hothouse can succeed in accomplishing its ostensible purpose. This is the position of well-informed and experienced seamen. Power on the sea, they insist, has through the historical periods been so absolutely and exclusively in the possession of the nations or races that develop the seamen that it is surprising, to say the least, to men who know, that anybody after any study of this question should propose to grow such a flower in a subsidy hothouse.

Seamen no doubt began as fishermen in the rivers, then on the seacoast, then on the banks near the coast, at first in carrying their own produce and later the produce of others in vessels built for that purpose. They captured the whale on the coast, then after a while followed him, and finally sought him wherever he could be found. It was always the men. And the men gradually developed their tools from the log in the river to the modern ship, which is the product of men and the need that men felt for the tools necessary to their calling. From this it seems an indisputable fact that sea power is in the seamen, that vessels are the tools of seamen; and that they ultimately belong to the races and nations that know how to use them. Seamen do not grow on shore; they are not trained on shore. The knowledge of seamen is the product of the ages; and probably about 75 per cent of that knowledge is carried forward from one generation to another by word of mouth and example.

Seeking some definition of the different ratings of seamen and trying to make descriptions, the Labor Department some time ago furnished substantially the following:

THE BOY

Must be of good physique, have good eyes, good ears, and a stout heart. When he comes on the vessel, everything is new and strange. He is gradually being accustomed to his new surroundings; he is learning to stand on the platform that is never still; he is learning to walk; his body is gradually acquiring the sea habit—he is getting sea legs. He is doing such work as he can, assisting the able seaman or the ordinary seaman in the work on the vessel. When he has learned sufficiently, and it usually takes about one year, he becomes an

ORDINARY SEAMAN.

As such he is learning more about the vessel under the continually shifting conditions. His sea legs are being perfected. He is continuing to learn more and more about the vessel's gear, the names, what it is used for, and where it is found. In daylight or darkness he must be able to find it. He is learning to use the gear, to repair it, and, where possible, to replace it. As he becomes more skillful he becomes more useful, and after about two years as ordinary seaman he becomes, by virtue of his skill, an

ABLE SEAMAN.

The work required from him is such that he needs the physical development which is not usually reached before the age of 19, and practically all countries make this age the minimum. He must now be so accustomed to the sea that he can stand on his feet in all kinds of weather without supporting himself by his hands, because he has other use for them. His body must have acquired the faculty of automatically so corresponding to the vessel's movements that he can stand on his feet, see with his eyes, hear with his ears, use his judgment, exercise his will, and make his body obey. If he has not learned this and is yet alive, he has in probability but a short time to live. He must know the vessel, her appliances, her gear, and the boats. He must be able to use, to repair, and, as far as possible, to replace the gear and appliances and to lower and manage the boats. He must by this time have acquired so much of the traditions and lore of the sea that he has a full appreciation of his duty to his shipmates, the passengers, the ship, and her cargo.

Boatswain, boatswain's mate, and quartermasters are able seamen picked to perform more special work, and this choice is usually made because of special fitness or because he possesses qualities of command. These ratings are usually considered "petty officers," but they are, in fact, just able seamen—given a special rating.

The able seaman ought to sail as such for at least one year before he be permitted to present himself for examination as an officer. Having learned the ship, her gear and appliances, and something about what the ship will do under her power, mechanical or sail, and feeling an ambition to become an officer, he will go to a navigation school to acquire the knowledge necessary to find his position by dead reckoning and astronomical observations. When he has obtained a certificate to this effect and obtains a position as fourth, third, or second mate, he is in fact an #### OFFICER.

As he was learning to use, repair, and replace the vessel's gear, he is now learning what a vessel can be made to do under sail, steam, or other mechanical power under different conditions as to weather and sea. The master is there to teach him and he is given opportunity to develop his own judgment by the experience through which he is now passing.

From among the fourth mates the third mates are selected after either a customary or a statutory period served in the lower capacity. The wise, if not always the customary, method is to select for advancement—from a lower to a higher rating or grade—those who give evidence of the greatest capacity. As experience increases, the certificates are raised until the grade of first mate or chief officer is reached. From these (after proper examination for a master's certificate) the employer—the shipowner—selects the man to whom he will intrust his vessel. He is now expected to know all that a vessel can be expected to do under the skillful use of such motive power as the vessel has. But aside from these accomplishments he must know the master's duty in port and at sea under the laws of his own country and the laws of nations. He must know something of medicine, to give at least first aid to the injured or sick. He must, in order to be a successful master, know how to pick out efficient officers and men, how to make the best use of men and materials in keeping the vessel in order and away from the repair yards and repair shops. Upon this will depend the quickness of the turn around and the ability of the vessel to pay dividends.

The development from boy to master must be open to all as nearly as possible upon equality. Only thus can the calling acquire, develop, and keep the best service, which means the best men.

THE ENGINE DEPARTMENT.

In this department as in the deck department the advance from wiper or coal passer to chief engineer must be step over step, based upon fitness, experience, practical and theoretical knowledge ascertained through examinations and periods of service in each rating. This work is different from the work on deck, but it is not different in the necessity for acquisition of the sea habit, the sea mind, and sea legs. In all but important and serious repairs the personnel must be able to keep the vessel from the repair shop. The lack of skill in the men and officers increases coal and oil consumption, decreases the speed, and causes the vessel to go to the repair shop when in port.

The general manager's attention will be peremptorily called to this at such times as he compares the expenses of the last report and the previous ones.

The personnel in the steward's department must be developed in the same gradual manner as the other two departments. Here the lack of skill will make itself seen and heard after every trip through the progressive loss of passengers, the waste of food, quarrels on the vessel, and a constant and expensive turnover in the crew.

There can be no doubt that, everything else being equal, the victory in competition will go to the highest skilled crew if employed when and where possible. In this, as in all other competitive business, the highest skilled man is the most dangerous competitor; but aside from the comparatively few ports where men can be obtained from shore to do the repair needed there are the much greater numbers of seaports where no such conveniences are at hand. This will include about 75 per cent of the world's seaports. To be able to earn the most money a vessel must be able to go to any and all places where she can enter with the depth of water to float her. With any accident in or near such places the vessel that has an inefficient or too small a crew is at a great disadvantage and the extra cost will easily eat up her other earnings.

The vessel with the highest skilled crew has at all times the advantage. To develop such personnel is therefore of the highest importance. But such a personnel can only be developed where the men are employed to do all work possible in port. This develops skill and the steadiness of employment keeps it with and in the business.

The foregoing somewhat amplifies the definition of the ratings. The practical application of them constitutes the school through which the seamen must go. Seamen were never developed in any other way, and the very nature of the calling makes it impossible to develop seamanship in any other way. Nothing in this subsidy bill will aid in the development of the personnel.

COMPARISON.

The United States has more ships than there are any prospects of using until there is not only a reestablishment of normalcy but a positive boom in industry and transportation. Germany at the close of the war retained her seamen but lost practically all her vessels. Having ship managers who know trade geography and management of vessels from shore, licensed officers and unlicensed seamen who know how to handle ships at sea and in harbor, how to make the quickest passages and how to keep the vessels out of the repair yards and repair shops, Germany is coming back with the speed of a race horse. America, lacking skilled managers, skilled officers and seamen, and doing nothing to develop either, but, on the contrary, in the last two years doing everything reasonably possible to destroy the gradually developing personnel, is "progressively" going behind in the race.

THE SEAMEN'S ACT.

The La Follette Seamen's Act was intended to serve the development of an American personnel. When it had any chance to function it did so. Not only did it bring Americans to sea and get back to the sea a good many men who had left it—trained seamen needed for the teaching of the others—but it abolished unfair competition by equalizing wages between foreign and American vessels. The utterly unjustifiable mutilations of section 14, the utter failure to enforce section 13 and section 2, have succeeded in bringing those sections of the law into contempt and in taking from the seamen the hope that those sections of the act had raised. In fact, the policy of the last two years has driven from the sea the budding American citizen seamen, as well as the skilled seamen who have declared their intention to become citizens of the United States.

THE RESPONSIBILITY.

The responsibility for this must be placed directly at the doors of the shipowners' association and the United States Shipping Board. The shipowners of America have, with three exceptions (the McGuire Act, the White Act, and the La Follette Act), had the willing ear of Congress to adopt such legislation as they advised. Their advice must have been bad, because it found us, when the hour of trial came, with practically no vessels in the foreign trade and practically no real American seamen. Aside from this, the shipowners did their utmost to nullify the McGuire Act, the White Act, and the La Follette Act. The Shipping Board has in the last two years, in the main, followed the shipowners' advice with disastrous results.

The shipowners now are asking Congress to give to them, through the Shipping Board, powers and privileges such as patriotic men would never ask and bad men should never receive. There is no justification for this bill, except upon the policy of taking care of the bankers and letting them take care of the people, take care of the employers, and take care of the workers, evidently with the idea that the benefits conferred upon the banker and shipowner will eventually filter down to the worker. That this is a vain hope so far as the shipowner is concerned is conclusively proven in the coastwise trade, where the American shipowner has an exclusive privilege and where he goes to all lengths in disregarding law for the purpose of employing anybody from anywhere, regardless of skill, nationality, knowledge of English, and even physical aptitude. The only question considered by the shipowner is wages. From his point of view he can safely do this, because he is covered by limitation of liability, by insurance, so-called legitimate, but in fact a pure gamble, and by protection and indemnity insurance. Through both of these systems of insurance he transfers all his risks, small as well as great, from himself to the general community by adding this cost, which he makes permanent, to the freight rates.

NATIONAL DEFENSE.

It is claimed for this bill that one of its main purposes is national defense, yet it excludes from the citizen clause about two-thirds of the unlicensed crew of passenger vessels, and thus permits the employment of Chinese, other orientals, or the nationals of other countries with whom we may find ourselves at war. Then it excludes the 50,000 men, practically all in the military age, employed in the coastwise or domestic trade. It is difficult indeed to understand why the men employed in the coastwise trade are not included in the citizen clause, all of which could be done with a proviso, if the purpose of the bill is national defense.

For the foregoing reasons the insincerity of the argument that this subsidy bill has regard to the general defense or welfare is perfectly self-evident. Every detail of the bill sheds light on the fact that property rights and not human rights, profit and not patriotism, special privilege and not the general welfare, constitute the objectives of this measure. The 50,000 seamen, more or less, who are opposed to this legislation, regarding it as a pretense and a fraud, count for nothing. But the 500 shipowners, more or less, whose pockets will be at one end of the law and the Treasury Department at the other, count for everything.

American seamen are not deceived. They understand fully how this measure will work out. They know that this bill is as false in theory as it is delusive in purpose, and that the only assured result of its enactment is more fruit of the kind the Shipping Board has hitherto served to the American people in superabundance.

In short, Mr. Chairman, the purpose of my amendment is to point out to this committee that an American merchant marine depends primarily on an American personnel. Sea power will never be successfully produced in a subsidy hothouse; it must develop in actual service on the sea; and therefore legislation that fails to stress the first consideration of success, American seamanship, can not hope to produce a merchant marine with power to survive any length of time after the subsidy ceases.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. WHITE of Maine: Page 28, line 25, after the word "than" strike out the figures "1,000" and insert in lieu thereof the figures "500."

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Chairman, we will accept the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Maine.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BANKHEAD: Page 31, after the amendment offered by Mr. EDMONDS just adopted, insert: "Provided, That no compensation shall be paid or allowed in respect to any vessels upon which any liquors or beverages containing more than one-half of 1 per cent of alcohol, by volume, are stored, transported, sold, or offered for sale either within or without the territorial waters of the United States."

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer a substitute for that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Alabama claim the floor?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is recognized for four and one-half minutes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I want to submit a unanimous-consent request by agreement with the majority leader. Am I recognized for the four minutes?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that 10 minutes be allowed for debate upon this amendment.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Chairman, I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama is recognized for four additional minutes remaining.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that this is an amendment which needs no explanation and that the reading of the amendment itself is as good an argument as could be made in favor of its adoption. The Constitution of the United States and the laws of Congress are the supreme law of the land. The purpose of this amendment is to provide that under the eighteenth amendment and the Volstead Act, which was adopted to put that amendment into effect, the provisions of the eighteenth amendment shall apply on the high seas as well as in the domestic territory and our territorial waters. The purpose of offering this amendment is to leave absolutely no doubt as to the will of Congress upon this proposition as to whether or not, despite the fact that we have the eighteenth amendment prohibiting the sale and the possession of certain liquors on land and within the territorial waters, we shall be consistent and proclaim that as a law of the land, as it ought to be, on any ship flying the flag of the United States. It is not necessary for me to undertake within these four minutes to make any argument on this proposition. I think everyone here correctly understands the spirit and purpose of this amendment. If this Congress is in favor of the enforcement of the prohibition laws which it has passed and put on the statute books and in favor of carrying out the Constitution of the United States wherever the flag flies—and the Constitution certainly always follows the flag—then I do not see how any man who professes to be a prohibitionist on this floor can vote against this amendment.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Yes.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Is the gentleman's amendment intended to prevent the carrying of liquors for medicinal and sacramental purposes?

Mr. BANKHEAD. It is for beverage purposes.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Is it so limited?

Mr. BANKHEAD. It follows the language of the Volstead law on the proposition of prohibited liquor.

Mr. FESS. Is it not true that the Department of Justice and the district court of New York have already decided that liquors can not be transported under the American flag?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Does the gentleman know whether they have or not?

Mr. FESS. My understanding is that they have.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Then why does the gentleman ask me?

Mr. FESS. I want to know whether the gentleman was informed of that matter.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Well, I read the papers occasionally, I will say to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. FESS. Then, what is the necessity for the gentleman's amendment?

Mr. BANKHEAD. If this is the law as interpreted by the court, what objection can the gentleman have to writing it in this law?

Mr. FESS. What is the use of the amendment?

Mr. EDMONDS. I offer this amendment by way of a substitute, and ask five minutes' time to speak on my substitute.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Chairman, I object.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. EDMONDS as a substitute: "Compensation shall not be paid in respect to any vessel for mileage covered upon a voyage if at any time during such voyage liquor for beverage purposes (the sale or transportation of which on land is prohibited by the national prohibition act, or any act in amendment thereof, supplemental thereto, or in substitution thereof) has been transported on the vessel with the knowledge or consent of the owner, charterer, agent, or master of the vessel, or sold on the vessel by or for the account of, or with the knowledge or consent of, the owner, charterer, agent, or master of the vessel."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the substitute to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Chairman—

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman from Michigan rise?

Mr. CRAMTON. To ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the Record on this amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Chairman, under the leave granted me I desire to insert the following telegram from legislative committees of the Anti-Saloon League and the Woman's Christian Temperance Union emphasizing the desirability of omitting any antiliqor legislation from the pending bill. Being in agreement with the views expressed therein, I believe that neither the Bankhead nor the Edmonds amendment, now pending, should be adopted. The telegram is as follows:

TORONTO, ONTARIO, November 28, 1922.

Hon. L. C. CRAMTON,

Member of Congress, Washington, D. C.:

Law now prohibits effectively liquor on all American ships. Why endanger existing legislation by a probably less effective amendment? Court would be influenced by last act of Congress in construing law. Believe no good reason for injecting prohibition in subsidy bill.

JAMES CANNON, Jr.

A. J. BARTON,

ERNEST H. CHERRINGTON,

WM. H. ANDERSON,

W. B. WHEELER,

Legislative Committee Anti-Saloon League.

ANNA A. GORDON,

LENA LOWE YOST,

Woman's Christian Temperance Union.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the substitute to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 75, noes 27.

So the substitute to the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment as amended.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. I demand a division, sir.

The committee again divided; and there were—ayes 56, noes 31.

So the amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee: Page 29, line 5, after the word "vessel," insert "and regularly operated as a common carrier."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I offer another amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee: Page 30, line 20, strike out "(2) Is built in the United States, its Territories or possessions, or the Canal Zone, after the enactment of this act; or".

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

FOREIGN TRADE.

SEC. 407. (a) Except as provided in subdivision (b), (d), or (e), a vessel shall, for the purposes of this title, be held to be engaged in foreign trade while operated on any voyage as a merchant vessel.

(b) A vessel shall not, for the purposes of this title, be held to be engaged in foreign trade while carrying any passengers or cargo—

(1) Which are taken on board at a port in the United States and discharged at a port in the United States;

(2) Which are taken on board at a port in the United States and discharged at a port in Alaska or Porto Rico;

(3) Which are taken on board at a port in Alaska or Porto Rico and discharged at a port in the United States;

(4) Which are taken on board at a port in the United States and discharged at a port in Hawaii, if the revenue accruing to the vessel by reason of the carriage of such passengers and cargo amounts to more than one-fourth the total revenue accruing to the vessel by reason of the carriage from point of origin to point of destination of passengers and cargo on board at the time of departure from the last port of call in the United States;

Mr. JONES of Texas. Mr. Chairman, on Tuesday, November 21, there appeared in the Washington Herald an article with the headline—

JULIUS KAHN BITTER AGAINST THE BLOC SYSTEM IN CONGRESS.

I have read the interview with curious interest. The statement starts off as follows:

If Congress would pay less attention to blocs and groups, it would serve the country better.

He censured the Middle West farmer for his opposition to President Harding's ship-subsidy proposal. He said:

They do not want the ship subsidy, because they do not see that it will be of greater benefit to them than to any other class of American citizens. The farmer is certainly justified in presenting his own particular wants before the country, but he has no right to demand, as he is demanding, that his wants be attended to and that everything else be voted down.

Of all the strange paradoxes, this statement, to use the vernacular of the street, "takes the cake." In one sentence the distinguished gentleman from California decries blocs and groups, and in the next breath, with dramatic flourish, he joins the ship-subsidy group and declares in effect that anyone who opposes it is opposed to our national welfare. This is in line with the statements of everyone else who has opposed the activities of the farm bloc. It is strange that they had no thought of this position before. For 25 years Mr. KAHN has been a Member of Congress. During that time there have been various blocs in the House, and some of them even used a "block and tackle."

For many years there has been a financial bloc which has swept down on the Congress in the interest of the financiers and endeavored to secure anything and everything they desired. There has been a Wall Street bloc. There has been a railroad bloc. There has been a tariff bloc. But on all these blocs these gentlemen have been strangely silent. However, since a group of men in the House and Senate have undertaken to do something substantial and real for the producers of this Nation the anvil chorus has been in continuous operation.

So long as they could get by with a verbal tribute to the farmer they were happy in the presence of all kinds of blocs and groups. But they want it to stop there.

I thoroughly agree that group legislation in most instances is unsatisfactory, but when all kinds of groups and bloc systems are being used whose interests conflict with those of agriculture and stock raising, then in sheer self-defense those who represent farming interests must also stand together, not only to secure even their own rights but also to protect the Treasury against organized raids.

If the subsidy business is started, where will it end? I thoroughly agree that it would be a desirable thing to have ships all over the oceans flying American flags. But can you subsidize one interest without subsidizing all? Is the transportation on land not just as essential as transportation on the sea, and is not production just as essential as transportation? In fact, all of them are essential, and if you start to subsidizing one essential interest then in logic and good sense you must subsidize all; and if you subsidize all interests in the Nation, you wind up just where you started. Is it any more essential that the flag should fly on the seas than on the land? Is it any more desirable that the flag should fly on the ships that plow the ocean than that it should fly on the continental farms of the United States?

If we were a new Nation, without credit, without facilities, and with vast potential resources all of which needed development, then conditions would be in some respects different, but the United States has more credit than any other nation. It has more money than any other nation. Its resources are as highly developed as those of any other country, and if any industry is unable to survive in open competition, then it seems futile to take money from all to distribute among the few.

Mr. KAHN says we can get nowhere as a Nation, we can get nowhere as a Congress unless we come to the realization that there are other people whose endeavors are directed along lines other than farming who must have consideration from the Nation's lawmaking bodies. Of course this is true, but I would like to call his attention to the fact that there are other people whose endeavors are directed along lines other than operating ships who must have consideration from the Nation's law-making bodies. No man and no set of men should be given a subsidy in the leading Nation of the world. Everything legitimate should be done to foster the interests of the whole Nation. Every opportunity should be given to every man to engage in any line of productive work, but it should be simply an opportunity and not a subsidy. Legislation should be national and should be in the interest of the whole people and not for the benefit of a favored few.

It is said that there is a system among a certain class of people who, when they have filched something that belongs to another, join the pursuing crowd and begin to yell "Stop thief." It seems that the gentleman from California has been invoking a similar philosophy. Desiring to secure something from the Treasury of the United States in behalf of the few shipowners, he attempts to distract attention from the matter in hand by railing at the farm bloc.

Now, the farm bloc has not attempted to get the United States Government to give the farmers anything. It has simply endeavored to get the farmers placed in the same position as other activities of this country in the way of markets and of credits, and in all the legislation that has been passed they have been expected to give ample security for any credits that were even indirectly advanced to them. But no such thing is expected of the shipping interests. They not only do not expect to give security for the moneys advanced, they do not even expect to give a promise to pay. They simply want the Congress of the United States to assume the rôle of a "walking Santa Claus" and hand them the money which they desire. This is an un-American policy which is contrary to the genius of a representative form of government.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Mr. Chairman—

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman from Virginia rise?

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. To move to strike out the last two words.

Mr. Chairman, it is very apparent if the compensation provisions are passed as they stand that this will be the situation, notwithstanding the amendment that was adopted a while ago, offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN]: The Shipping Board will have authority at any time—let us say perhaps within the next 6 months—to cover the whole field of compensation by 10-year contracts, a subsequent Congress may see fit to repeal or modify the act, and although that may be done it is manifestly clear that any party with whom a contract may have been made, while his contract may be terminated, will have the right to press a claim for damages against the United States.

That being true, that being incontestably true, even though the Sixty-eighth Congress or some subsequent Congress should feel that the act ought to be repealed or materially modified with respect to the matter of compensation, the Government would have no protection at all against claims, and they might be very large and extensive claims for damages.

Now, nobody can dispute that. The prohibition against the impairment of the obligation of a contract applies to States alone. It does not apply to the United States. A subsequent Congress may enact legislation designed to put an end to compensation contracts, but even though that is done, parties who are affected will retain their right to press their claims for damages.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Yes.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Will not the claim for damages be limited by the amount of loss? Will not the shipowner show what the loss of profit is, instead of simply showing what the amount of the subsidy is?

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Under statutes now in force a party would be entitled to go to the Court of Claims and ask for the amount of the unpaid compensation for the period of the contract. That might cover his loss, but he might be allowed to superadd to that any other direct damages that he may have sustained.

My friend, the gentleman from New York [Mr. DEMPSEY], who is a most excellent lawyer, knows very well that whatever the measure of damages, the party would have a claim that he could assert, and assert successfully.

Mr. DEMPSEY. That is true.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. And if my friend were counsel he would press not only for the amounts specified in the contract but he would press for something more.

Now, that being the fact, as it is admitted to be true, we ought to guard against the possibility of that happening by such an amendment as I have drawn and will offer in a little while, reserving to Congress—to the Sixty-eighth Congress or any subsequent Congress—the right to repeal and modify the contract in such manner as will not only terminate the contract but exclude damage claims. Unless that is done you will chloroform the next Congress and chloroform at least four subsequent Congresses, because the contract period is 10 years. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Virginia has expired.

Mr. HICKS. Mr. Chairman, the debate on this bill is nearly over. The discussion has been illuminating and interesting, but devoid on the part of the opposition of any suggestion which will remedy the present unsatisfactory condition of our shipping. That something must be done is admitted by all who are cognizant of the facts. In former days, when we possessed no foreign shipping of any moment, the establishment of a merchant marine was open to discussion, and it could be fairly questioned whether it was worth while to attempt its construction at an expense to the public purse. Then there was room for a difference of opinion, but now, with a merchant marine in existence, we are past any theoretical discussion and are confronted by a condition which requires action, a condition which can not be evaded or dismissed, a condition which carries with it responsibilities which must be met.

I desire to call attention to an item appearing in the Washington Star of last Friday in reference to a cable dispatch which had been received from England, where the opposition here to this bill had evidently been interpreted as spelling its rejection. This dispatch read:

LONDON.—Expected defeat of ship subsidy bill in United States having marked effect on shipping shares here. Peninsular & Oriental Steamship Co. rose 5 points yesterday, Royal Mail 3½ points, and Cunard 1½ points.

The Star further comments as follows:

This is not a new viewpoint with foreign interests. For many years before the war the Germans maintained a lobby in Washington to prevent ship subsidy legislation. The importance of the British attitude at present is that it demonstrates how fearful their shipping interests are of an American merchant marine, privately managed, as contrasted with Government operation, which they do not fear at all, because they regard it as inefficient and ineffective.

That shipowners abroad desire the defeat of this bill and view with serious alarm the adoption of the President's recommendations can not be doubted. They speak from their standpoint for they realize their shipping supremacy is in jeopardy. But I want to stress the American side and I ask, Is American pride and American enterprise to be made subservient to commercial rivals who seek to control the shipping of the world?

I impugn no man's motives; I challenge no man's right to vote as he deems proper. Without personal animosity or racial prejudice but in justice to an American industry, it is fair to inquire why it is that men prefer to stand with the English and Japanese shipowners in preference to the American shipowners. If it gives them any solace to strike at an American institution they are welcome to that solace. If it gives them pleasure to see American shipping wither and decay while the shipping of England and Japan thrives and prospers at our expense, the pleasure is theirs. If they favor foreigners who would be the beneficiaries of the course they desire Congress to pursue, instead of favoring Americans in their efforts to maintain our flag upon the seas, the choice is theirs. If they would rather obstruct this great national purpose by placing obstacles in its path, instead of promoting its development by encouraging the investment of capital and the employment of labor in the building and operation of our own ships, the decision is theirs, and upon their heads must come the censure and the condemnation should this measure fail of adoption.

But I have no fear that it will fail. Since the beginning of the discussion of this bill its position has steadily gained ground, for its proponents have presented sound, logical, practical, unanswerable arguments in its favor. It is a forward-looking, constructive piece of legislation founded on business principles. It deals with existing conditions in an honest effort to economize Government funds and seeks to eliminate the waste attendant on Government operation. It will supplant the inefficient and careless methods too often the result of public management, by the incentive and economic organization promoted by private control.

The ships are in existence; they are being operated; the money for their construction has been spent, and we are confronted by the expenditure of additional vast sums unless some change is made in the present system. We are faced with the practical fact of how best to conserve that which we already have. What have the opponents of this bill brought forward in an effort to solve the problem? Nothing but hackneyed political phrases and abstract theories on the principles of Government. Their objections have revealed no constructive measure; they have not suggested a single method for checking the present waste of public funds. If they favor economy why do they not offer some plan to protect the Treasury? If they are unable to do this, then in all fairness they should support this bill which will undoubtedly bring about a reduction of expenditures. If they favor the transfer of ships to private hands—and I doubt if many feel otherwise—they should advance a plan of action. Outside of a comparative few, I think it is conceded that the Government should not be burdened by the permanent ownership and operation of ships for peace purposes. I believe that private ownership and operation is desirable for two reasons—first, because it is impossible for private citizens owning ships to survive the rivalry of Government-operated ships; and second, because it would afford financial relief to the Government and promote efficiency of service and enlargement of operation.

We must not forget that there is a vast number of privately owned ships now endeavoring to compete against Government-owned ships, and that the losses of these shipping companies will doom them to bankruptcy unless the present conditions are altered. Should this result take place the Government would find it even more difficult than at present to dispose of its vessels, and in the meantime American commerce would disappear and foreign shipowners would control the ocean rates and be masters of the sea-borne commerce. No suggestion has been offered by the opponents of this bill to meet such a situation, neither have they suggested any plan by which the United States would be provided with auxiliary ships for the Navy in case of the emergency of war. Other nations have their merchant marine fleets easily transformable into transports and supply vessels when necessary, a safeguard for their national defense.

For us to contemplate the possibility of repeating at some future date the experiment of constructing a war emergency fleet costing billions of dollars is unthinkable. Have the opponents of this bill any plan which would safeguard this possible contingency? Have the opponents of this bill any plan for encouraging the expansion of American commerce? If they have they should bring it forward, for I doubt if they honestly feel that American ships should abandon the seas. Let us look this question squarely in the face; let us not be frightened by the bugaboo of the word "subsidy." It is but another form of a protective policy which will result in this case in stopping the needless flow of money from the Treasury for the upkeep and operation of ships; it will accomplish the transfer of ships to private enterprise and make certain that ships shall be available for the Government whenever needed; it will encourage the commercial expansion of the United States and keep in America its proper proportion of the huge sums paid out for ocean freights and insurance on American products.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment which I wish to offer.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee offers the following amendment: Page 33, line 10, strike out subsection (d), paragraphs (1), (2), (3), and (4).

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I wish to supplement what has been stated by my colleague from Virginia [Mr. MOORE] by stating that the very purpose of this bill is to chloroform future Congresses, is to prevent future Congresses from exercising their prerogatives upon this question.

There appears in the hearings a letter from a shipping concern to the Shipping Board in which they recommended that the bill be so framed as to avoid appropriations and provide for permanence, and they have done both. I offered an amendment limiting these contracts to a period of 10 years from the date of the passage of the bill; in the bill it is 10 years from the date of the contract, and they can just keep making contracts and renewing them indefinitely. That amendment was voted down. Then I also offered another amendment to a previous section in which there was reserved the right to terminate those contracts upon 12 months' notice by an act of Congress. That was a section upon which a motion was made and jammed through to stop debate on the entire section after there had been only one five-minute speech, and that on the other side. It was one of the most important sections in this entire bill, and there were several important matters that some of us on this side desired to discuss. We were assured that we would be given a full and fair opportunity to discuss amendments. There have been no efforts whatever made on this side to kill time, and we have not offered a single amendment for that purpose, but every one of the amendments offered were offered in absolute good faith, and practically all of them were amendments that had been offered in committee by committee members.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. MONDELL. Gentlemen on that side were demanding a vote by tellers when the vote was 3 or 4 to 1.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. I want to say to the gentleman from Wyoming that there was no instance in which that was literally true. There was one case in which there was a large majority, but there were several cases in which there were close margins, and some amendments were adopted.

Mr. MONDELL. Well, then, if that is so, why did the gentleman do it? What is the gentleman complaining about?

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. I am saying there are many features of the bill which we desire to discuss. I am not speaking of this particular amendment, but of things which have transpired heretofore. I hope they will not transpire in the future. We are making pretty good progress on this bill, I think.

Now, as I said, getting back to the argument that was made by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MOORE] and supplemented by myself, the very purpose of that contract provision and of the resistance against anything which would reserve to future Congresses the right to act upon the proposition and express their will and the will of the people is the desire and the intention on the part of the proponents of this bill to make it permanent legislation, to tie the hands, to usurp the authority of future Congresses. I do not think we have the legal right to do it; I am sure we have not the moral right to do it. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired.

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Chairman, may I ask that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee be again read?

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will again be read.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. It was a pro forma amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Then, without objection, the amendment will be withdrawn.

There was no objection.

Mr. EDMONDS. Has the gentleman any other amendment to offer?

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 408. (a) Compensation shall be paid in respect to any vessel only for mileage covered while the vessel is engaged in foreign trade upon a voyage of which one of the ports is a port of the United States, its Territories or possessions, or the Canal Zone; except that any vessel engaged in foreign trade shall be paid compensation for mileage covered in such trade during any period of time (1) if the vessel has entered or cleared from a port of the United States at any time during the 12 months prior to such period of time and after the making of the contract; or (2) if the vessel during the six months ending with such period of time has derived at least one-half of the total revenue, accruing to it by reason of the carriage of passengers and cargo, from passengers and cargo received from or delivered to vessels which are registered, or enrolled and licensed, under the laws of the United States and whose voyage began or terminated at a port in the United States, its Territories or possessions, or the Canal Zone.

(b) Compensation shall not be paid in respect to any vessel for mileage covered upon a voyage in foreign trade during which the vessel enters or clears from a port in the United States, its Territories or possessions, or the Canal Zone, if the distance between the terminal ports of the voyage is less than 150 nautical miles.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas offers an amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. HARDY of Texas: Page 34, line 13, after the word "Zone," strike out the remainder of line 13 and the balance of subsection (a) through line 2 on page 35.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, the purpose of this amendment is to exclude from the receipt of subsidy vessels engaged in trade between foreign nations. If we had in view the purpose to help our commerce, we might somewhat justify the payment of a mileage subsidy to vessels carrying our commerce to foreign ports, or bringing foreign commerce to our ports; but this provision authorizes the payment of a mileage subsidy to vessels owned by Americans when they engage in transportation, we will say, from Petrograd, Russia, to Christiania, Norway, or from one foreign port in one country to another foreign port in another country, provided that during 12 months' time the vessel comes home once. I think we are doing pretty well if we pay a bonus gathered from the taxpayers of the United States for carrying the commodities of the United States abroad and bringing back commodities from abroad to the United States. But, if we propose now to put great fleets upon the ocean to enter into competition between foreign ports with ships of those foreign ports or nations, it seems to me we are very anxious to build up a special interest and put money in shipowners' pockets without regard to the interests of our own people. Therefore, I ask the earnest consideration of every Member of Congress who wants to vote solely for the interest of our people and ask favorable consideration of this amendment.

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Chairman, again the gentleman are consistent. First they talk about the enormous monopolies that are going to get benefits under this bill. Now, they wish to exclude the poor little cargo carrier that might be owned by one man, traveling around the world looking for cargo, picking it up and carrying the American flag into foreign ports. They do not want him to have compensation. Why, gentlemen, the business of a cargo carrier is that of a common carrier. He may go to South Africa and pick up a cargo for India and then go to India and get a cargo for China, and then get a Chinese cargo and bring it to the United States. You are going to put him out of business. You are not going to pay him a subsidy.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Does not this provision call for the payment of this subsidy to small ships or large ships, whether owned by little men or big men?

Mr. EDMONDS. Oh, yes; but you have objected to paying the big liners, and the big liners will run in regular lines from port to port.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. And then use these little boats as feeders, and we will give a subsidy on the little boats.

Mr. EDMONDS. Another thing, gentlemen. What does this do? We have in China and in the eastern seas a lot of vessels that pick up cargo and bring it and deliver it to American ships. We say that if 50 per cent of their tonnage is delivered to American ships we will pay them. Why? Because they are cargo bringers. They are the little wagons bringing the loads to your ships and giving you prosperous and good business. I think it is a mistake to cut them off. I think it is a mistake to change this paragraph at all. It was very carefully thought out by the committee. We do not want in any way to injure these vessels. There are a number of them in China, vessels that do not see a port of the United States for years. Yet they bring in cargo for our larger vessels to carry to the States.

Now, on the question of the other vessels, those that we require to make an American port every 12 months, they go around the world. They may go anywhere for 12 months, but we require them to come in once every 12 months.

Mr. BUTLER. What is the reason given for striking this language from this bill?

Mr. EDMONDS. I do not know. The gentleman who offered the amendment just made a speech; but I can not find any reason for it at all.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EDMONDS. Yes.

Mr. FESS. Is it not the practice of some vessels running from South America to North America to go to Liverpool first and then come on home?

Mr. EDMONDS. One of the most profitable pieces of ocean business that has been known in modern times is what is known as the triangle trip from England, carrying coal to South America, then carrying South American products to North America, and carrying wheat from North America to England. That is a most prosperous business. If this amendment goes through, if one of our ships does any business like that, it will be prohibited from getting the benefits of this compensation.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. I understand the gentleman's bill requires them to come back at least once a year to get the subsidy. Is that right?

Mr. EDMONDS. I do not want to answer any foolish questions. There is no doubt that they will get the subsidy, whether they come back once a year or not, if they comply with the law.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. They have got to come back here to get it.

Mr. SEARS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. My good friend and colleague from Pennsylvania [Mr. EDMONDS] seems to take a great deal of delight in congratulating us on the Democratic side upon our consistency. Let me call his attention to the fact that the President last Tuesday week appeared before this body and in his statement I find the following:

The committee has given the question a full and painstaking inquiry and study, and I hope that its favorable report speedily will be given the force of law.

Therefore the President indorsed the bill as a whole and hoped that Congress would enact it into law speedily. Yet we find my good friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. EDMONDS], the chairman of the committee, offering amendments to the bill, and many, many amendments have been made to the bill, in fact, so many that I doubt if the President would recognize the bill if he should again have the pleasure of reading it. This afternoon you have undertaken, as usual, to rush this legislation. We have found during the past two years the result of the mistakes made in rushing any legislation. We only rush legislation when we want to fool or deceive the people. Let me briefly call your attention to the fact that the President also said substantially:

Last February I called your attention to the shipping bill and expressed the hope that you would pass some bill giving some relief.

Last August the President permitted us to go home and make a campaign in order that we might try to retain our meal tickets. Last September, although according to the President's message we were losing $4,000,000 per month on our ships, the President saw fit and deemed it proper to permit those Members of Congress who had survived the primaries to go home and again try to retain their meal tickets. You know the result!

On the 7th of November the people of America spoke, and many who had disregarded the sentiments of the people fell by the wayside, and it was not until after they had spoken that the President was fully awake to the situation which confronted him. He then called Congress in special session, and we now find the leaders on the Republican side moving to shut off all debate on nearly all of these important amendments, and by your votes you have made it possible for them to do so.

What is the result? You are forced to vote for or against an important amendment without any information at all. Certainly the people will not approve this method of legislation, and I fear many will find it out but too late.

Mr. BRIGGS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SEARS. Certainly.

Mr. BRIGGS. What is the object of shutting off debate?

Mr. SEARS. The debate is being shut off because those in charge of the bill fear the light and do not want those in the cloakroom to become too well acquainted with what the bill contains. [Laughter.]

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. The gentleman from Florida is not shut off from his debate, is he?

Mr. SEARS. No. I have listened to my good friend from Washington so much that when I take a few minutes of time I feel that I am trespassing on the wisdom of the gentleman from that wonderful State, which has shown so recently some inclination to go Democratic. [Laughter.] I do not care to take up more time of the House, but I say again, as I said nearly a year ago, if you continue this method of gag-rule legislation, if you continue to ignore the interests of the people, you will find when it is too late that the people are more alive now to important questions than ever before.

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. Mr. Chairman, in the separate report filed by the minority members, signed by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. DAVIS], the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HARDY], the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD], the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. BLAND], the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BRIGGS], I find on page 28 thereof the following illuminating but startling statement:

In conclusion we call attention to the following facts:
"1. Our Government-owned merchant tonnage cost the people about $3,000,000,000. It is estimated that we will probably sell the ships for $200,000,000. Consequently, the people will stand a loss by deflation of $2,800,000,000."

The quotation I have just read is the mature finding of the Democratic members of the Committee on Merchant Marine that have had the bill under consideration. These gentlemen tell us that the ships can be sold—"probably sell" is the term they use—at only one-fifteenth of their cost price. In other words, that of every $15 paid in by the people $14 thereof has been wasted, squandered, and lost.

The inculpatory admission of the gentleman convicts the administration of Woodrow Wilson of one of the greatest political crimes of the ages. The finding of the minority constitutes an indictment against the officials of the Wilson administration that can not be avoided nor defended, for it is an admission by gentlemen of the very highest character and of the most influential standing in the Democratic Party.

War may be wasteful, but not even war can excuse or condone this wanton dissipation of the people's funds. Contemplate the situation! Three billions paid in and probably one-fifteenth of a billion to show for it.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. With the greatest of pleasure.

Mr. BANKHEAD. The gentleman read section 5 of the merchant marine act of 1922, which gives plenary power to the Shipping Board to sell, give away, or otherwise dispose of these worthless vessels that the gentleman speaks of.

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. Yes; but this Shipping Board has been cautious. Only on yesterday you were seeking to strike out the clause in the bill which undertook to give to the board power to sell the ships at private sale. I presume there is no market for the ships. Therefore, under existing law no opportunity to sell the ships at either public or private sale.

For a good while we have been trying to comfort ourselves with the thought that at least one good had come out of the war, namely, we would have a "great merchant marine." This delusion I fondly cherished until recently. I had, at times, certain misgivings and fears, but finally, when after long and patient hearing the minority members in a report to Congress conceded that our ships could not be sold for more than two hundred millions—one-fifteenth of the cost of the fleet—then the scales fell from my eyes. I now doubt if the vessels can be sold for even two hundred millions.

No wonder that we have radicals in the country; no wonder that socialism is gaining a foothold; no wonder that anarchy is gleaming and the red flag fluttering. But the blame should be put where it belongs.

The wooden ships have been sold at a price less than one-half of 1 cent on the dollar of cost. The concrete ships are no better, and ultimately will have to be towed out to sea and sunk at a place where their ungainly and bulky bulks will not obstruct navigation. Many of the ships built at Hog Island and at other yards will have to be dismantled.

When at Newport News on the occasion of the launching of the West Virginia, a great ironclad man-of-war being built under the supervision and direction of West Point and Annapolis architects and engineers, I was in conversation with the executive head of the organization having that vessel under construction. Attention was directed to the fact that in Hampton Roads there were perhaps a hundred vessels tied up and idle, but guarded at a very large governmental expense. The greater number of these vessels cost very large sums of money—from $500,000 upward. The gentleman with whom I was conversing said, "Yes; they cost a great deal of money, but I would not accept them as a gift and be under obligations to operate them." I wanted to know his reason, and he replied that the vessels were badly planned; that there were not sufficient spaces for cargo or passengers; that they were burdened with heavy machinery; and that the cost of fuel would be prohibitory.

It has been charged, and I believe the allegation to be true, that a certain foreign nation never intended that America should have a merchant marine. Her influence is still abroad in the land.

The President in his message said that the Shipping Board had reduced the annual deficit in operating the fleet to fifty millions. Should we continue at that rate, at the end of four years the estimated value of the fleet will have vanished. The plan of the President to turn the vessels over to private owners and compel them to fly our flag and operate between certain ports, as, for example, between San Francisco and Australia, will only cost twenty millions a year, and is a good one.

The greatest cost in operating American ships is due to the La Follette Seaman's Act. This act increases the number of seamen—almost doubles the number—required on Japanese vessels, limits the hours of labor, and in large effect increases the pay. Yet we find Mr. Gompers and the Democratic leaders opposing this bill. Why? Have the Democratic leaders offered any constructive suggestion or plan? None at all. Opponents of the bill seem to be willing for the American merchant marine to break down and fall—willing to let the whole proposition go aglimmering.

Is it possible that America is incompetent to engage in commerce and seafaring. Shall the proposed merchant marine be as a mere firefly or will-o'-the-wisp? Is it a mere ignis fatuus that we have been following?

Opposition to the bill by the men whose party spent the money for the ships and three times as much per annum for their operation was born in a fierce desire to make political capital for their selfish partisan advantage at the next election.

It has been openly charged, and I confidently believe the charge to be true, that the Democratic Members of the House entered into a secret caucus and decided to oppose this bill as a party action. Their object, if attained, would have the effect of finishing the work set upon foot by their illustrious leader and patron saint, Woodrow Wilson, the man who kept us out of war. Zealous in this faith countless mothers had on bended knees thanked God for Wilson.

Wilson's influence is still alive in the land. There are those who still believe in the League of Nations and that we should have stood guardian for Turkey and for Armenia, the latter being the poorhouse of the world. Then there are the fellows who want to cancel the debts Europe owes us. Judge Clark, friend of Newton D. Baker and appointee of Wilson, has resigned his position in order that he may carry on with his propaganda for debt cancellation.

Had we joined the league and been subjected to its decisions the debts would have been canceled by a flourish of the pen.

Have the people forgotten what happened when Wilson was President? Hog Island Shipyard and nitro powder works were only two examples of a thousand wild orgies of waste and rotteness. Of course, Mr. Wilson did not have time to look after business. He was a dreamer and saw visions. The dreams he dreamed and the visions he saw were of the nature of the delusions of the opium eater. Like unto Dead Sea fruit—pleasant to the eye but ashes to the taste.

Barring the circumstance of suffering and death of the boys who went to war, no greater tragedy has befallen the Nation than the wreck of the merchant marine. While President Harding is trying to salvage a part of the wreck, he finds every political enemy in the land resisting his efforts. What matters it to them that the starry flag is driven from the seas, that even the advantages of the seaman's act shall be lost to American sailors, that goods made by American labor can not have a market for lack of friendly ships to transport them to foreign markets, that the products of the farm, if produced, shall be left to rot or sold at a sacrifice, or else not produced at all? In the eyes of the political enemies of President Harding such calamitous results are as nothing compared to the spoils they enjoyed during Mr. Wilson's past administration, and what they would hope to enjoy should Wilson be returned again to power.

The Soviets of Russia have made grafting a capital crime. Recently they executed 11 men for stealing from the Government. If such a law as this had been on our statute books and enforced during the last administration, the graves of American soldiers would have been exceeded in number only by the graves of the criminals who pilfered the people's money in the building of ships, airplanes, and the like.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from West Virginia has expired.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this section and amendments thereto be now closed.

The motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

OWNERSHIP OF VESSELS BY CITIZENS OF THE UNITED STATES.

SEC. 409. (a) Compensation shall be paid in respect to any vessel only for mileage covered while the vessel is owned by a person a citizen of the United States.

(b) Compensation earned after three years from the enactment of this act shall not be paid to any vessel owner unless, at all times during the period over which such compensation was earned, at least 75 per cent of (1) the total gross tonnage of all vessels (other than those documented for the coastwise trade only and other than those operating on the Great Lakes or adjacent or connecting waterways upon voyages neither beginning nor terminating east of Quebec, Canada), which are owned or chartered by such vessel owner, or for which such owner acts as agent, plus (2) the total gross tonnage of all such vessels owned or chartered by any person affiliated with such vessel owner, or for which such affiliated person acts as agent, is comprised of vessels registered under the laws of the United States.

(c) For the purpose of subdivision (b)—

(1) Two or more corporations or associations shall be held to be affiliated if one corporation or association owns directly, or controls through closely affiliated interests or by a nominee or nominees, 50 per cent or more of the outstanding voting stock or voting power of the other, and owns directly, or through closely affiliated interests or by a nominee or nominees, 80 per cent or more of all the outstanding stock or interest in the other; or if 50 per cent or more of the outstanding voting stock or voting power of two or more corporations or associations is owned directly, or controlled through closely affiliated interests or by a nominee or nominees, by the same interests, and 80 per cent or more of all the outstanding stock or interest in such corporations or associations is owned directly, or through closely affiliated interests or by a nominee or nominees, by the same interests.

(2) An individual or partnership shall be held to be affiliated with a corporation or association if 50 per cent or more of the outstanding voting stock or voting power of such corporation or association is owned directly, or controlled through closely affiliated interests or by a nominee or nominees, by the individual or partnership, and 80 per cent or more of all the outstanding stock or interest in the corporation or association is owned directly, or through closely affiliated interests or by a nominee or nominees, by the individual or partnership.

(d) The board may suspend from time to time the provisions of subdivision (b) in respect to a power-driven vessel of a particular type or kind, which any person desires to own or charter, if, in the opinion of the board, vessels of such type or kind registered, or enrolled and licensed, under the laws of the United States are not reasonably available for the purposes desired. Any vessel in respect to which such suspension is made shall not be counted in computing gross tonnage for the purposes of subdivision (b).

Mr. BRIGGS. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 36, strike out all of lines 4 to 25, inclusive, and also lines 1 to 4, inclusive, on page 37.

Mr. BRIGGS. Mr. Chairman, this amendment would strike out the definition of affiliated interests which confines it to 50 per cent or more of the stock.

Yesterday I offered an amendment with reference to the term "affiliated" in another part of the bill, contending, as I contend now, that the question of whether or not one organization is affiliated with another ought to be left to the determination as a question of fact and not be so defined that these corporations can easily get from under the limitation proposed by the bill through a definition which comes to the rescue. The Federal Trade Commission has utterly condemned any such practice as defining the term "affiliation" as only including ownership of 50 per cent or more or any other fixed percentage. They have pointed out that the Standard Oil Co. of Indiana controls the organization in Wyoming with only 30 or 40 per cent ownership, while Mr. Gould controlled the Missouri Pacific with only 23 per cent of that stock.

This bill proposes to give the greatest subsidy, both in cash and in tax exemptions, that the world has ever known. The proponents of it talk about taking the Government out of the business of operating ships and relieving the Government of the losses which are being sustained now through their operation. Why, my colleagues, you are just putting the Government into business. Instead of giving the board a chance, with the revival of trade, to cut down its losses, as Mr. Lasker said he could do with a slight upturn in trade, and that that was expected within the next two years, you exchange for that chance the certainty of fixing on the backs of the people for 10 years—the President put it 25 years in his message—and I think perpetually, from $500,000,000 to $1,000,000,000 taxes, and you call that relieving the people of Government expense. Mr. Chairman, I ask for the adoption of this amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate upon this section and all amendments thereto be now closed.

The motion was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

INCREASE AND DECREASE OF COMPENSATION.

SEC. 410. (a) Whenever the board determines that in order to promote the welfare of the United States, the operation of vessels in any particular service, or of any particular type and kind, is desirable and necessary, and that the rate of compensation authorized under section 404 is insufficient to induce the operation of vessels in such service, or of such type and kind, the board in making the contract for compensation may provide therein for the increase of the rate of compensation authorized in respect to such vessel under said section, to such an extent as it deems necessary to procure the establishment and maintenance of such service and the operation of vessels in such service, or the operation of vessels of such type and kind; but the rate of compensation as so increased shall not exceed twice the rate authorized by said section. As used in this subdivision and in section 411 the term "service" includes the route on which the vessel operates, the frequency of sailings, and the speed which she maintains.

(b) Whenever the board determines that the rate of compensation authorized under section 404 is excessive under the special circumstances of any particular case, it shall, in making the contract for compensation, provide therein for the decrease of the rate of compensation to such an extent as it deems advisable.

(c) After the making of the contract of compensation the board may, with the consent of the other party thereto, decrease or, within the limit provided by subdivision (a), increase, the rate of compensation to be paid.

(d) No increase or decrease shall be made under the provisions of this section unless such increase or decrease is specifically authorized by the board upon the affirmative vote of not less than five members, and unless such vote and a full statement of the reasons for the increase or decrease are spread upon the minutes of the board.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. BANKHEAD: Strike out paragraph (a) of section 410.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me if there is any provision in this bill which should legitimately challenge the attention, even of the proponents of the proposition, it is included in the provisions of paragraph (a) of this section. There are a great many gentlemen on this floor who have grave doubts as to the propriety of giving a direct subsidy to any private enterprise, and there are gentlemen here who have doubts as to the wisdom of setting the precedent of paying, in effect, out of the Treasury of the United States private shipowners the amount fixed in the schedules of the bill as now presented, but it seems to me that when the Shipping Board, who are the proponents of this proposition, bring in a bill not only authorizing the payment of these tremendous subsidies to the operators of these ships, but going further than that and deliberately giving to the unrestrained discretion of these members of the Shipping Board the right to absolutely double the amount of this compensation, they have certainly gone beyond the reasonable limits of the exercise of discretion. Not only that, but they are extremely anxious to see that there shall be no restraint upon the exercise of this power if they can get it, and if you will turn to page 47 of the bill you will find in section 418 that the determination of the board as to the amount of compensation to which any person is entitled under the provisions of that title shall not be subject to review by the general accounting office, and so forth. What will be the practical effect of this discretion, the possibilities of its exercise, if this power is left in the hands of the Shipping Board? I do not know who is going to constitute the Shipping Board in the years to come under the operation of this bill. It is not necessary to make any criticism of the present personnel of the board, and it is not our purpose to do that, but under the plain language of this bill it actually gives them the opportunity and the privilege and the power without review by anybody, Congress or any other reviewing authority, to restore this additional 100 per cent gratuity upon these private operators.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Yes.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. If this law goes into effect with this provision, giving the absolute authority to increase this pay to double the amount prescribed by the bill, will there not be great inducement for great interests to seek to select the members of the Shipping Board?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Absolutely; there can be no question about that proposition. There are certainly enough bestowals of power upon the Shipping Board outside of this provision in this bill that might be legitimately criticized, but for the life of me I can not see how any gentleman, even on that side or on this side of the aisle, is willing to go to the extent of deliberately declaring by permitting the provision to remain in the bill a willingness to bestow such power upon a small number of men. Their judgment may be fallible.

Improper influences might be brought to bear upon them in the presentation of the fact, even though they were as honest as could be. If this power is not restrained, if it be not limited, it gives to this handful of men the opportunity to take out of the Treasury of the United States from thirty to fifty million dollars a year additional bonus or subsidy to be conferred upon these shipowners.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Yes.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Do I understand from this provision that the board could allow additional compensation to one line and deny it to another?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Absolutely.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. With no provision for review in any way whatsoever?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Absolutely none. I do not think that that will be denied.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Would not this provision put the board at the mercy of the shipping interests acting in concert, who would contend their inability to get along without doubling the compensation?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I do not see how that criticism can be successfully denied.

Mr. BRIGGS. Did not the director of research of the Shipping Board testify that the cash subsidy, which he estimated annually at $32,000,000, would amount to $64,000,000 a year under this provision, if they exercised the power to the extent of 100 per cent?

Mr. BANKHEAD. That is disclosed by the Record.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Alabama has expired.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] has insisted upon the unlimited power of the Shipping Board in this case. I call the attention of the committee to subsection (d) of this same section of the bill, which provides that no increase or decrease under the provisions of this section shall be made unless such increase or decrease is specifically authorized by the board upon the affirmative vote of not less than five members, and unless such vote and a full statement of the reasons are spread upon the minutes of the board.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. Just let me make my statement first. The reasons for this provision permitting the increase of subsidies under certain circumstances are these: In the first place, there may be certain routes that are important and valuable which must be built up, which can not make money at the present time without additional subsidies. Such a line is the line now running from San Francisco to Australia, stopping at our naval base at Samoa and at Honolulu. That route under present conditions can not make money. It may in the future, but it is not now profitable under the basic subsidy, and this fact is perfectly evident from the records of the company. If we are going to keep that route going we have to give some additional inducement.

In the second place, it may be necessary, important, and valuable to our Navy to develop certain types of ships. For instance, a liner making 28 to 30 knots an hour may be a most valuable ship in time of war as a scout cruiser. It is a ship that can not be operated under any conditions at a profit in time of peace. You can not make money on that kind of a boat. The Shipping Board, to encourage the building of a few of that particular type of ship, might allow the owners an additional subsidy under this provision.

And again, on certain specified particular routes or services we might meet subsidized foreign competition, which subsidy might be increased in order to drive our shipping out of that particular route or particular service. Under this section the Shipping Board may meet this increase, under the limitations which are provided for in the last section, by a corresponding increase.

Now, let me call the attention of the committee to one more thing. The subsidy provided in this bill, the basic subsidy, does not nearly meet the differential in the operating cost between our ships and those of our nearest competitor, Great Britain. I do not believe it will more than meet that if it were doubled, and, as a matter of fact, it does not meet it to-day. Now, I yield to the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Under the statement which the gentleman just made, of course, in all human probability the board is going to have to exercise its discretion, and it will certainly increase or double the amount of subsidy authorized by this bill, because the gentleman says this subsidy in his opinion will not be sufficient.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. I said that the basic subsidy would not make up the differential. In addition to the direct subsidy we have the indirect aids, the growth of our trade, and all the other elements that enter into the successful development of a merchant marine.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Under this bill, under the restrictions referred to, five members of the Shipping Board can absolutely double the amount of subsidy to be given to each operator under this bill.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. They have that power, but I do not think there is the slightest possibility of exercising it except in a case of some specific condition such as I referred to.

Mr. BANKHEAD. But they have the power?

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. Yes; but they must put their reasons before the public, and there must be a concurrence of five members of that board.

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Chairman, I would like to get a little time on the amendment, and I move to strike out the last word. It is rather amazing to me to hear gentlemen in opposition to the bill criticize the Shipping Board. During my time in the House the Shipping Board has received not millions of dollars but billions of dollars, and no restrictions were placed upon the expenditure of it. But gentlemen now find great fault that within the limitation of the appropriations of this Congress the Shipping Board should have a little leeway to raise the rates of subsidy, subvention, or compensation, or whatever you may want to call it, where it is found necessary to provide services. I can not understand their position. We are trying to build up the merchant marine. We have been doing our best to produce a bill which will do it. There ought to be some elasticity. The reason your Government is not successful in the operation of ships is because it has no elasticity. If you could have elasticity the board could operate these ships as the ordinary private operator. But they do not. You restrict, hamper, and hamstring them so they can not operate the ships except in a most expensive manner. What are you trying to do? You take the line to Australia, which only six months ago was going to go out of business, and would have but for a section of the Jones bill in connection with the Post Office contract. They could not make money. Now, in this section we give a chance for the board, if in its discretion it concludes it is the proper thing to do, to give a little more aid to these boats, and without their coming to Congress. But remember, gentlemen, they have only so much money to use, anyhow, and they can not in any way exceed the appropriation. Further than that, they have to make an accounting every year of their expenditures.

I would be perfectly willing, as far as I am concerned, to go a little further. In the bill the board have to file their statement and five members have to vote for this increase or decrease. As I say, I will go a little further. I will agree with the gentlemen of the minority to a provision that such increase or decrease be approved by the President of the United States. If you feel that the Shipping Board should not have that authority, I will agree to that.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania think that the President in any instance is going into the merits of the proposition? Does not the gentleman think that he would simply accept the statement of the Shipping Board and approve it?

Mr. EDMONDS. He would be probably as honest as any Democratic President ever was.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Does the gentleman think the President of either party could attend to all these details? It would be physically impossible.

Mr. EDMONDS. I think the gentleman realizes the fact that there are not going to be so many details of increases and decreases that the President can not attend to it.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EDMONDS. Yes.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Does not the gentleman think it is going to be absolutely necessary to increase the compensation for the tramp service, that carries the bulk of the commerce of the Nation?

Mr. EDMONDS. The gentleman, being opposed to the bill, would rather see them swallowed up by the sea altogether, would he not? I think the tramp service will be able to get along with what we give them in the bill.

Mr. McDUFFIE. I do not think so.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I wish to speak in opposition to the pending amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas is recognized in opposition to the pending amendment.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Mr. Chairman, most of the law books define "larceny" as depriving another of his property without his consent or his knowledge. This whole bill is a piece of legislative larceny. [Laughter.]

In the first place, the Republican House is going to deprive the people of the United States of quite a sum of money, and the fact that you are ramming this bill through now before the 4th of March is evidence of the fact that you know it is against the consent of the people of the United States, because you know they do not want it, and you know that if you should wait until after the 4th of next March it would be impossible to pass this bill.

I want to call the attention of the committee, however, to page 38, section (c), which reads as follows:

(c) After the making of the contract of compensation the board may, with the consent of the other party thereto, decrease or, within the limit provided by subdivision (a), increase, the rate of compensation to be paid.

Note the language. Gentlemen of the committee, what do you want a contract for? Why go through all the mummery and the mockery of writing provisions in this bill to the effect that the Shipping Board is to execute contracts with the shipowners and ship companies as to the terms under which ships shall be operated, and then in the next clause provide that the board may raise the rate of compensation if it desires to do so, but that, of course, it must have the consent of the operators to decrease it. Which it will never get.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Yes.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. You will notice also that it requires the consent of the operator to increase it. [Laughter.]

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Oh, no; and I will tell the gentleman why it does not require the consent of the operator to increase the compensation. It is because under the terms of this bill gentlemen on the Republican side are so determined to give the shipowners all the money they can prize out of the Treasury that they will give it to them whether they consent or not. [Laughter.]

Mr. BEGG. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Yes.

Mr. BEGG. How much of that money comes from Texas? Regardless of what the amount is, how much of it comes from Texas? Not enough to buy a cheap cigar! [Laughter.]

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. All right. We have to smoke cheap cigars down in Texas, because we are taxed so heavily under the Republican tariff and revenue laws. [Laughter.]

Mr. BEGG. Tell us where it is coming from. It is not coming from Texas or Alabama or Tennessee.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. I do not know the exact or direct amount. But I will answer the gentleman's question. The gentleman from Ohio is one type of partisan, one type of legislator, who has got the dollars that he thinks his constituents are going to get out of this bill so close up to his eyes that he can not see all the great millions of people in the United States who, although they may not pay it directly out of their pockets into the Treasury, yet pay every time they buy a suit of clothes, or eat a mouthful of food, or ship a pound of their produce to Europe, or buy a tariff-taxed article, a part of the burdens which the Republican Party imposes on the people of the United States by its tariffs and subsidies the fruits of which it is taking and handing out in concrete form to the beneficiaries of that policy of greed. The gentleman from Ohio is of that type of statesmen who believe that unto the man who hath there shall be added that which belongs to some one else, and that as to the man who hath not, even that which he hath not shall be taken away. [Laughter.] The gentleman from Ohio believes that a very great shipping concern like the Standard Oil Co., that transports in its tankers from the fields of Mexico millions and millions of dollars' worth of oil every year, ought to be entitled to a subsidy for carrying its own oil, and that the poor farmer down in Texas or Ohio or Kansas, who has been taxed by this robber tariff and by Federal taxation until he can not pay the expenses of producing what the gentleman's friends in Ohio would buy from him at starvation prices, should be taxed to pay that bonus to the Standard Oil Co. That is the kind of statesman the gentleman from Ohio is. [Laughter and applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Chairman, I move that the debate on this section and all amendments thereto be now closed.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois moves that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto be now closed. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. All debate is closed. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to have the amendment read.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent that the amendment be again reported. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BANKHEAD: Strike out paragraph (a) of section 410.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the "noes" appeared to have it.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a division.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama asks for a division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 43, noes 70.

So the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MOORE of Virginia: Page 38, line 24, after the period, add the following: "Provided, That any compensation contract made under this act shall be subject to the repeal or amendment of the act by the Sixty-eighth Congress or any subsequent Congress."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question being taken, the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I ask that I may be allowed half a minute to make a statement on behalf of my colleague, the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. TUCKER], who is absent on account of illness. He wishes me to state that if he were present he would move to strike out section 410; and he asks permission to extend his remarks on that portion of the bill or any other portion of the bill which he may wish to discuss.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MOORE]?

There was no objection.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, in the absence of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. TUCKER], I move to strike out section 410, which would permit the increase or decrease of compensation by the Shipping Board.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee: Page 37, line 15, strike out section 410.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question being taken, the amendment was rejected.

Mr. BRIGGS. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BRIGGS: Page 38, strike out in line 16, after the word "may," the words "with the consent of the other party thereto."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question being taken, the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

REQUISITION OF COMPENSATED VESSELS.

SEC. 412. Any vessel in respect to which a contract for compensation is made may, at any time during the period for which the contract is made, be taken and purchased or used by the United States for national defense or during any national emergency declared by proclamation of the President. In such event the owner shall be paid the fair actual value of the vessel at the time of taking, or paid fair compensation for her use based upon such fair actual value; but in neither case shall such fair actual value be enhanced by the causes necessitating the taking. In the case of a vessel taken and used, but not purchased, the vessel shall be restored to the owner in a condition at least as good as when taken, less reasonable wear and tear, or the owner shall be paid an amount for reconditioning sufficient to place the vessel in such condition. The owner shall not be paid for any consequential damages arising from such taking and purchase or use. If there is a disagreement between the United States and the owner of the vessel as to the fair actual value, fair compensation, or amount for reconditioning, such value, compensation, or amount shall be determined by arbitration, one of the arbitrators to be selected by the President, one by the owner of the vessel, and the third by the two thus selected, or, if they can not agree, by the Chief Justice of the United States.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee: Page 40, line 1, after the word "taking," insert "which shall be construed to be the original cost to the owner of the vessel plus betterments and minus 5 per cent annual depreciation."

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, one of the claims made in behalf of this bill is the national-defense feature, in order that we may have the ships for use in the event of future wars. Now, this amendment which I propose simply fixes the method by which the price may be determined, which is that if the Government takes over a ship it shall pay the cost price to the purchaser plus betterments, less 5 per cent annual depreciation, which is generally agreed to be a fair figure for depreciation.

Now, why is this important? Simply because unless something of this kind is fixed, if we get into another war the Government will have to do what was done during the last war. It will have to pay war prices, because during the last war this Government and others had to pay several times as much as the ship was worth before the war. They had to pay enormous prices for the use of ships; and as a matter of fact the Government paid considerably more than $200,000,000 for the charter hire alone of the vessels which they took for use, and that did not take into consideration the cost of operation. In other words, the amount paid for the ships that were simply taken for use amounted to more than it is expected to get for the entire Government fleet.

As I said yesterday, during the war shipowners ran up freight rates on the Government over 1,200 per cent. They ran up the price of tonnage in proportion. Now, if we are to sell these ships to the shipowners at a small percentage of their pre-war price or of what they can ever be built for again, if we are to exempt them from taxes, if we are to pay them these subsidies, if we are to give them the other benefits of the bill, then is it unreasonable to ask that there be embodied in the compensation contract a provision that if we ever get into war and if the Government must buy these ships it shall pay the cost price to the favored purchaser plus betterments and less depreciation?

It is simply a provision to prevent profiteering upon the Government because of war conditions and because of the high prices which result from war. And the same thing with regard to the use of the ships. It is later provided that if the Government uses the ships instead of purchasing them the charter price shall be based upon such fair value, and that would follow my amendment and apply to it also. I want to know what objection any representative of the people can have to this simple, fair provision for the protection of the public interest in time of war.

Mr. SEARS. The principal argument was that we had to do this in order that we could get vessels in case of war?

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. SEARS. The gentleman's contention, which I think is correct, is that unless this provision is adopted we will not have vessels in case of war unless we pay enormous prices again, like we did during the last war.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. We will not, because the bill, as it now reads, says that they shall be paid "the fair actual value of the vessel at the time of taking," which would be in the midst of war, because the Government will not want to take the vessels unless we are at war and need the vessels for war purposes. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired.

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Chairman, the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. DAVIS] wants us to take the ships in time of war at the original cost to the vessel owner plus betterments and minus 5 per cent annual depreciation. I should like to suggest that the Atlantic Fruit Co., which paid $200 a ton and a little over to the Shipping Board would be very glad to see that provision in the bill, because if the Government should take their ships they could get $200 a ton. That is what the gentleman's amendment says, if you wish to vote for it. As a matter of fact, here is what the situation was: We were confronted with a situation where men had bought high-priced ships. If we said just exactly what the gentleman wants to say in the bill, and what his amendment says, if we had said that we would have placed upon the Government, if we should have a war within two or three or four years, the taking back of these ships at the enormous prices paid for those ships by these men.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Mr. Raymond, president of the American Steamship Owners' Association, said at the hearing that there were no ships bought at that price now in operation, that they had gone out of commission.

Mr. EDMONDS. I do not care what Mr. Raymond said. The Atlantic Fruit Co. is in operation and has some ships that it bought from the Government at high prices, and there are other ships, too. If I were over in my office I could give you the names of a dozen lines that have paid high prices—some Philadelphia lines.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EDMONDS. Yes.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Does not the gentleman know that 90 per cent of the ships will be ships bought at post-war prices?

Mr. EDMONDS. That may be true, but what we did was this: We said that the people would be paid the fair actual value of the vessel at the time of the taking, and in neither case should the fair actual value be increased by the cause necessitating the taking. The gentleman made the statement that if there was war there would be a greatly enhanced price. We have taken care of it in the bill so that a man will only be paid its fair value. It would be foolish for us to pass the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee, because if we had a war within the next five years we might have to take ships that were bought for $200 or $250 a ton during the war. Nothing would please these owners any more than a provision of that kind. They probably are not worth now $100 a ton. We studied this at all angles and decided that the best we could do was to put in a provision in order to protect the Government from just such a condition as the gentleman's amendment would bring about.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Will the gentleman allow me a suggestion?

Mr. EDMONDS. Certainly.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. And, as a matter of fact, we have safeguarded it by providing that the fair value shall not be enhanced by the cause that necessitates the taking.

Mr. EDMONDS. Yes; I have just alluded to that. When the war started we paid $57,000,000 to the British Government for the transportation of troops. We paid $70,000,000 to the Cunard Line for requisitioned vessels that we took over because we did not have the wisdom to order them ourselves.

Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto be now closed.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I wish the gentleman would not make that motion. I would like to have five minutes.

Mr. EDMONDS. Very well, Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate close in five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Mr. Chairman, in answer to the argument of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, let me make this plain, clear, and true statement to Members on both sides. It is admitted that there may be one or two companies who have bought a few ships during the war at high prices which they have not subsequently sold. Some have turned them back to the Government. Over 90 per cent of the existing tonnage of the United States to-day is still in the hands of the Shipping Board, and it is expected that they will be sold at $20 or $30 a ton. Under this bill the purchaser from the Shipping Board of these ships may buy them and run them under a subsidy for 10 years, and at the end of that 10 years, if we get into another war and go to requisition the ships, you will find that the market value of those ships has been increased 200 or 300 per cent. They will be requisitioned and paid for by the Government, not at $20 or $30 a ton, but under this bill at $100 or more a ton. We did it in the Spanish War, we did it in the last war. This bill proposes that the Government shall have the right to take the ships and pay the market price at the time of taking. That is the provision of the bill, and the rest of the section is camouflage and useless. It is a recognition of the right of the subsidized vessels to charge the Government war prices for these ships, if we ever have to take them. Certainly they will do it. If you want to give these ships away and then 10 or 20 years later pay the top price after they have been subsidized for that length of time, pay the war prices, then reject the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee. If you want to pay what they cost, after allowing for a depreciation of 5 per cent per annum, and pay for any betterments that they put on, if you want to give them what they are entitled to, accept this amendment. I believe in calmer moments when you will not seek to reject this amendment just because it comes from this side, you will say that this amendment is just. We tried to get it in in committee, and you ought to adopt it in the Committee of the Whole. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee) there were 37 ayes and 60 noes.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

REPAYMENT OF COMPENSATION.

SEC. 416. (a) When used in this section the terms "taxable year," "gross income," "net income," and "invested capital" shall have the same meaning as when used in the revenue act of 1921.

(b) The owner of a vessel or vessels who has made a contract with the board for compensation in respect thereto shall pay to the United States 50 per cent of the amount by which his net income for the taxable year, attributable to the operations of such vessels, exceeds 10 per cent of his invested capital for such year attributable to such vessels; but in no case shall the amount so to be paid exceed the amount of compensation earned in respect to such vessels during the taxable year under a contract made under this title by the owner.

(c) In computing the gross income attributable to the operations of the vessels there shall be included the amount of compensation earned under this title in respect to the vessels during the taxable year. In computing the net income attributable to the operations of the vessels there shall be deducted from gross income a reasonable amount, determined by the board and certified by it to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, as representing the fair value of the products, services, or facilities furnished by the owner of the vessels in connection with the operations of the vessels. There shall not be allowed as a deduction in computing the net income attributable to the operations of the vessels the deduction provided in section 265 of the revenue act of 1921 as amended by this act.

(d) If the owner of the vessels uses them in whole or in part for the transportation of his own property, his gross income attributable to the operations of the vessels in transporting such property shall be considered to be such amount as is determined by the board and certified by it to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue as representing the fair value of the services performed by the vessels in transporting such property.

(e) If the owner of the vessels is an individual, a partnership, or an estate or trust, the invested capital shall be determined under rules and regulations prescribed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, so as to equal, as nearly as may be practicable, the invested capital that would be allowable to such owner if a corporation.

(f) For the purpose of making an accurate distribution or apportionment of profits, income, deductions, or invested capital, in computing net income and invested capital for the taxable year, among two or more trades or businesses (whether incorporated or unincorporated, or whether or not organized or created in the United States) controlled directly or indirectly by the same interests, the Commissioner of Internal Revenue may consolidate the accounts of such trades or businesses in any of the following cases:

(1) If the person conducting one of such trades or businesses in dealing with the person conducting another, bought from or sold to the other person during the taxable year products, services or facilities at prices above or below the current market price, thus effecting an artificial distribution of profits;

(2) If one such person in any way so arranged his financial relations with another such person during the taxable year as to assign to either a disproportionate share of net income or invested capital; or

(3) Where for any reason it appears to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue that the net income or invested capital attributable to the vessels as shown by the return of the owner does not fairly reflect the actual or true net income or invested capital of the owner.

(g) Every person liable for the payment provided for in subdivision (b) shall make, at the time and in the manner provided by law for making his income-tax return, a return, in such form as may be prescribed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, stating his net income attributable to the operations of the vessels, his invested capital attributable to the vessels, and any other information relating to the determination of the amount payable under this section, which may be required by the commissioner. A copy of such return, together with all schedules and data submitted therewith, shall be transmitted to the board at the same time that the return is filed.

(h) The entire amount for which the owner of the vessels is liable under this section shall be due and payable at the same time and in the same manner, and shall be collected in the same manner, as the first installment of income tax imposed by law.

(i) For the purposes of this section the amount of compensation earned in respect to the vessels during the taxable year shall be determined by the board and certified by it to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue.

(j) Amounts paid under this section shall be covered into the Treasury to the credit of the merchant marine fund created by section 402. Any refunds due on account of overpayment shall be paid out of such fund on vouchers approved by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue and countersigned by the chairman of the board.

(k) The provisions of Titles I, II, III, and XIII of the revenue act of 1921, including penal and other provisions relating to the assessment, collection, remission, or refunding of income and excess-profits taxes imposed by act of Congress, and the provisions of any other internal revenue law of the United States relating to the assessment, collection, remission, or refunding of such taxes, shall, so far as practicable, extend and be applicable to the determination, collection, remission, or refunding of the payments provided for in this section.

(l) The Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, shall make rules and regulations for the enforcement of the provisions of this section, and shall have charge of the administration of this section.

Mr. BRIGGS. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment:

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 42 strike out lines 9 to 12, inclusive, and insert the following:

"Provided, That any compensation received by such owner from the Government for prior years under a contract made under this title shall also be repaid out of the remainder of the net income exceeding 10 per cent of the invested capital for any year during the life of such contract."

Mr. BRIGGS. Mr. Chairman, it has been contended all along apparently by the proponents of the subsidy that where shipping organizations earn more than 10 per cent on the investment they would return to the Government the subsidy they had received. But this bill does not so provide. This bill expressly limits that return to the subsidy received in one year where the earnings exceed 10 per cent. In other words, some shipping concern, some syndicate, taking over these ships might not earn more than 10 per cent for seven years of its existence, but in the eighth year might earn 50 or 100 per cent. And it would not pay back to the Government one dollar of the subsidy received except during the eighth year. My amendment provides that when they have received the subsidy from the Government for several years and they earn more than 10 per cent, that not only the subsidy of that year but the subsidy prior to that time shall be returned to the Government because it shows plainly that there is no longer any reason for their having that extra advantage.

All through this bill provision is made in every form for granting every possible aid. In fact, the chairman of the Shipping Board himself stated that if anybody knew of any indirect aid which had not been included in the bill he would like to have it mentioned, so that it might be included.

The Standard Oil Co. is still a beneficiary under the terms of the bill; the United States Steel Corporation is a beneficiary. They receive all of the indirect benefits of this law, all of the tax exemptions, all the extra depreciation allowances, and other rewards. They receive benefits on every commodity which they carry that is not their own, even though one or more, like the Standard Oil Trust, may be declaring stock dividends, the greatest ever known, up to 900 per cent, and additional 300 per cent dividends through its subsidiaries.

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman's amendment shows how little study he has given to the subject. We will take the case of the Atlantic, Gulf & West Indies Steamship Co. From 1916 to 1921 they made an average of 8.52 per cent earnings on capital investment. In 1916 they made a percentage of 21.15, and we would have had a little over 50 per cent of subsidy returned in that year. In 1917 they made 19.97 per cent, and we would have had about 50 per cent of the subsidy returned in that year. In 1918 they made 3.80 per cent, which would have given us nothing. In 1919, 10.25 per cent, when we would have gotten a little bit of subsidy return. In 1920 they made 1.77 per cent, nothing, and in 1921 they lost 4.09 per cent. If you take the average of those five years they made 8.52 per cent, and we could have gotten nothing back in the way of subsidy return, where under the provisions of the bill we would have had something returned.

Mr. BRIGGS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EDMONDS. Not now. I have not the time.

Let us take the case of the Pacific Mail Co. In 1916 for eight months, they made 12.33 per cent, when we would have had a subsidy return; in 1917, 32.30 per cent, when we would have had a considerable return; in 1918, 19.15 per cent, still some return; and in 1919, 33.88 per cent; 1920, 19.87 per cent; and in 1921, 8.38 per cent.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EDMONDS. Not now. Let us take the case of the International Mercantile Marine Co. In five years they made an average of 8.01 per cent, with no subsidy return in any one year. Now, take the United Fruit Co. and we find an average there of 16.38 per cent. During a couple of those years we would have gotten no return from our subsidy.

The figures to which I have referred will be published in to-morrow morning's Record, and gentlemen can study them and, if they desire, criticize them. They have been made by Mr. Craemer, assistant to the vice president in charge of finance, of the Shipping Board.

Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate upon this section and all amendments thereto do now close.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. Briggs].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BRIGGS) there were—ayes 39, noes 66.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

FINAL DETERMINATION OF AMOUNT OF COMPENSATION.

Sec. 418. The determination of the board as to the amount of compensation to which any person is entitled under the provisions of this title shall not be subject to review by the General Accounting Office.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois: Page 47, lines 7 to 11, strike out section 418.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, this short section provides that the account or compensation paid to any shipowner under this law shall not be subject to review by the General Accounting Office. Why that was put in there I do not know. A little while ago I called up the General Accounting Office of the Treasury Department to ascertain if they knew of the existence of this particular section. The assistant solicitor of that department informed me that they knew nothing of it and asked to have it read. I read it to him, and he expressed great surprise that this was in the bill. I asked him if there were any other governmental accounts that he knew of that were not subject to review by the General Accounting Office, and he told me he knew of none. If this, then, is adopted and written into this law, it will be the first example of the kind, the first provision in any law of that kind. Why is it here. Anyone knows, I assume, that the General Accounting Office does not attempt to review an account as to anything except whether it comes within the letter of the law, whether it strictly complies with the legal requirements. The General Accounting Office ought to have that power. It is unwise and very dangerous for us to say to this board or any other board or to any official of the Government that any vouchers which it or he may issue will go through irrespective of whether they comply with the law or not. This provision says that any compensation paid, which means any sums to be paid, to any shipowner or line can not be subject to any jurisdiction of the General Accounting Office. They will not be able to look over it and decide whether it complies with the law. For some reason unknown to me this committee wants to write this into the law. I see no reason for its being in there. It is unsafe to leave it there.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. Since July, 1919, we have given the Shipping Board $471,000,000 out of the Treasury in addition to their revolving fund, and upon investigation the gentleman will find that not a single auditor of this Government has ever yet audited the full accounts of the Shipping Board.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. That may be; but I want to say one thing to the Republican side of the House. We lay ourselves open to suspicion when we write this into this bill. There must be some hidden reason for having it there, otherwise why do we depart from the policy that has been followed since the beginning of the Government?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?
Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Yes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. The gentleman from Illinois has been very successful in arguing or bluffing his side of the House into accepting his amendments. I trust he will have the same success in respect to this.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Well, I hope those on the Republican side will listen to me, too. I want this to prevail. We ought to make this bill as good as we can, and there is no reason for this that I can see that has been offered yet.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Chairman, the reason this section was incorporated in the bill was not sinister or secret or based upon reasons which ought to invite suspicion, but it is a simple matter of common sense and practical administration. If the General Accounting Office were to review payments under the contracts which will be entered into under this bill it would necessitate the building up of an entirely new bureau in the General Accounting Office, duplicating the auditing system of the Shipping Board. Highly technical questions must have consideration in determining payments under these contracts, as to what constitute foreign trade, what is the relation between foreign companies and domestic shipping companies, a thousand and one questions which require experts to determine. But you can adopt this amendment if you want to duplicate the work of the auditing department of the Shipping Board and set up such an auditing system, employ experts, train your force to do this work over again in the General Accounting Office. It was not because anybody was trying to get away with something that this provision was put in here, but it was put in simply to avoid at a great expense the duplication of auditing work which will be done in the first instance under the Shipping Board. It is not a new proposition. This section was taken bodily from the soldiers' bonus bill which twice had the approval of this Chamber, because in the bonus law it would require a duplication of an elaborate and intricate auditing system. If this provision was carried in that bill, it is carried in this law for the same reason and no other.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEHLBACH. I will yield.

Mr. FESS. As a friend of the bill I am asking this question: Why is it we have an auditing department in the Shipping Board; why has it not been transferred?

Mr. LEHLBACH. Simply because of the intricate nature and the widespread and innumerable technical questions which are involved in making these audits and because the general auditing office has not the facilities, without creating new bureaus, to do this work. That is the simple reason. This would simply be a duplication of the work of the Shipping Board, the very thing we are trying to get away from in the executive departments.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman answer this question? Would not the transfer of the auditing department to the general auditing office simplify it?

Mr. LEHLBACH. We would have to do the auditing in the Shipping Board, anyhow, in order to determine the compensation that is due various vessels. We could not transfer that auditing department, because it is necessary in order to estimate what is due on the compensation contracts in the first place, so we will have to retain that auditing force in the Shipping Board anyhow, and build up a similar organization in the General Accounting Office to duplicate that work.

Mr. FESS. I am—

Mr. LEHLBACH. It means the employment of hundreds of clerks, guided by and under the supervision of trained experts.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEHLBACH. I will.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Is there any other department of the Government of which the gentleman knows that does not have its own accounting department as well as sending it through the General Accounting Office?

Mr. LEHLBACH. Except in the bonus bill.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Every department of the Government, so far as the gentleman knows, has its own accounting department and is subject to review by the General Accounting Office?

Mr. LEHLBACH. But it is not a departmental activity. It is quasi governmental activity. It is an arm of the Government in contractual relation with citizens of the Government and is not carrying on departmental work such as the various Departments of State, Agriculture, War and Navy, Interior, Post Office, and so forth.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. But if this be done it will be the only branch of the Government that is not subject to this review?

Mr. LEHLBACH. In the bonus bill—

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. But the bonus bill has been passed.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Passed in this House.

Mr. MONDELL. And the gentleman voted for it.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. And I will vote for it again.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman who has just spoken is very much afraid there will be an increase of employees in the General Accounting Office, but he is not much afraid of this organization being established and maintained in the Shipping Board in order to perform its functions. It simply shows, as I have asserted before, that this bill provides for the performance of so many different functions in so many different ways by the Shipping Board that it will require a larger organization in the future under this bill than the present law requires. Now, I want to say to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GRAHAM] that the reason this provision is in here is because it is one of the numerous provisions contained in this bill to confer upon the Shipping Board and to preserve to them extraordinary and autocratic powers. It is one of the provisions inserted to prevent them from being watched, one which prevents a check. I want to know if these matters are more complicated, more complex, and important than the numerous decisions upon similar matters by the Interstate Commerce Commission which are subject to review by the General Accounting Office. It is the second instance in which this bill violates the provisions of the general Budget law; first, in regard to appropriations and the matter of determining that, and here in preventing a review of their decisions by the General Accounting Office.

Now, here is a provision in the general Budget law which it violates. Section 205 reads as follows:

Section 236 of the Revised Statutes is amended to read as follows:
SEC. 236. All claims and demands whatever by the Government of the United States, or against it, and all accounts whatever, in which the Government of the United States is concerned, either as debtor or creditor, shall be settled and adjusted in the General Accounting Office.

"All claims and demands whatever."

And yet an exception is to be made in favor of the Shipping Board.

Why? Because they are entitled to more confidence than anybody else? If so, this House has not shown that confidence heretofore. We have repeatedly refused to authorize the Shipping Board to employ a few officials at the prices that they wanted to pay them. We deprived them of that authority. They repeatedly asked for authority to spend certain sums without appropriations, and we refused to grant them that. And yet it is now proposed to pass a bill that confers infinitely greater powers and greater discretion, all through the bill, upon the Shipping Board than those which this House has already gone on record several times in refusing to grant to the Shipping Board.

This bill usurps power now exercised by the President and six Cabinet officers, and now this is inserted to usurp the power of the General Accounting Office and of the Budget Bureau. It invades the functions of all these different officials. And yet those powers and authorities and those opportunities which have been zealously sought by the Shipping Board, it seems, that many Members of the House are bent upon granting to them.

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto be now closed.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania moves that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto be now closed. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. All debate is closed. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GRAHAM].

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the "noes" seemed to have it.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a division.

The CHAIRMAN. A division is demanded.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 52, noes 46.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

TITLE V.—ARMY AND NAVY TRANSPORTS.

SEC. 501. Whenever in the judgment of the President adequate transportation facilities to meet any or all of the needs of the Army, Navy, or Marine Corps are afforded by vessels registered or enrolled and licensed under the laws of the United States, he may direct the discontinuance in whole or in part of the transport service of either the Army or the Navy and transfer to the board or place out of commission any of the vessels now or hereafter engaged in either of such services. Whenever such disposition is made, the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy, respectively, are authorized and directed to enter into contracts with owners of vessels registered or enrolled and licensed under the laws of the United States for such transportation as may be required by the Army, the Navy, or the Marine Corps, respectively. Such contracts may be for a term of 10 years. The board shall furnish whatever assistance may be necessary in the making of such contracts. There is hereby authorized to be appropriated such sums as are necessary to meet the payments required under such contracts.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee: Page 47, line 12, strike out the Title V.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, although it is pretended that one purpose of this bill is national defense, yet this title under consideration proposes to do away with the Army and Navy transport services.

The origin of this system grew out of our experience in the Spanish-American War, and by reason of that experience President Taft recommended to a Republican Congress the provision establishing this service, and it was done, and it has been a part of the Army and Navy Establishments ever since.

Now, it served as a splendid nucleus during the war, and it would do so in the future, but because of the greediness of these private shipping interests who want to perform this service and charge the Government commercial rates this provision is inserted.

It was stated in the original study of the Shipping Board that there should be contained a provision that they would be permitted to charge the Government only a certain percentage of the commercial rates, and Chairman Lasker stated at the hearings that the bill ought to be amended in that respect, but it has not been amended in any such respect.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. EDMONDS] last year introduced a separate bill to the same effect as this title, and we had hearings upon it before the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries. The War Department and the Navy Department sent representatives there, testifying against the bill. And not only that, but the gentleman from Pennsylvania addressed a letter to Secretary Weeks in regard to the matter, and Secretary Weeks made a reply in which he entered into a detailed discussion of the proposition, which will be found upon pages 2467-2469 of the hearings on this bill. That letter was written in October a year ago.

In that letter Secretary Weeks gives the figures to show that after deducting all expenses, interest, and depreciation it was not only cheaper to the Government to carry its troops and supplies and munitions by its own ships than to pay the regular commercial rates for transportation, but he concluded his letter in this wise:

Aside from the mere question of cost, the retention of the transport service as an integral part of the country's Military Establishment is as apparent to those conversant with our military requirements under normal peace conditions as any other arm or service of the War Department.

Now, that was his position. It is true, as the gentleman from Pennsylvania is possibly preparing to say, that they did not appear against this bill at the hearings upon this bill. Why? We undertook to get the witnesses, and for some reason Secretary Weeks declined to permit Colonel Dalton, the Chief of the Transportation Service, to appear and testify upon it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired.

Mr. EDMONDS. Of course, gentlemen, if you will read the bill you will recognize the fact that the President is authorized to do away with the Army and Navy transport service if he finds it of advantage to do so.

The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. DAVIS], of course, did not care to take the figures that we got from the War Department in the hearings and figure out for himself how much the transport service cost, but he takes the letter from Secretary Weeks, which forgets to mention the $24,000,000 worth of ships that they have tied up which belong to their transport service and which they were not using. Of course, there was no deception in that, but, using the cheapest ships, that they have now disposed of, and not using the expensive ships, they made $107,000 over commercial rates. But had they taken into account the deterioration and the interest account on the investment in the $24,000,000 worth of ships that are tied up they would have found out that the $3,000,000 of transport service was conducted at a loss of something like $5,000,000 or $6,000,000. That is the reason why Secretary Weeks, after looking into the matter, consented to the proposition that the transport service should be disposed of.

Furthermore, what do we want with a transport service? England uses her commercial ships for her transport service, so as to build up their lines and have them operating at a profit.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EDMONDS. Yes.

Mr. MONDELL. Is it not true that no nation on earth has a transport service, such as ours, except a nation that has no merchant marine?

Mr. EDMONDS. I think that is true.

Mr. MONDELL. And the only reason why we inaugurated the transport service was because we did not have a merchant marine to carry our troops and munitions of war?

Mr. EDMONDS. I think that is absolutely true. And, of course, the gentleman must not forget the free rides that people get on transports, either.

Mr. MONDELL. I never took a joy ride on a transport; but I suppose it is a very lovely thing to have an opportunity to do so.

Mr. EDMONDS. Here is a Congress which has an opportunity to dispose of that question. The newspapers say that Members of Congress enjoy their rides on transports. And I notice by the report made that civilians rode on transports to the extent of some $400,000 worth.

Mr. BLANTON. I presume this is an opportunity to prevent high-titled naval officers attending birthday festivities over in Japan. If it does that I am with the gentleman. I think we ought to prevent the use of the transports to naval officers to go to Japan to attend birthday celebrations.

Mr. EDMONDS. If there is any pretension to economy by the gentleman—

Mr. BLANTON. I am with the gentleman on this.

Mr. EDMONDS. This is the place in the bill for all the economy that is possible in any department of the Government.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto be now closed.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. SANDERS of Indiana). The gentleman from New Jersey moves that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto be now closed.

The motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment.

The question being taken, the amendment was rejected.

Mr. BRIGGS. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas offers an amendment which the clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment proposed by Mr. BRIGGS: Line 7, page 48, strike out the period, insert a colon, and add the following: "Provided, That any such Army and Navy transportation service shall not be discontinued, nor shall contracts for transportation, as designated herein, be made unless the rates charged for such transportation are reasonable, and especially when taken in connection with the cost of such Army and Navy transportation service as now operated."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas.

The question being taken, the amendment was rejected.

Mr. BRIGGS. Mr. Chairman, I offer another amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas offers an amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment proposed by Mr. BRIGGS: Strike out the word "ten," line 3, page 48, and insert "not more than five."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

INTERRELATIONS OF RAIL AND WATER TRAFFIC.

SEC. 602. (a) It is hereby declared to be the policy of Congress to promote, encourage, and develop water transportation, service, and facilities in connection with the commerce of the United States, and to foster and preserve in full vigor both rail and water transportation, and the board and the commission are hereby severally authorized, empowered, and directed to cooperate to that end.

(b) The board and the commission are authorized and directed to create a joint board, selected from among their members, officers, and employees, to study the conditions and interrelations of rail and water traffic, and the principles and methods essential to accomplishing the policy declared in subdivision (a).

(c) The joint board shall appoint a secretary, who shall keep minutes of its meetings, which minutes shall be furnished to the members of the board and of the commission. The joint board shall hold regular semimonthly and such additional meetings as may be necessary to transact properly its business.

(d) The joint board shall formulate and make such recommendations to the board and the commission, not inconsistent with law, pertaining to the interrelations of rail and water traffic, as it deems necessary to accomplish the policy declared in subdivision (a). The board shall make effective, by such means as are granted it by law, any such recommendation upon any matter within its jurisdiction, if such recommendation is approved by the board. The commission shall have a like duty as to any such recommendation upon any matter within its jurisdiction.

(e) None of the provisions of this section shall be construed to affect the power or jurisdiction of the commission, or to confer upon the board concurrent power or jurisdiction over any matter within the power or jurisdiction of the commission.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. DEMPSEY: Page 48, line 24, after the word "traffic," insert as a part of the sentence the following: "Questions relative to the control, improvement, and extension of ocean freight terminals."

Mr. STAFFORD. I reserve a point of order on the proposed amendment.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Mr. Chairman, I understand the amendment is accepted by the committee.

Mr. STAFFORD. If that is the fact, I withdraw the reservation of the point of order.

Mr. EDMONDS. The committee has no objection to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. TILSON). The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question being taken, the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the section.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BLANTON: On page 48, beginning with line 14 and ending with line 23 on page 49, strike out all of section 602.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I desire to ask the gentleman in charge of the bill how many new employees at high salaries is it contemplated that this new board will require?

Mr. WHITE of Maine. It does not authorize any.

Mr. BLANTON. It provides for a new board, does it not?

Mr. WHITE of Maine. It provides for a board to be selected from among their own members.

Mr. BLANTON. Selected from among Interstate Commerce Commission and the Shipping Board employees and members?

Mr. WHITE of Maine. It means that certain members of the Shipping Board and certain members of the Interstate Commerce Commission may meet together, constituting a new board.

Mr. BLANTON. But it does not say that.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Yes, it does; for the consideration of the interrelation between rail and water transportation.

Mr. BLANTON. And connected with that meeting of these board members how many extra employees will it require?

Mr. WHITE of Maine. It does not authorize any at all.

Mr. SEARS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. In just a moment. I think the time has come when we ought to stop creating these new boards and new employees. We ought first to get rid of the surplus ones that we have in Washington and elsewhere on the pay roll of the Government.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. If the gentleman will permit, the language is this: They are authorized and directed to create a joint board elected from among their members, officers, and employees.

Mr. BLANTON. That is just exactly the point.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. The employees of the Shipping Board and the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. BLANTON. I refuse to yield further, because the gentleman will have his own time to explain. The gentleman answers my questions.

If the board may be selected from among the officers and employees, and it is already admitted that there have been about 4,000 of these employees segregated from the pay roll at this time from what there were a few months ago, there should be several thousand more sent home and taken from the pay roll of the Government. If we create a new board it will be composed of men who will be placed in high-salaried positions who ought not to be on the pay roll of the Government. As long as I am a Member of Congress I am going to vote against the establishment of every new board, commission, or bureau of the Government. We have too many now. If we ever expect to bring about retrenchment in the expenditure of the people's money the time has now come to stop creating new offices. What became of the new office created by the present administration—the political office of the gentleman that was given a high salary to meet with the committee upon which is the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MOORE] and others? Has there ever been a meeting of that committee?

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the gentleman is discussing the reorganization board and not this bill.

Mr. BLANTON. I am saying that what happened to that reorganization board can happen to this board.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas knows the rules and he will proceed in order.

Mr. BLANTON. Well, Mr. Chairman, we now have such a very distinguished parliamentarian in the chair that I am sure he will not rule me out of order, because I am in order. [Laughter.] The gentleman from Maine ought to be with me on this proposition. The people of Maine ought to be just as anxious for retrenchment and economy as the people anywhere else. I am sure if there is a chance in this bill for a new board and new officers with high salaries from the Government that the gentleman from Maine and the gentleman from New Jersey ought to be as anxious to take it out of the bill as I am.

Mr. ROACH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

Mr. ROACH. If I understand this section, it calls for the coordination of the work of the Interstate Commerce Commission and the Shipping Board, and what objection can there be to that?

Mr. BLANTON. This board could be appointed out of the employees in the two offices. They will become members of the board with high salaries. In other words, they will be leaving a position which pays $1,500 or $2,000 and go upon this board and get $5,000 or $10,000, as the Shipping Board may allow.

Mr. ROACH. What objection is there to having coordination in the work of these two departments?

Mr. BLANTON. I am objecting to the creation of a new board in this Government.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Mr. Chairman, this is simply a proposition to permit members of the board and of the Interstate Commerce Commission and certain other employees of each to meet together, constituting a board, a sort of clearing house for the consideration of problems of mutual interest to the two boards. It does not authorize a new salary; it does not authorize a new employee or anything of the sort.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. I want to say to the gentleman that I understand that at this time there is such a board. They call it the liaison board. It is a board made up of employees of the two bodies, the Shipping Board and the Interstate Commerce Commission.

I think there is one provision here that is objectionable, and that is the requirement of a semimonthly meeting. That may lead to unnecessary expense. What happens now is that the board gets together whenever there is any necessity. I suggest that you strike out any designation of time for a meeting.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. I think the gentleman is right in the statement that they do meet informally now. But we want to make that meeting which is now informal more formal. The reason we put in a time for the stated meeting is that if either board has a matter they wish to discuss with the other board they could bring them to the table and make them listen.

Mr. SEARS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Yes.

Mr. SEARS. Paragraph (c) provides that the secretary shall keep the minutes. Will that secretary work for nothing?

Mr. WHITE of Maine. He must be appointed from among the existing employees, from one or the other, and he would work without any additional salary whatever because there is no authorization for a salary.

Mr. SEARS. Then the gentleman assures us that the secretary will not receive any extra salary?

Mr. WHITE of Maine. I do.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. I understand that several sections in this bill have been framed without any consultation with the Interstate Commerce Commission. I think I am correct on that point. If I had the time I could point out several amendments that everybody should be glad to make in order to prevent any conflict between the two bodies. I know amendments offered by me would not be entertained, but my suggestion is that at some stage the Interstate Commerce Commission should be called upon for its opinion on these provisions.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. I think, although I have never personally talked with them, that the Interstate Commerce Commission has had an opportunity to express its opinion.

Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto be now closed.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Maine.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

EXPORT BILLS OF LADING.

SEC. 603. Paragraph (4) of section 25 of the interstate commerce act as amended is amended by adding at the end thereof a new sentence to read as follows: "In making rules and regulations prescribing the form of such through bills of lading the commission shall adopt as the portion thereof governing the carriage of goods by water in foreign commerce such form as may be certified to the commission by the United States Shipping Board for such purpose."

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I ask unanimous consent to proceed out of order for five minutes in order to correct what I think is a rather grave injustice done to one of the witnesses who testified before the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes out of order. Is there objection?

Mr. SNYDER. I object.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I regret, but I have objected all day to discussion out of order, and I feel that I must do so now.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is heard.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I want to be recognized on my motion, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I shall not undertake to do by indirection what I can not obtain leave to do directly. I hope the gentleman will withdraw the objection. I am not going to raise any controversial issue, but I would like an opportunity to correct a statement with reference to the attitude of Mr. Edgar Wallace, who appeared before the committee as a representative of the American Federation of Labor. I do not say that his position has been wilfully misrepresented, but it has been incorrectly represented in this debate, and in justice to him and his organization I ask this privilege.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. I was the only person who made reference to him.

Mr. BANKHEAD. It is with reference to the statement of the gentleman from Massachusetts in the debate that I ask this privilege.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. I declined to allow it, because I simply spoke from memory. I am willing to have read into the RECORD what he said.

Mr. BANKHEAD. That is all I want to do.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. There is no objection to that.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Then I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by reading into the RECORD the question of the gentleman from Massachusetts and the reply of Mr. Wallace.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. The gentleman asked what he said. I stated what he said, intending to state what was true. If I made any misstatement of it—I do not think I did—it was made inadvertently. I have no objection to any correction of that statement, but I do not want the RECORD to be cluttered up with a lot of immaterial matter.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by incorporating therein the question asked by the gentleman from Massachusetts of the witness, Edgar Wallace, in the committee as to his attitude on this question and his reply thereto, only about 10 lines.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate upon this section and all amendments thereto do now close.

The motion was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

RAIL-OWNED WATER LINES.

SEC. 604. Paragraph (9) of section 5 of the interstate commerce act, as amended, is amended by striking out the period at the end thereof and inserting in lieu thereof a colon and the following: "Provided, That the foregoing provisions of this paragraph shall not apply in any case where such common carrier by water or such vessel is engaged exclusively (a) in trade (other than with foreign contiguous territory) not included in the coastwise trade, or (b) in trade between ports in the United States and ports in the Philippine Islands."

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois: Page 50, line 21, after the word "Islands," strike out the period, insert a comma in lieu thereof and the following language: "but this proviso shall not apply in any case where such common carrier by water or such vessel is engaged exclusively in trade upon any of the rivers or canals of the United States."

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I understand that there will be no objection to this?

Mr. EDMONDS. None at all. It was not intended that it should apply.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BRIGGS. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BRIGGS: Strike out all of lines 11 to 21, inclusive, on page 50.

Mr. BRIGGS. Mr. Chairman, this amendment would strike out the authorization for railroads to engage in overseas foreign trade. It is undoubtedly a distinct departure from the function of the railroads in this country. It brings the railroads into an entirely new field of operation. This law does not subject them any more, for that matter, than anyone else to any regulation of ocean rates. It permits them to enjoy the huge subsidies which are accorded other organizations of steamship companies, although to-day the railroads have favored legislation in the transportation act. It is my opinion, and I think it was very clearly the opinion of many of the witnesses who advocated the adoption of the subsidy, that the railroads ought not to be accorded the privilege of entering the ocean foreign trade.

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRIGGS. Yes.

Mr. EDMONDS. What privilege does this give the railroads that they do not enjoy at the present time?

Mr. BRIGGS. I do not think the railroads enjoy any such privilege; and if they do, I do not think this provision would be in this bill. If they have it without this provision, what objection can the gentleman have to the elimination of the provision?

Mr. EDMONDS. Simply for the reason that the second provision in the bill is the only thing of importance in it, and that is if the coastwise laws are applied to the Philippine Islands it will open up the lines crossing the Pacific to the Philippine Islands. There is nothing in the law to-day that prevents any railroad from having steamships in foreign trade.

Mr. BRIGGS. The gentleman and I disagreed in that all through the hearings. I think the very fact that provision is in the bill exempting them from passing through the Panama Canal indicates that they are now prevented from engaging in ocean trade business on the high seas. I do not believe it is good policy to sanction it now.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRIGGS. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Awhile ago I stated my belief that no member of the Interstate Commerce Commission or no representative of the commission was called before the committee that framed this bill to express any opinion about it. Is that correct?

Mr. BRIGGS. Not on this question.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. I will ask the gentleman whether any member or representative of the commission appeared before the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries?

Mr. BRIGGS. Not a member.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRIGGS. I will.

Mr. JONES of Texas. In connection with what the gentleman said, I would like to suggest that paragraph 9 of section 5, which this purports to amend, forbids any railroad owning stock in a shipping company engaged in water transportation through the Panama Canal or elsewhere.

Mr. BRIGGS. The railroads have no authority to engage in ocean foreign trade.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Under that act.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto do now close. I will modify my motion so as to have debate close in six minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the motion will be amended.

There was no objection.

The motion as amended was agreed to.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out section 604, and may I say to the chairman of the Committee on the Merchant Marine [Mr. EDMONDS] that he is very greatly mistaken if he has conceived the idea that I wish to drive the tramp service from the seas or cripple it. I want, and the Democratic Party which has spoken in caucus upon this bill wants, to build up this service and all service. A great many of the people whom I have the honor to represent here are interested particularly in the tramp service, as well as several splendid liner services, but it is a question with me whether or not it will be properly done under the terms of this bill.

I have studied this bill and listened very carefully to the arguments on this floor with the hope that it would be so amended that I could support it, because I do want to see this country establish a merchant marine in keeping with our position as one of the great world powers. I want our ships to pass into the hands of private ownership, and, above all, it is my desire to get this Government out of the shipping business as soon as possible.

It is a fundamental proposition that no business can be done as successfully operating under a statute as operating under the natural economic business laws and principles. I believe that American genius and industry can compete with that of any nation under conditions of equal opportunity. Therefore it occurs to me if this Congress would wipe from the statute books those shackles which it is claimed now handicap the American operator we can put the American flag upon every sea without a direct subsidy from the Federal Treasury.

Now, as to section 604, I would like to direct your attention to what some of the steamship owners have said, speaking through the Chamber of Commerce of Mobile, to the effect that not only this section but sections 602, 603, 604, and 607 should be eliminated from this bill. As to section 604, they say that it should either be stricken from the bill or so amended that the railroads can not own ships in competition with private steamship owners. They say in a resolution that they indorse the principles set forth in the bill, but appear to be somewhat troubled as to the effect of the sections just named. In accordance with their request to call attention to these sections I am going to ask unanimous consent to insert in my remarks a resolution they forwarded to me several months ago, as well as a letter from the chamber of commerce dealing more in detail with the only sections which appear objectionable to them.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McDUFFIE. I yield.

Mr. JONES of Texas. If this section 604 goes out of the bill, under the law as it now exists railroads owning stock in ships engaged in foreign trade their ships would be forbidden passing through the Panama Canal and elsewhere?

Mr. McDUFFIE. That is the proposition they are interested in. The resolution and letter are as follows:

MOBILE CHAMBER OF COMMERCE.

Resolution adopted July 5, 1922, by the Mobile Chamber of Commerce and ordered forwarded to the Alabama delegation in Congress:

"Whereas there is before the Congress of the United States H. R. 12021, known as the ship subsidy bill: Be it

Resolved, That the Mobile Chamber of Commerce indorses the principles set forth in this bill with the exception of sections 602, 603, 604, and 607; be it further

Resolved, That the Mobile Chamber of Commerce is of the opinion that sections 602, 603, 604, and 607 are inimical to the American steamship owners and have no place in this bill and should be stricken from same; be it further

Resolved, That copies of this resolution be sent to Alabama Representatives in Congress, with a request that they use their influence in carrying out the expressed desire of this organization."

I certify the above to be a correct copy of a resolution adopted by the Mobile Chamber of Commerce on July 5, 1922.

P. A. FENIMORE,
General Secretary.

MOBILE CHAMBER OF COMMERCE AND BUSINESS LEAGUE,
Mobile, Ala., July 11, 1922.

SHIP SUBSIDY BILL.

Hon. JOHN McDUFFIE,
House Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. McDUFFIE: I am transmitting to you a resolution on the ship subsidy bill, in which this organization expresses its opinion on certain sections which we regard as being detrimental to the American merchant marine. There are four sections—602, 603, 604, and 607—which appear to us as being an attempt by transcontinental rail lines to strangle water service via the Panama Canal.

Section 602 is regarded by our people as being particularly dangerous to the successful operation of established water routes, because of the authority given the joint committee, which it is proposed to set up, to establish the rates to be charged by coastwise lines operating under the American flag. It is our opinion that the Interstate Commerce Commission should not have jurisdiction over coastwise water rates via the Panama Canal, for the reason that they are charged with the responsibility of establishing rail rates that will guarantee the railroads a certain percentage of earnings on the valuation of railroad properties; therefore, the Interstate Commerce Commission can not be regarded as a neutral body as between the rail carriers and water carriers engaged in coastwise business. If the Congress deems it necessary to establish an authority in control of coastwise water rates, a commission should be created that is independent of any responsibility with reference to the rail lines.

Section 603, headed "Export bills of lading": Except for limitations in jurisdiction added by conferees to the transportation act, approved February 28, 1920, section 25 of the interstate commerce act would have authorized the Interstate Commerce Commission to prescribe the terms and provisions of the water portion of a through bill of lading in foreign trade, but only for American flag vessels. Recognizing that the Interstate Commerce Commission could not control a foreign ship operating extraterritorially, Congress limited the jurisdiction of the commission to the transportation which took place within the United States, thereby preventing the commission from exercising a control over United States vessels which they could not exercise over foreign-flag vessels, and the commission in issuing bills of lading instructions to railroad carriers has recognized the lack of jurisdiction to control the provisions of a water bill of lading. In spite of this, the Shipping Board by the section in the bill amending section 25 seeks to acquire for itself the authority to prescribe the bill of lading terms for vessels of the United States, though it can not acquire and exercise such authority over foreign-flag ships. The authority contained in section 603, if exercised by the board improperly or without due consideration of the foreign competition, would be so prejudicial to American vessels as to more than offset any benefits obtainable by such vessels under the bill. * * * The board now has control over the character of bill of lading on Shipping Board ships. As no good can come of section 603, and a great deal of harm might come of it, this section should be eliminated entirely.

Section 604 should be either stricken from the bill entirely or amended so that railroads can not own ships in competition with owners. The Panama Canal act of 1912 made it unlawful for railroads to operate ships via Panama Canal or otherwise. In the transportation act of 1920 an effort was made to amend the existing law so as to authorize the Interstate Commerce Commission to grant authority to railroad companies to operate vessels, notwithstanding the fact of competition or possibility of competition, if it deemed such operation to be in the public interest and not of a character to exclude, prevent, or reduce competition on the route by water under consideration.

This application for additional authority was rejected by Congress, then it was later introduced as a separate measure in the House and Senate, was referred to the committees of the House and Senate having control of interstate and foreign commerce, so that it evidently was the intent of Congress and of committees having charge of interstate commerce matters not to amend the Panama act so as to permit the railroads to operate ships in competition with themselves in any trade. The Shipping Board is now trying to originate this, subject only to the consideration of the Merchant Marine Committees, and without proper hearings by the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee of the House or the Interstate Commerce Committee of the Senate. The railroads are not at present restricted in their ownership of vessels in any trade with which their rail lines, or water lines owned by them, are not or may not be in competition. If railroads were permitted to own ships through the Panama Canal operating either from the Atlantic or Pacific they would then be in direct competition with themselves for business which now moves by rail lines and connecting water lines to foreign ports, and also with privately owned American ships operating direct from either coast through the canal to such foreign ports. Privately owned vessels of the United States now engaged in such trade would therefore be subjected by this section as it now reads not only to the competition by the joint rail-water route but the extended competition by ships—even foreign ships—which this provision of the law would authorize the railroads to own and operate in competition with them through the Panama Canal or elsewhere except in the few trades. We therefore feel that this section should either be killed entirely or so restricted that railroads could not own vessels in trades competitive with the railroads.

This organization has obtained an opinion from all of the steamship operators at this port on the sections to which objection is made in the resolution. The maritime interests here are unanimous in declaring that in their opinion these sections should be eliminated from the ship subsidy bill and that any attempt to make additional amendments along the same lines should be opposed by those who favor the upbuilding of an American merchant marine with Government aid.

We ask you to give the resolution and the reasons that inspired its adoption your most careful consideration, and trust your study of the sections to which your attention is called will convince you they are dangerous to the main object of the bill and should be stricken from it.

Yours very truly,

MOBILE CHAMBER OF COMMERCE,
P. A. FENIMORE, Secretary.

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Chairman, when this paragraph came to us for consideration I wrote to Attorney General Daugherty and received a letter from Assistant Attorney General Goff in which he stated that any railroad company that wanted to own ships in the foreign trade could do so; there was nothing in the law to prevent them. A ship that goes through the Panama Canal between the Atlantic and Pacific will not come under this section. It was really placed in with the idea that trade between the ports of the United States and ports of the Philippine Islands, should the Philippine Islands come under the coastwise law, would be left open to the ships which were receiving compensation. The reason for that is, of course, the Philippine Islands are several thousand miles away from the coast of this country, and we are under the necessity of giving sufficient compensation. I can not see any particular objection to its passing, and I am sure it does not do any damage to traffic through the Panama Canal, though gentlemen seem to fear that we are coming into competition with the coastwise trade.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn, and the vote recurs on the motion of the gentleman from Texas to strike out the section.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced the yeas appeared to have it.

Mr. BRIGGS. Division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee again divided; and there were—yeas 20, noes 60.

So the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

AGREEMENTS BETWEEN CARRIERS AFFECTING WATER TRANSPORTATION.

SEC. 605. Section 15 of the shipping act, 1916, is amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 15. (a) That every common carrier by water, or other person subject to this act, shall file immediately with the board a true copy, or, if oral, a true and complete memorandum, of every agreement with another such carrier or other person subject to this act, or modification or cancellation thereof, to which it may be a party or conform in whole or in part, fixing or regulating transportation rates or fares; giving or receiving special rates, accommodations, or other special privileges or advantages; controlling, regulating, preventing, or destroying competition; pooling or apportioning earnings, losses, or traffic; allotting ports or restricting or otherwise regulating the number and character of sailings between ports; limiting or regulating in any way the volume or character of freight or passenger traffic to be carried; providing warehousing, docking, or other terminal facilities; providing that the one carrier shall act in any manner as agent or representative of the other carrier; or in any manner providing for an exclusive, preferential, or cooperative working arrangement.

"(b) Every common carrier by water shall file immediately with the board a true copy, or, if oral, a true and complete memorandum, of every agreement with a common carrier by railroad subject to the provisions of the interstate commerce act, as amended, or modification or cancellation thereof, to which it may be a party or conform in whole or in part, relating to the interchange of freight or passengers, or the making of joint or through rates, or providing warehousing, docking, or other terminal facilities, or providing that the one carrier shall act in any manner as agent or representative of the other carrier, or in any manner providing for a cooperative working arrangement between the two carriers. In all such cases the common carrier by railroad shall also have a like duty. The provisions of this subdivision shall apply only to agreements relating to passengers or property transported or to be transported to or from a foreign country or the Philippine Islands from or to a port or other place in the United States.

"(c) The term 'agreement' as used in this section includes understandings, conferences, and other arrangements.

"(d) The board may by order disapprove, cancel, or modify any agreement, or any modification or cancellation thereof, whether or not previously approved by it, that it finds to be unjustly discriminatory or unfair as between carriers, shippers, exporters, importers, or ports, or between exporters from the United States and their foreign competitors, or to operate to the detriment of the commerce of the United States, or to be in violation of law, or to be otherwise detrimental to the interest and welfare of the United States, and shall approve all other agreements, modifications, or cancellations.

"(e) Agreements existing at the time of the enactment of the merchant marine act, 1922, shall be lawful until disapproved by the board. It shall be unlawful to carry out any agreement or any portion thereof, disapproved by the board.

"(f) All agreements, modifications, or cancellations, made after the enactment of the merchant marine act, 1922, shall be lawful only when and as long as approved by the board, and before approval or after disapproval it shall be unlawful to carry out in whole or in part, directly or indirectly, any such agreement, modification, or cancellation.

"(g) Every agreement, modification, or cancellation, lawful under this section, shall be excepted from the provisions of the act entitled 'An act to protect trade and commerce against unlawful restraints and monopolies,' approved July 2, 1890, and amendments thereof and acts supplementary thereto, and the provisions of section 73 to 77, both inclusive, of the act entitled 'An act to reduce taxation, to provide revenue for the Government, and for other purposes,' approved August 27, 1894, and amendments thereof and acts supplementary thereto.

"(h) Whoever violates any provision of this section shall be liable to a penalty of $1,000 for each day such violation continues, to be recovered by the United States in a civil action."

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I think the minority have only about a half dozen additional amendments to offer, and I understand the purpose of the committee is to meet at 11 o'clock to-morrow, and I think we might adjourn now and get through certainly in an hour or in a short while in the morning.

Mr. MONDELL. If the gentleman will allow me, it was thought that we would read down to the bottom of page 56, miscellaneous provisions.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. I think we can get through in an hour's time to-morrow.

Mr. MONDELL. Has the gentleman anything to offer to this section?

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. MONDELL. More than one?

Mr. HARDY of Texas. We have gotten down to Title VI.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. I have one amendment to the section just read.

Mr. MONDELL. We will give the gentleman time to discuss that, but I would like to get down to Title VII.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Then we will meet at 12 o'clock to-morrow?

Mr. MONDELL. I think we might meet at 11.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. I have no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee: Page 53, line 15, strike out subsection (g).

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Now, gentlemen, the subsection which I propose to strike out is another instance where the general law is changed, and this is a remarkable instance of it, because this section exempts ship lines and railroads from the operations of the antitrust law. Now, listen to a reading of the provision I propose to strike out:

"(g) Every agreement, modification, or cancellation, lawful under this section, shall be excepted from the provisions of the act entitled 'An act to protect trade and commerce against unlawful restraints and monopolies,' approved July 2, 1890, and amendments thereof and acts supplementary thereto, and the provisions of sections 73 to 77, both inclusive, of the act entitled 'An act to reduce taxation, to provide revenue for the Government, and for other purposes,' approved August 27, 1894, and amendments thereof and acts supplementary thereto.

Now, why should these railroads and why should these ship lines be excepted from the provisions of the antitrust laws?

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. EDMONDS. The original shipping act of 1916 was drawn up by gentlemen on that side of the House, and this section was in there.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Well, why are you wanting to enact it here, then?

Mr. EDMONDS. Why do you not ask the gentleman who then prepared it?

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. I was not here then, and you can not charge me with the responsibility. Whether it was the law or not, it ought not to be reenacted.

Mr. EDMONDS. I was here, and I am perfectly willing to accept the responsibility, so far as that is concerned.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. I am not discussing the question of who are responsible for it. I am discussing the merits of the proposition, and I am against it, no matter whether everybody on both sides favor it, because I do not think there is any occasion for such a provision at this time exempting ship lines and connecting railroads from the operation of the antitrust laws. [Applause.]

Mr. SEARS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the Record.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Florida asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the Record. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. DAVIS].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the Record.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maryland asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the Record. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. I do that simply for the purpose of asking the gentleman from Pennsylvania a question. I would like to ask the gentleman to look at subsection (d) on page 52. It refers to quite an important matter. It gives authority to the Shipping Board to do certain things that may involve very important questions without providing at all for any hearings in advance. Is that not very unusual and extraordinary, in analogy, for instance, to proceedings before the Interstate Commerce Commission?

Mr. EDMONDS. I do not understand what the gentleman is getting at.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Subsection (d), on page 52, specifies certain powers may be exercised. It appears that those powers may be exercised summarily and without any advance hearing. It seems to me there ought to be some provision enabling parties to be heard.

Mr. EDMONDS. I think that there is a section that arranges for a hearing, or else the act of 1916 does. I think it applies to this.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. I doubt if the gentleman will find it so.

Mr. EDMONDS. We were very careful in drawing the act of 1916. It was the original act constituting the Shipping Board, and the matters of hearings and appeals were all attended to in that act in another section.

The CHAIRMAN. The pro forma amendment will be withdrawn. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

JOINT OR PROPORTIONAL RATES.

SEC. 607. Section 28 of the merchant marine act 1920 is amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 28. (a) That no common carrier shall charge, collect, or receive for transportation subject to the interstate commerce act as amended of passengers or property under any joint rate, fare, or charge, or under any export, import, or other proportional rate, fare, or charge which is based in whole or in part on the fact that the passengers or property affected thereby are to be transported to or have been transported from any port in a possession or dependency of the United States or in a foreign country by a carrier by water in foreign commerce any lower rate, fare, or charge than that charged, collected, or received by it for the transportation of passengers or of a like kind of property for the same distance, in the same direction, and over the same route in connection with commerce wholly within the United States unless the vessel so transporting such passengers or property is, or unless it was at the time of such transportation by water, documented under the laws of the United States.

"(b) Whenever the board is of the opinion, however, that adequate shipping facilities to or from any port in a possession or dependency of the United States or a foreign country are not afforded by vessels so documented it shall certify this fact to the Interstate Commerce Commission, and the commission shall by order suspend temporarily the operation of the provisions of this section with respect to the rates, fares, and charges for the transportation by rail of passengers and property transported from or to be transported to such ports.

"(c) Such suspension of operation of the provisions of this section shall be terminated upon 30 days' notice given in accordance with the requirements of section 6 of the interstate commerce act as amended by order of the commission whenever the board is of the opinion that adequate shipping facilities by such vessels to or from such ports are afforded and so certifies to the commission.

"(d) Whenever the board and the commission are both of opinion and certify that putting into effect or keeping in effect the provisions of this section will result in unjust discrimination between ports of the United States on commerce accustomed to move through such ports or in materially changing the channels of transportation within the United States or in unduly congesting one or more of the ports of the United States, the commission shall by order suspend the operation of said provisions until such time as it and the board reach a contrary conclusion in the premises, whereupon such suspension shall by order be terminated by the commission upon 30 days' notice as hereinbefore provided for the termination of other suspensions."

Mr. BRIGGS. Mr. Chairman, I want to offer an amendment correcting an error there.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BRIGGS: Page 56, line 11, strike out the word "on" and insert the word "or."

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Chairman, I accept that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will be agreed to.

There was no objection.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. I will ask the attention of the gentleman from Pennsylvania to subsection (d), on page 56. Suppose that the Shipping Board and the Interstate Commerce Commission disagree as to the situation their inquiry relates to in any given case. Who is to reconcile the disagreement?

Mr. EDMONDS. They will have to agree before they can operate.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Then that puts us in this position: The Interstate Commerce or the Shipping Board may be of opinion that there is a discrimination affecting some locality or affecting some business interest; the other body may take the negative view. The two bodies being in disagreement, there is no provision made at all for getting them together.

Mr. EDMONDS. We presume that they will agree.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. But you assume that they may not agree by drawing the provision as it stands. You say that no action shall be taken unless they agree. If they do not agree, then no action can be taken.

Mr. EDMONDS. That is true.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. I suggest to the gentleman that he try to find some way of relieving that provision of the obvious difficulty that it creates.

Mr. EDMONDS. It does not become effective. What you desire to accomplish is not accomplished because they do not agree.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. But still there may be a discrimination in fact. If one of those bodies finds that there is some very gross discrimination, the other body may say no; and there is no possibility at all of the matter being further dealt with.

Mr. EDMONDS. Until they agree, that is true.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn.

There was no objection.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks on this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

Mr. YATES. Mr. Chairman, I make the same request.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

Mr. BOX. Mr. Chairman, I make the same request.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

The extensions of remarks referred to are here printed in full as follows:

Mr. FESS. Mr. Speaker, we have now reached the place of decision on whether our Nation will take the necessary steps to become an American merchant marine power or whether we will lapse back to what I regard as an indefensible position which we held prior to the World War to depend upon foreign nations to carry our overseas commerce.

The first decision is whether we shall scrap our war-built ships, sell them to foreign countries, or, on the other hand, remain on the sea. If we decide to abandon the sea, that ends the discussion. If we decide, as I think we should, to remain on the sea, then the choice, and the only choice, left us is to continue Government ownership and operation as we now are suffering or adopt the policy of Government aid as proposed by this bill. If there is any other method, let the opponents of this measure present it.

For over a half century we have witnessed the most wonderful industrial, financial, and commercial development of all history under the direction of American managerial ability. If the way were open to the unaided operation of an American merchant marine under our flag without surrendering our standards of labor, is it conceivable that our business acumen would not have discovered and utilized it? The failure of our country to enter and hold this field of activity in the light of our history and under our navigation laws is the one outstanding error which should have long ago been corrected and which we now propose to correct by this measure.

Mr. Speaker, the development of the American Government and its institutions is the greatest event in the history of modern civilization, easily the greatest contribution to the history of political science. The progress of the Nation during its national existence has no parallel. Its normal growth and its present rank is the most outstanding event of modern times.

This rank does not consist of extent of territory, numbers of people, or merely natural resources. There are other countries vastly greater in territory, more populous, and richer in fertility of soil.

Its rank is due to the character of her people, her system of government, and her institutions developed under that government. Her greatness, like that of any other great country, is not a commodity value and can not be estimated by material standards alone. Even if measured by that standard, she would stand first in all the world. She is first in agriculture, transportation, manufacturing, mining, fiscal ability, managerial ability, and skilled labor. She produces 20 per cent of the world's gold, 25 per cent of the world's wheat, 40 per cent of the world's iron and steel, 40 per cent of the world's lead, 40 per cent of the world's silver, 50 per cent of the world's zinc, 52 per cent of the world's coal, 60 per cent of the world's copper, 60 per cent of the world's cotton, 70 per cent of the world's oil, 75 per cent of the world's corn. We operate 40 per cent of the world's railroads, refine 80 per cent of the world's copper, and manufacture 85 per cent of the world's automobiles.

The business agencies of the country have invaded every field open to her save the merchant marine. Up to the Civil War she occupied that field, but since that period she has gradually neglected it, and has left it to other countries, especially to Great Britain, the greatest marine power of all history.

No evolution is of greater interest than that which brought Britain to her present position on the sea. When America was discovered Portugal was the mistress of the sea and carried the world's commerce. In due time she gave way to Spain, which in turn became not only the world's greatest maritime power but likewise the world's greatest colonizer.

After the passing of the Spanish armada the sun of Spain's supremacy began to set. For a time the control of the sea went to the Netherlands and later to France. In 1688 England's contest for the sea began. It continued 127 years, during which period 12 wars were waged between France and England, and 64 years of actual fighting were endured, when in 1815 at Waterloo, Napoleon's star set, and France surrendered the sea to her great rival.

During the past 100 years Britain has given heed to the development of the world's greatest merchant marine in the creation of the most wonderful maritime organization of history. This followed as a natural consequence of a colonization power whose possessions are in every quarter of the globe, and whose commercial interests are coterminous with the continents. Her ports are found wherever commerce is carried on, and her language is spoken wherever her white sails of commerce appear.

The essential elements of a complete merchant marine are merchant ships, shipyards, open ports, coaling stations, cables, and naval equipment, both matériel and personnel. To these were added a naval equipment double the next largest. Besides these integral elements of a merchant marine there must also be an organization of industry, trade, and ocean shipping which in turn requires an organization of merchandising, international banking, marine insurance, and ship brokerage. The immediate necessity requires construction, maintenance, and operation, all of which demands a distinctive policy of ownership as well as operation.

Year by year this sea power continued to perfect her position until she could easily command the overseas trade of the world, which marked her chief activity, not less than 80 per cent of it. On the other hand the United States devoted her energies to domestic development, to her power of production and consumption. Her home market was paramount, and the overseas trade was secondary, and consequently our merchant marine not so important. In due time our productiveness outran our consumption and our overseas trade, both imports and exports, became important. To-day that trade amounts to over $7,000,000,000, which has shown a very large and steady growth. If it continues to increase in the future as it has in the past, and it doubtless will, our overseas trade is bound to become an increasingly important feature of our country's prosperity, and such as to emphasize the necessity and importance of our carrying trade.

The country will not be satisfied to pursue the policy to leave the delivery of our overseas trade to other countries; not now, especially since we have our war-time built ships of nearly 10,000,000 tonnage. Even before we had built the ships under the stress of war, it had become a well-defined American conviction that both our national defense and commercial necessities demanded an American merchant marine operated under the American flag and by American citizens.

That conviction produced in the Spanish-American War and increased by later incidents was many times deepened by the experience in the World War, too recent and too apparent to call for comment. Our national defense leaves no doubt about our national duty toward a merchant marine.

Then, in addition to this broad general view, the results of the arms conference, which fix the ratio of naval armament, compel notice to the necessity of merchantmen which in war time could and would be converted into auxiliaries. If fighting power in equipment is equal between nations, and one of the powers is vastly superior to the other in merchantmen, equal ratio of naval power is a nullity. The defense necessity leaves us little choice of whether we should be on the sea.

Then a growing country like this with its commerce increasing by leaps and bounds should not languish by its refusal or neglect to embrace its duty to utilize its energies in the direction of the sea. The policy of employing its competitors to carry or deliver its goods is unwise, unnecessary, and short-sighted, especially since we have the ships, the capital, and labor, and all necessary factors to operate a sound business enterprise.

An American merchant marine sufficient to carry our overseas trade will invest millions of American capital in the employment of hundreds of thousands of American laborers in American shipyards for constructive and repair work and on the American-built ships that will float the seven seas. These in turn will make necessary the employment of additional American capital and labor in our mining and manufacturing activities, and in turn will increase the demand for the product of the American farm in the degree that such increase will add to the consumptive power at home and multiply the facilities for getting surplus product to the market abroad. Every step that will increase the employment of our labor will increase the buying power to the country, and to that degree will add to the demand of the product of the American farm. Herein lie the direct benefits of an American merchant marine to the American farmer, no matter in what portion of the country he lives. What he needs after he has raised his crop is to find a market for what he has to sell. This market will consist of the buying power of those not engaged in farming.

An American merchant marine is not alone of value to the people engaged in it. It serves a good purpose to every industry that supplies the necessities for its operation, the farmer no less than the manufacturer.

Whatever might have been our policy in the past of going on the sea, that is not now the question. We are already on the sea. As has been stated here again and again, we have 1,442 steel ships, of which only 338 are actually in operation, leaving 1,104 tied up at the wharves at considerable cost and actually deteriorating.

The construction of these ships by the Government at war prices to meet an emergency left them on our hands when the war ended. Their cost was so enormous that great loss is inevitable, no matter what is done with them. The best possible thing to do with them, it seemed, rather than to junk them or to sacrifice them, was to operate them by the Government in an effort to build up the needed American merchant marine. This policy was an experiment, an experiment that showed a loss of $200,000,000 per year, an experiment that approaches a scandal of management. The Shipping Board under the present management undertook to reduce this loss. After a year's most tireless efforts the loss has been reduced to about $50,000,000 per year, with less than a third of the fleet in use, a loss which does not include repairs or depreciation, and which means that the fleet on such basis of operation will in time be a total loss. This experience shows that there is no better settled fact than that Government operation is not only wickedly wasteful but inefficient in service and woefully deficient in all the elements of business success. Unlike irresponsible political operation, the private owner who bears the loss of inefficient service feels the responsibility of meeting the competition of his rivals in avoiding the losses incident to empty return bottoms by seeking return cargoes. While the responsible private owner is spurred to economize, the Government bears the loss out of the Treasury, as no individual will be made to feel it, since it is paid through general taxation. The fallacy that if the Government pays it no one is hurt is unfortunately widely accepted.

To continue Government operation involves a policy of waste, of unnecessary losses, which would involve the worst sort of subsidy, in that it would be placing burdens upon the Treasury without the return of compensatory results due to effective and efficient service, which can be assured under private responsibility.

Commercially Government operation is a failure. American business abroad as at home depends upon the talent of organization of industry and trade rather than political activity. As business enterprise actuated by the sense of profit and success is primarily individual and private, not governmental, so developing trade abroad is private rather than political. The function of government is to open the way for enterprise and then permit business ability to develop the trade and industry, both at home and abroad, including the merchant marine. Political or governmental ownership and operation of a merchant marine is not to be thought of if it can be avoided.

No further comment against Government operation is needed than the sheer difficulty of discontinuing any Government agency when once created, even for war purposes. Our struggle to dismantle the war machine is comment sufficient upon this fact. It is admitted on all hands that there is a strong paternalistic, socialistic, Government-ownership propaganda now at work among us. The sentiment is here in Congress. The tremendous effort to prevent the return of the railroads to their owners is a mere incident. The argument heard in this debate against subsidy is Government-ownership sentiment clothed in the prejudice against successful business operation. That is a peculiar cycle of thinking which causes certain types of mind to see in every outstanding business success a crime against the people. The achievement of men and women, once the shining examples to whom we called the attention of our youth, under this new cult have now become an object of derision, a level to be shunned rather than to be reached. It is this prejudice that feeds Government-ownership sentiment. I am stressing this phase of this contest because of what it involves.

We are facing a condition which admits of but two alternatives—conceding the unwisdom of abandoning the sea either by scrapping our ships or selling them to foreign countries. The alternatives are either continued Government ownership and operation or some plan as herein proposed in this bill.

To me the first alternative is not to be looked upon with any favor whatever. The second alternative is not only the wiser course but the only one open to us; it is the one successful solution as I see it of a very important problem. It is Government aid to maintain an American merchant marine. Call it a subsidy if you will. That is nothing new. We have given Government aid to the building of the great trunk lines connecting the East with the West. While it was attacked in the same terms we now hear employed in this debate, few, if any, of our citizens will to-day question the wisdom of that policy for developing that undeveloped country. This was a direct subsidy as much as this bill proposes.

We have given Government aid in the hundreds of millions to improvements in rivers and harbors and in the construction of highways. We are in the midst of such policy of internal improvements. It may be of importance to remember that the Democratic Party consistently opposed the platform of internal improvements prior to the Civil War, making its opposition a cardinal principle of action. Since the war Government aid has become a cardinal virtue of the same party and is now sought for all sorts of local interests.

The Republican Party has ever stood for a Government policy of building up and maintaining American industry through a protective tariff. We have protected our labor against the open competition of a cheaper scale of wage to maintain American standards of living. The monuments of this policy are all about us in the awakened industry of the country, where we rank first in all that can be produced by labor. But not so on the high seas. Our law so effective within our national boundaries is totally impotent on the high seas, open to our competitors as to ourselves. We can say to all countries upon what conditions they may buy and sell within our borders, but not so on the open seas. There their authority is equal to our own. American labor can be secure in its wage scale within the domain of American law, but not beyond that domain. American labor can not be driven from employment by open foreign competition where our law forbids such open competition. But it can and is driven from employment on the open sea where our law does not or can not extend its protection. This is why we maintain our standards within the country and keep our industry going. It is also the reason why we can maintain our coastwise shipping, because we forbid the foreign vessel entering that service.

Did we open that service to the foreign competitor as we are compelled to do on the high seas, we would be driven from the coastwise trade just as we are now driven from the overseas trade or left to the alternative of reducing our labor to the scale of that of our competitor, which is against a sound American policy. The present situation of our merchant marine is a comment upon that fact.

As the purchaser will buy in the cheapest market, so will the shipper ship in the cheapest bottom. As our higher standards and higher costs can not compete with the lower standards and costs of our foreign competitors in manufacturing and agricultural pursuits, neither can American standards of labor compete on the open sea with foreign standards.

Capital announces that it can compete on the sea if our Nation will repeal its navigation restrictive laws designed to maintain American standards on the sea. But our country will decline to abandon our standards. No sensible person will hold that American genius, business acumen, if allowed the freedom to do so unhindered by legal regulations in the employment of labor, could not go on the sea and succeed. If success under the present situation were possible, there is no doubt that we would have had a great American merchant marine. But the higher level of costs prevailing in America made it necessary for us to either reduce our levels to that of our foreign competitors or leave the sea as a merchant-marine power of those competitors. The latter course was inevitable so far as overseas trade went.

Mr. Speaker, during the debate on the tariff we had presented the relative scale of wages between our country and foreign countries. It is not necessary for me now to append a general comparison supplied at that time. The facts are well known to the public, but I will now present comparisons to show the wages paid in the shipping business, both in construction and operation. There have been so many misstatements by the opposition to this bill, tending to show that our scale of wages is not higher than our competitors, that I present these figures comparing our scale with that of England, the highest wage country on the sea outside of our own. I will also add some tables showing the wages of other countries. A glance will show why American shipping is driven from the sea in open competition with the world of cheaper operation:

Mr. Speaker, the foregoing facts leave no doubt as to the cause of the disappearance from the sea of the American flag. They show the real purpose of the present bill, which is a subsidy to labor to equalize the difference in cost, as I stated in my opening remarks. These facts answer the persistent inquiry why this country, whose material progress has been the standing wonder of all history, with its overseas trade out-ranked only by its domestic commerce, has not adopted the policy of at least carrying its own goods in its own vessels, operated under its flag. This field is destined to be an increasing one and would inevitably attract capital and American genius if the way were open.

The vast difference in cost of (1) construction, (2) maintenance, and (3) operation between our standards and those of our competitors leaves nothing further to be said upon our disappearance from the sea. Shall we repeat all our navigation and protective laws, enacted to preserve the higher standards of labor, in order to compete for the trade at lower cost? Shall we permit the American flag to fly over a merchant marine operated by Asiatics or coolie labor? To ask the question is to answer it. Of course, we will not do this. Shall we continue to operate the industry by the Government running them on the higher cost level and appropriate from the Treasury the losses sustained, which can never be definite, but which must be both inefficient and wasteful, as demonstrated by our recent experiences? So far as I am concerned, I shall oppose this alternative which is pressed by the opponents of the only other plan now open.

The plan here proposed, as I see it, is the only solution. There is no other alternative if we decide to remain on the sea. It is either abandon all hopes of an American merchant marine altogether or continue the Government operation with all of its possibilities of business disintegration, or else adopt some plan as proposed by this bill of Government aid.

The opponents of this bill satisfy themselves by mere opposition. They offer not a single constructive proposal. They even deny the most patent fact that they are for a merchant marine on the one hand, and on the other are not for Government operation of it. This statement is in the face of a gradual disappearance of our flag from the sea, and in the light of the most obvious reasons for that disappearance I am supporting the measure as a wise economic policy to conserve American enterprise of labor and capital in the interest of our people. Time will prove this contention if the bill becomes a law.

Mr. YATES. Mr. Speaker, I had at one time some doubt as to whether I ought to vote for this so-called ship subsidy bill, but that doubt has been removed. It was almost entirely removed by the President's address. A rereading and study of that address reduced the doubt. And the amendments which have been made during the debate, and for which I was glad to vote, have reduced the doubt still further—reduced it to a minimum. The striking out of the exemptions from income tax, the striking out of the word "permanent" before the appropriation provisions, the striking out of the provision exempting the shipping authority from supervision by the accounting authority of the Government, so improved the bill that I do not believe that the Government or Nation can possibly lose more money by the proposed subsidy, or Government-aid arrangement, than it is now losing per annum, namely, $50,000,000 per annum, which, by the way, is an actual and substantial subsidy in effect if ever there was a subsidy in the history of any nation.

Only one objection remains, and that is: Will somebody make too much money; will it amount to a raid on the Treasury by some big corporation? It seems to me the answer to that is this: We should not, can not vote down a good and substantial public benefit because occasionally somebody may make more money under it than his just share. Inevitably somebody makes more money than his just share when we legislate.

This happens when we legislate for protection (by tariffs) of American industry and labor, or for railroads, or good roads, or aerial roads, or express, or for bridges, or rivers, or harbors, or public buildings, or post offices, or for science, or lighthouses, or health, and hospitals and hygiene, or for education.

That objection is, I think, far outweighed by the fact that this act will aid the national defense—aid us not to make war, but to avert war.

In his address to a joint session of the Senate and House of Representatives Mr. Harding set forth in clear and precise language a forceful argument for the bill, based almost wholly on economic grounds. He made no attempt to sway his auditors with fine phrases; he made no appeal to the emotions; it was a simply worded, carefully thought out presentation of a situation which the President regards as perhaps the most critical, so far as the commercial destinies of the Nation are concerned, that the American people have ever faced.

Early in his address the President frankly admitted that he understood fully the opposition that confronted the administration's desires, and then he proceeded to try to convince the Congress that enactment of the merchant marine legislation was essential to the promotion of the national welfare. As a simple problem in finance, the President declared that passage of the bill would mean a saving of millions of dollars and prevent the sacrifice of many millions more in national capital already invested.

We are now dealing with a policy founded on theory; we have a problem which is one of grim actuality—

The President asserted—

We are facing insistent conditions, out of which will come either additional and staggering Government losses and national impotence on the seas or else the unfurling of the flag on a great American merchant marine commensurate with our commercial importance to serve as carrier of our cargoes in peace and to meet the necessities of our defense in war.

The high points of the message are as follows:

I have come to ask you to relieve the responsible administrative branch of the Government from a program upon which failure and hopelessness and staggering losses are written for every page, and let us turn to a program of assured shipping to serve us in war and to give guaranty to our commercial independence in peace.

I am not asking authorization of a new and added draft on the Public Treasury; I am appealing for a program to diminish the burden we are already bearing.

Three courses are open—constructive, obstructive, and destructive. I ask the constructive course.

It would seem to be doubly humiliating when we own ships and fail in the genius and capacity to turn their prows toward the marts of the world.

It is unbelievable that the American people, or the Congress which expresses their power, will consent to surrender and destruction.

I challenge every insinuation of favored interests and the enrichment of the special few at the expense of the Public Treasury. I am appealing to save the Treasury.

I think it loftier statesmanship to support and commend a policy designed to effect the large good of the Nation than merely to record the too hasty impressions of a constituency.

"Government aid" would be a fairer term than "subsidy" in defining what we are seeking to do for our merchant marine.

The President declared it was not a question of adding new Treasury burdens or of contracting an outlay to support merchant shipping, because the Nation already is paying dearly; but he insisted that he appealed for a program to diminish the burden already weighing heavily. He epitomized his argument in this language:

When the question is asked, Why the insistence for the merchant marine act now? the answer is apparent. Waiving every inspiration which lies in a constructive plan for maintaining our flag on the commercial highways of the seas, waiving the prudence in safeguarding against another $3,000,000,000 madness if war ever again impels, we have the unavoidable task of wiping out a $50,000,000 annual loss in operation and losses aggregating many hundreds of millions in worn-out, sacrificed, or scrapped shipping.

Then the supreme humiliation, the admission that the United States—our America, once eminent among the maritime nations of the world—is incapable of asserting itself in peace triumphs on the seas of the world. It would seem to me doubly humiliating when we own the ships and fail in the genius and capacity to turn their prows toward the marts of the world.

I call your attention to the fact that in the above statements the President talks economic things. He does not dwell on war; he mentions war only twice; but I imagine he had possible war in his mind all the time. Not that he wants war—not that. He does not want war; nor do you; nor do I. But I believe war will come. Everyone whom I know who has visited Europe or Asia believes there will be more wars. Wars have not ceased upon the face of the earth. The era of universal peace has not dawned. The millennium is not here. God will have to change the natures of men before wars cease. Nations will fight—intelligent peoples will fight to be free. Wars can be postponed and averted. The gloriously clean and noble Army of America did not go to France in vain. Its valor will keep the kings and emperors, the sultans and czars and mikados off of us for many years, perhaps a generation, perhaps until 1950. Doubtful; but we must not again be caught unprepared. Next time we will not have the British fleet to protect us and transport us. We must buy unless we have built. Let us build. I will wager all I possess that the President had all this in mind. I have voted for an adequate Army, for an adequate Navy, for adequate railroad and dirt-roads transportation, for adequate service and health and education; but it is all in vain unless we can in sudden war be prepared on the sea.

Certain communications from certain of my constituents whose opinions and observations I invoked by writing to them are so illuminating and interesting that I add them here. I particularly and specifically agree with the present mayor of Chicago, the Hon. William Hale Thompson, who believes that every man and woman and child in the State of Illinois will be benefited by Government aid to American shipping; that it would help every farmer and every business man and every manufacturing concern; that the delivery of our products in foreign markets under the American flag will increase our export business and thereby increase the demand for labor.

[From the Mayor of Chicago.]

CHICAGO, ILL., November 27, 1922.

HON. RICHARD YATES,
Member of Congress, Washington, D. C.:

Your telegram with reference to ship subsidy bill received. I believe a vote for the ship subsidy bill is a vote for every man, woman, and child in the State of Illinois. I believe it would help every farmer, every business man, and every manufacturing concern. The delivery of our products in foreign markets under the American flag will increase our export business and thereby increase the demand for labor. To permit our ships, which the people have paid for, to rot would be a calamity, and, as pointed out by the President, they can ultimately be turned into a profitable institution rather than a terrific loss. My forefathers were clipper-ship owners and masters for three generations.

My father went to sea before the mast on an American clipper at 16 years of age and finished his seafaring life as a lieutenant commander in Farragut's squadron at the close of the Civil War, and I have heard many, many times from his lips of the great loss to our people and our country on account of our Government's lack of support of our merchant marine. I am glad the opportunity presents itself and I hope you may see your way clear to support the President in this important matter.

WILLIAM HALE THOMPSON, Mayor.

[From two employers of labor.]

CHICAGO, ILL., November 27, 1922.

HON. RICHARD YATES,
Member of Congress, Washington, D. C.:

As I come in contact with the opinion here, it seems to largely favor the subsidy for an adequate merchant marine. A powerful and efficient United States merchant marine prior to the war would have saved this country billions of dollars during the war. The preservation of peace, the ability to victoriously defend ourselves in war, and at the same time make possible the development of our great opportunity in the export business compels me to believe that the ship subsidy bill should become a law.

JOHN G. SHEDD,
President of Marshall Field & Co.

CHICAGO, ILL., November 27, 1922.

HON. RICHARD YATES,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.:

Have read President's message. Think we should all stand with him on subsidy bill. We have been wrong on ship legislation for more than 70 years. Many experiments have been tried and failed. We have not tried subsidy plan, which gave British mastery of the seas. We should do so.

B. E. SUNNY,
President Chicago Telephone Co.

[From John H. Walker, president Illinois Federation of Labor.]
SPRINGFIELD, ILL., November 27, 1922.

HON. RICHARD YATES,
Congressman at Large from Illinois,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.:

Telegram received. I am advised that the evils contained in the bill more than outweigh any benefits that might be derived through it. However, the ship subsidy bill is national legislation. The American Federation of Labor represents the labor movement on national legislative matters. I am so engrossed with State matters that I have not been able to give sufficient time to get all the details. With reference to the ship subsidy bill, I am wiring President Gompers to give you all information on that matter from labor's point of view.

J. H. WALKER.

[From a great churchman and well-known labor advocate.]

CHICAGO, ILL., November 27, 1922.

HON. RICHARD YATES,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.:

I strongly favor ship subsidy bill. America now has unparalleled opportunity to create merchant marine which will make and keep her one of foremost commercial nations of the world. In my judgment, to neglect the opportunity would be lack of highest statesmanship. I urge you to vote for the bill.

BISHOP THOMAS NICHOLSON.

[From a veteran editor.]

CHICAGO, ILL., November 27, 1922.

HON. RICHARD YATES,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.:

I am able to give you the most positive assurance that the sentiment of the West is strongly against the ship subsidy. Your constituents, particularly the farming element, are aggressively opposed to the contemplated raid on the Federal Treasury, and the President's special message in defense of it fell flat. The campaign of extensive propaganda, which has been pouring like a torrent into every newspaper office in the country, has utterly failed to convince the people that this iniquitous measure will in any manner benefit the West, which already is tottering under the burden of enormous Federal, State, and municipal taxation.

JOHN C. EASTMAN,
Editor Chicago Daily Journal.

[From a surgeon interested in public affairs.]

CHICAGO, ILL., November 27, 1922.

HON. RICHARD YATES,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.:

I believe in the constructive policy of our President. In my opinion, without a subsidy our merchant marine will become practically nil. Capital can not compete with the cheap labor on foreign ships. I believe the Nation will be benefited far in excess of the amount granted. Whether the ship subsidy will be popular I can not say, as I have heard opinions pro and con.

B. M. ROSS, M. D.

Mr. BOX. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House. In connection with what I said in the House during the discussion of this bill, which was limited by lack of time, I extend my remarks concerning the same in the RECORD for the purpose of further recording my objection to the measure and giving an abridged statement of some of the many reasons for my opposition to it.

The sponsors of this measure claim that by its passage we would exchange the heavier burden of expense the Shipping Board and its activities impose for the lighter load which the passage of this bill would place upon taxpayers. If that were the situation and result, the argument would have weight. But instead of exchanging one of these burdens for the other we are retaining the one and taking on the other.

The heavy appropriations we make for the Shipping Board may be roughly divided into two classes. Those for the Shipping Board's own force and those on account of the ships and shipping business it manages.

Are we to be rid of the Shipping Board after the passage of this act? On the contrary, the bill itself provides for the indefinite continuance of that expensive organization and provides for it varied and vastly important additional activities. If we could by a stretch of the imagination for a moment fancy that this bill would relieve us of the Shipping Board, a glance at any page of the bill would remind us that under its terms years and administrations may come and go but that the Shipping Board, with its important and vast powers and work and the great expense they involve, is to go on indefinitely. We can not read this bill and hope that we are by it exchanging the Shipping Board for anything. We are keeping the Shipping Board, with its desire to perpetuate itself, its thirst for power, its big salaries, its army of employees, and its almost boundless capacity to consume the contents of the Treasury.

Are we assured that this bill will relieve us of the ships which occasion the other portion of this sickening expense account? Are we assured that the passage of this bill will cause the sale of these ships? It is hoped by the high-salaried young hopefuls of our national shipping business that we will sell ships representing about 6½ per cent of the total cost of all our ships. Two hundred millions of dollars is the amount of sales hoped for, and that is 6½ per cent of $3,000,000,000—the cost of the ships. That may be the best sale that can be made, but it is not much sale. A loss of more than 93 per cent is a loss of substantially all. What are we to do with the big remainder? Sink it? We have been slow to sink anything on which a watchman's job or a $35,000 expert's salary could be made to ride. What assurance have we that this big lot of ships, little reduced by the best subtraction hoped for, will be promptly sunk or scrapped. There will be no new inducement to scrap it, much less to destroy the jobs which they have thus far sustained.

Is the aid proposed by the bill to be limited to the purchasers of our ships? No; it will be given as freely to ships now owned by the Government's competitors in the shipping business as it will be to those who purchase our ships. The world has more ships than is needed by world traffic. They are, therefore, rotting in the harbors and being offered for one-third to one-half their cost. This bill will not create any new cargoes. The world's ships will continue to wait for cargoes. Under these conditions will steamship owners abandon their own ships and buy ours, even at a reduced price, when they can get all the benefits offered by this measure by operating ships they now own? Of course they will, in the main, use their own ships and draw the subsidy. If there were traffic enough for all the shipping, all available ships would be in use. It is foolish in the extreme to expect that when there is not enough traffic even for all their own ships they will buy ours, even at a reduced price, and throw away theirs. When their own ships get old and others are needed, we are offering special inducements in long-term, low-interest credit to induce them to build other new ships instead of buying ours.

The bill specifically provides for the continuance of the Shipping Board, so it will continue with its burdens. This bill does not promise, much less assure, that we will get rid of the major part of our ships. The greater part of them will probably remain with us, with the burdens which they impose. So we will have at least the major part of our old burden, plus the new one we are taking on. Therefore we are not exchanging a heavy load for a lighter load. We are keeping a heavy one, imposed by the necessities of war, and loading the public with another in peace times at the instance of privilege-seeking greed.

In addition to the utter futility of the measure as a pretended alternative for the present Shipping Board and the expense resulting from its conduct of the shipping business, I object to it because it presents no plan for a self-supporting American merchant marine. A merchant marine which is to burden the other industries and activities of the people by causing them to be taxed in order to maintain it is, of course, a drain upon the resources of the Nation instead of a support to them. These two fundamental objections would compel me to oppose the measure; but they are by no means all.

It is full of sinister, wicked provisions, in keeping with the bad purposes which the whole of it is designed to promote. As proposed by the committee, it would give these bounties to big, private, profit-making combinations, like the Standard Oil Co. and its subsidiaries, the Steel Trust, and other big private interests, like that of the packers, many of whom do, and others who may, operate their own vessels in carrying to and from foreign ports their own goods to their own warehouses and factories. Even as amended, the same vicious principle is in the bill and in great measure the same result will be caused.

It connects the Nation with a most dangerous policy of helping steamship companies make money out of bringing immigrants to America. The history of their handling of this traffic is one of inhumanity, lawlessness, and unpatriotic disregard of the public welfare. One who reviews it as it has been conducted by them can hardly fail to notice its resemblance of the shipping engaged in the slave trade.

The history of the dealings of Congress with immigration is the record of difficulties caused by shipowners, contract-labor importers, and other obstructions embarrassing all efforts to protect the country against incoming criminals, prostitutes, paupers, and anarchists and an unwelcome throng of undesirable aliens.

Before 1820 no record was kept of immigration and no regulation of any kind was attempted. During the first 50 years after 1819 the National Government did nothing toward restriction but did attempt to prohibit shipowners from crowding poor wretches together like hogs or cattle in the insanitary, inhuman manner practiced by them, which caused degradation, disease, and thousands of deaths among them.

I read from volume 2 of the report of the United States Immigration Commission, page 589, which I cite as "I. C. R.":

Prior to the year 1819 there were no United States laws governing or regulating ocean passenger traffic. * * * As a result abuses were permitted and practiced on transporting vessels that caused distress, disease, and death, especially among immigrants bound for America. (2 I. C. R. 589.)

Further, the fact that the protection given by the law—

* * * was inadequate, is shown by the gruesome records of the steerage experiences in those days. (2 I. C. R. 591.)

From the beginning of the movement of population from Europe to the New World suffering and death were common on immigrant ships. Among the earlier instances recorded was that of 3,000 Palatines forwarded * * * by England to New York, 470 of whom died on the voyage and 250 soon after their arrival of ship fever. There is also a gruesome account * * * of experiences on a ship which sailed in 1731 for America from Rotterdam with 156 immigrants. She was bound for Philadelphia via Falmouth. When she had been at sea eight weeks the passengers were put on short allowances, and during the last five weeks of their journey were unable to obtain bread. Finally, they were paying 18 pence for a rat and 6 pence for a mouse. (2 I. C. R. 589.)

Upon the increased demand for transportation to the United States following the close of the second war with England many vessels which had originally been constructed solely for the purpose of transporting freight were hurriedly transposed into immigrant ships that they might enjoy some of the profits of a business that had become lucrative. This with the fact that excessive overcrowding had been practiced on all vessels, rendered the condition of emigrants at sea almost unbearable. (2 I. C. R. 590.)

The potato famine in Ireland occurred in 1847, and in consequence there was a great increase in emigration from that country. (2 I. C. R. 591.)

Famine-stricken Ireland was also fever ridden; * * * the disease was carried aboard ship, where in the overcrowded and poorly ventilated steerage quarters thousands died of ship fever and thousands more survived the voyage only to die after landing.

Thousands of Irish and other British emigrants died during the voyage to Canada, and at Grasse Island, near Quebec, where the Canadian quarantine station was located, as many as 7,000 emigrants perished from ship fever and cholera in 1847 alone. (2 I. C. R. 592.)

In 1819, 1847, and 1855 laws were passed by Congress to limit crowding and prevent the starving of immigrants, but these were opposed, avoided, and disregarded by the shipping concerns. The Immigration Commission says:

It may well be questioned whether the condition surrounding the transportation of emigrant passengers had been improved by any of these laws. (2 I. C. R. 593.)

Slave ships, moved by human greed, brought wretched humans from Africa to sell into slavery in America, where they embroiled the country in years of strife, caused an awful war, and yet present a dangerous race problem. Immigrant ships, for gain, have all along been the chief offenders against America and against humanity. Many of them have been German, many have been British, and some have been American. Their desire for profits is now an embarrassment to the enactment of proper legislation and the enforcement of such as we have.

The same interests have repeatedly violated the provisions of the 3 per cent immigration law and brought numbers of immigrants in great excess of its provisions in defiance thereto. They did this knowingly, with malice aforethought. They did it in the face of the warnings of the American Government, given by its public officials, among whom were Mr. Secretary of State Hughes. This was done with the knowledge that if the immigrants were admitted the laws of the United States would be outraged, and if they were not admitted an unspeakable outrage would have been done by them to the poor immigrants, who would have sold all and have been thrown back upon the shores of distressed Europe, penniless and among strangers.

The steamship companies have gone their length to violate the eighteenth amendment to our Constitution and State and Federal enactments based thereon.

They are among the chief offenders against our narcotic laws down to this moment. The Washington Herald, a Hearst publication, is urging the passage of this legislation, and so can not be charged with the desire to prejudice it; yet its own news columns prove what I have just said about the steamship companies violating America's narcotic laws. I quote the following from the Washington Herald, issue of to-day, November 29:

STEAMSHIP FIGHTS OPIUM ACT PENALTY.

San Francisco Chamber of Commerce and mayor aid plea of China Mail Co. Frantic efforts are being made by the mayor, chamber of commerce, and other influential interests in San Francisco to save the China Mail Steamship Co. from the heavy penalty imposed in connection with a $95,000 opium seizure, November 20, it was revealed here yesterday.

The seizure was aboard the steamship Nanking of the China line which docked at San Francisco November 18. The penalty of $25 per ounce of opium seized totaled $227,990. This must be paid or bond for double that amount posted before the vessel can sail under the terms of the Jones-Miller narcotic import control law passed by Congress last May.

The Nanking is due to sail on its return voyage November 30, but thus far has failed to post the bond. Accordingly, appeal has been made to Washington for reduction of the penalty on the claim that if it is enforced the company's credit will be impaired and it will be forced out of business.

The case is before Secretary of the Treasury Mellon, head of the board entrusted with enforcement of the law. He has wired Collector of Customs Hamilton at San Francisco for a report and recommendation before passing on the case.

This was the fifth opium seizure aboard the Nanking this year. (Washington Herald, November 29, 1922.)

These vast interests are bound together in mighty combines, one of the purposes and effects of which is to enable each to hide its violations of the law. Another effect of their combination is to make them strong enough to override the law through financial and political influences and by force of strength, such as the big trusts always have. Trusts are the only things which have proven too strong for the Government of the United States. This cooperation and consolidation in wrongdoing and the concealment thereof makes every part of the aggregation guilty of the crimes of each.

Now, the Congress takes up their fight, links the Government with their efforts to secure profit from it, and burdens the taxpayers to promote the wrongful purposes.

It is even suggested in Title III, section 303, that some 32 of our treaties of commerce and navigation be broken down, and that the executive department assume such control of the law as to bring the law and treaties into harmonious cooperation for the profits of the shipping lines. This will, of course, involve the change of the law or the treaties—one or both, probably both—to create complete cooperation of both. For what? For the profit of the steamship companies. This action is self-abasing and utterly unworthy of the United States. We will be fortunate indeed if we escape the calamity which the impairment or wholesale disregard of our immigration laws would bring. It certainly opens and paves the way for that evil and invites it.

Within the 63 printed pages of this measure are about as many things deceptive, wrong, hurtful to the public interest, and wholly unworthy of the Congress and Government of the United States as could be placed in that much printed space.

To enumerate all its vices is impossible. For me to understand how men, supposed to be representing the interests of the people of the United States, could perpetrate such a wrong against them is likewise impossible. For me it would be a crime to support this measure. For me to support it and seek to hide its many vicious provisions in veiled phraseology and pretensions of patriotic purpose would be to further offend by trying to conceal conscious wrong by hypocrisy and false pretense.

THE MERCHANT MARINE.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I wish to read a telegram.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts moves to strike out the last word.

SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, November 29, 1922.

The Chaplain, Rev. J. J. Muir, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father, on the eve of our national Thanksgiving Day we desire to return thanks for the manifold blessings with which Thou hast crowned our Nation. We bless Thee for Thy presence so frequently in times of anxiety and of danger. We thank Thee for all the providences which have watched over the Nation and brought us to our present situation.

Grant that truth and righteousness may always prevail. Increase among the people the consciousness of doing that which is uppermost in Thine own heart and for Thy purposes among the peoples of the world. Hear us and bless us, and be with any who sorrow to-morrow, and fill the vacancy by Thy presence, through Jesus Christ, our Lord. Amen.

PETER G. GERRY, a Senator from the State of Rhode Island, appeared in his seat to-day.

PROPOSED ADJOURNMENT OVER THANKSGIVING DAY.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, I move that the Senate do now adjourn until 12 o'clock noon on Friday next.

Mr. CURTIS. I make the point of order that the next thing in order is the reading of the Journal, and that nothing else is to be proceeded with under Rule III until the Journal has been read.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I beg to differ with the point of order, and I desire to be heard on it for a moment. Undoubtedly the reading of the Journal can not be interrupted by any ordinary business. The reading of the Journal fixes yesterday's proceedings, and that must be attended to; but the right to adjourn is a constitutional right, and there is no rule of Senate procedure which could interfere with the right of this body to adjourn when it saw fit. The Senate Chamber might be on fire, and we might have to adjourn. A mob might be assaulting the outer door, and it would be necessary for the Senate to adjourn. I do not believe that the rule can go so far or that any precedent would justify saying that the Senate, if a majority of the Senators desired to adjourn, could not do so. Therefore I insist that the point of order against the motion to adjourn is not well taken.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will hear the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. CURTIS. We might as well settle the question now. I desire to make an additional point of order.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Am I to understand that the Senator concedes the point is not well taken?

Mr. CURTIS. I want to make an additional point of order, and I might as well make it now as at any other time. I make the further point of order that the motion is dilatory.

I know we have no rule of the Senate with reference to dilatory motions. We are a legislative body, and we are here to do business and not retard business. It is a well-settled principle that in any legislative body where the rules do not cover questions that may arise general parliamentary rules must apply.

The same question was raised in the House of Representatives when they had no rule on the question of dilatory motions. It was submitted to the Speaker of the House, Mr. Reed. Mr. Speaker Reed held that, notwithstanding there was no rule of the House upon the question, general parliamentary law applied, and he sustained the point of order.

I take it for granted that the Chair has a right to take notice of what happened here yesterday and what has happened here this morning that has not occurred before, I think, since I have been in the Senate, anyhow, now going on 14 years. I doubt if it has occurred since the celebrated filibuster on the force bill years ago. I desire at this point, without any further discussion, because it is so fully covered in what I am about to present, to read the opinion of Speaker Reed on this question. It will be found in Hinds' Precedents at page 358, as follows:

The Speaker recognized Mr. John Dalzell, of Pennsylvania, who arose to address the House, when Mr. William D. Bynum, of Indiana, claimed the floor on a question of personal privilege, and being recognized by the Speaker addressed the House on that question.

At the conclusion of Mr. Bynum's remarks, Mr. William M. Springer, of Illinois, moved that the House adjourn.

The Speaker ruled the motion not in order.

From this ruling Mr. Springer appealed.

The Speaker thereupon made the following statement to the House as the grounds of his ruling:

The House will not allow itself to be deceived by epithets. The facts which have transpired during the last few days have transpired in the presence of this House and of a very large auditory. No man can describe the action and judgment of this Chair in language which will endure unless that description be true.

A man much more famous than any in this Hall said many years ago that nobody could write him down but himself. Nobody can talk any Member of this House down except himself.

Whatever is done has been done in the face of the world, and is subject to its discriminating judgment. The proceedings of this House, so far as the Chair is concerned, have been orderly, suitable in conformity to the rules of parliamentary law, and the refusal of the Chair to entertain the motion to adjourn at this juncture is strictly in accordance therewith.

There is no possible way by which the orderly methods of parliamentary procedure can be used to stop legislation. The object of a parliamentary body is action, and not stoppage of action. Hence, if any Member or set of Members undertakes to oppose the orderly progress of business, even by the use of the ordinarily recognized parliamentary motions, it is the right of the majority to refuse to have those motions entertained, and to cause the public business to proceed.

Primarily the organ of the House is the man elected to the Speakership. It is his duty in a clear case, recognizing the situation, to endeavor to carry out the wishes and desires of the majority of the body which he represents. Whenever it becomes apparent that the ordinary and proper parliamentary motions are being used solely for purposes of delay and obstruction; when Members break over in an unprecedented way the rule in regard to the reading of the Journal; when a gentleman steps down to the front amid the applause of his associates on the floor and announces that it is his intention to make opposition in every direction, it then becomes apparent to the House and to the community what the purpose is. It is then the duty of the occupant of the Speaker's chair to take, under parliamentary law, the proper course with regard to such matters; and in order that there might not be any misunderstanding as to whether or not it is the wish or desire of the majority of the House—apparent as it seems to be—the question of the appeal from the refusal of the Chair to entertain the motion will be put to the House for its judgment and determination.

There was an appeal taken, and on the appeal the House sustained the ruling of Speaker Reed.

Mr. President, so far as this matter is concerned, I think it is useless to say more. We were notified here on yesterday by the leader on the other side of the Chamber that the pending legislation would not be allowed to pass; he frankly made that statement in order that this side might know the situation, and I think he ought to be commended for his frankness.

However, the question now presented to the majority is, Shall we do business or shall we permit business to be retarded? I make the point of order that under Rule III the reading of the Journal must be proceeded with until disposed of, and the further point that the motion is dilatory.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, I have heard the same song sung before that my good friend from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS] has just finished. I became a Member of the House of Representatives when that great statesman and great man, Speaker Reed, was in his glory as the Speaker and leader of the House of Representatives; when the stand-pat policies of the Republican Party were proclaimed by every flag and from every doorstep. It was the pride of the Republican organization that the Republicans used the strong arm to enforce their will upon the country; that they represented the special interests of the United States, and through them that they enforced the legislation of the land.

The Senator from Kansas has correctly quoted from the ruling of Speaker Reed. There was no rule of the House of Representatives to justify Mr. Speaker Reed's ruling, but, because an exigency in the parliamentary machine had arisen, Speaker Reed held that a simple motion to register the will of the House could be ignored by the Speaker. He did ignore it, and a Republican stand-pat House of Representatives sustained his ruling. What was the result? It was not long afterwards that Grover Cleveland was elected President of the United States, for the American people spewed up the proposition that a parliamentary body could be run by force and not through an intelligent understanding.

Now, what does the Senator from Kansas ask the Chair to do? So far as this particular motion is concerned, there is nothing in it that is dilatory. To-morrow will be Thanksgiving Day. It has been well understood for days that we would adjourn over Thanksgiving Day; many of the Senators on the floor have made their arrangements for Thanksgiving Day. My motion is entirely in accord with the understanding that we have had. I recognize that the leadership may change their view in reference to the matter, but, nevertheless, what I have stated has been the understanding.

Mr. CURTIS. It would be better to proceed and transact business to-day and adjourn this evening after we shall have concluded to-day's business.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Of course, a Senator on the other side of the Chamber may make the motion when it is desired, but there will not be any business transacted to-day. The Senator from Kansas knows that. I am not disguising the fact, Mr. President, because I believe in dealing in a perfectly frank manner with the Senate and with the Chair, if it will help the Chair any to have an understanding of the fact that we do not propose to do any business at this time. Of course, the Chair can overrule the motion if he desires to invade or to disregard parliamentary law, but there are plenty of other ways of securing a call of the roll, and we shall have many roll calls to-day, no matter what the ruling of the Chair may be. I am merely protesting in the interest of the preservation of the rules of the Senate.

Mr. President, Mr. Speaker Reed was a great man, a man of great force, but he represented ideals of government which the American people have repudiated, which have become archaic. They may have been the dominating ideals and controlling force in Speaker Reed's time, but the American people have cast them aside. It was because of the position that the Republican Party took, standing pat on tariff bills and rejecting legislation which the country desired, that from the bowels of the Republican Party came forth a number of men who called themselves "Progressives," and the Progressive Party finally, when Theodore Roosevelt became President, controlled the organization itself. Now it is slipping back to the times of Reed, to the times of standpatism.

I admit, Mr. President, that as the leader on this side of the Chamber, practically representing the voice of this side, with, perhaps, a few exceptions—

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I merely want to say to the Senator that it seems to me he is confusing the contest which arose under Mr. Reed with one which arose nearly 20 years later when the Senator from Alabama was a Member of the House. If the Senator will allow me, Mr. Reed's reform of the rules and the position he took, especially with reference to a quorum, as the Senator knows, have been sustained by the Supreme Court and adopted by the Democratic Party in the House.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Of course I am familiar with that proposition. The Supreme Court, of course, took the Journal of the House, as it will take the Journal in this case, and held that what the Journal showed must control, notwithstanding a quorum was counted. The particular instance occurred just before I became a Member of the House, but I served under Mr. Reed the second time he was Speaker, when he still maintained all his power and glory, and I can very well remember the time when not only a Democrat but even a Republican did not think of attempting to take the floor until he had gone to the Speaker's office and asked his kindly permission to accord him recognition some time during the day. It was necessary for a Member, if he had a bill or a motion in which his constituents were interested, to go with humble voice and bowed knee to the Speaker's office and ask kindly permission that he might secure recognition during the day. It was that character of procedure that was invoked and in force in this country when the precedent which the Senator from Kansas cites was made. Of course if Senators on the majority side are reactionary enough to want to go back to those conditions and those times then they can use their votes to do it. It is not so very material to me whether I secure the adoption of the motion to adjourn over until Friday because there are plenty of other motions which may be made, but I think the Senators on the other side will make a very great mistake if they head back toward Reedism at this time. I do not think the country will sustain them.

Mr. President, because I very candidly announced that this side of the Chamber was going to use every legitimate parliamentary means, as we have a right to do within the rules, to prevent the passage of the Dyer bill, that is called a filibuster by the other side, and I confess that it is. I do not generally believe in filibusters; I do not think they are justified. I myself, under proper circumstances, would like to see a liberalized cloture rule in this body. I want business transacted, and one reason why I stated yesterday most candidly that we on this side did not propose to allow the passage of this bill if we could prevent it by any legitimate parliamentary means, was that I want the business of the country and of the Senate to be transacted. The appropriation bills will be here shortly. I want to see them passed. They are a part of the legitimate business of the country. In Mr. Taft's administration, when I happened to be leader of the Democratic House, I assisted in securing the passage of the supply bills which were needed to run the Government, notwithstanding the President was a Republican and the House was Democratic.

I feel the same way about that question now. The majority are entitled to have the supply bills passed; they ought to become a law before the 4th of March, and I wish to help in that direction; but if Senators on the other side have any reason they must understand that if they are going to inject into the proceedings of the Senate what we call a force bill—they may call it by some other name, but it has been called in my section of the country a force bill so long that it would not be recognized by any other name—if the majority expect to keep that measure hanging over and then lay it aside in order to pass appropriation bills, they must know perfectly well that the filibuster is going to continue on the appropriation bills, and those bills are going to be slaughtered. There is but one way for the Senate now to get down to work and transact the business of the Government before the 4th of March, and that is to get a final disposition of this force bill before anything else is done. Pass it if you can; abandon it if we force you to do so.

As I said yesterday, not for a moment do I believe in mob rule or mob law; I believe that the law should be enforced by the officers of the law and by nobody else, but when it is attempted to take away the jurisdiction of the States in reference to certain crimes because they are attended by a mob and leave the jurisdiction of the States as to other crimes where there is not a mob, to take away the jurisdiction of the States when the mob is acting in violation of law, but not to take it away when the mob is not organized against the law, discriminating in favor of those whom it is desired to keep out of the Dyer bill for your own purposes and putting in the Dyer bill those you want to bring within the jurisdiction of the Federal Government, of course that is an affront to a large section of this country.

So long as the Senate has the rules that it has now, you know just as well as I know that I am standing here that you can not pass it; and, more than that, the country does not want you to pass it. The South is absolutely opposed to it, and always has been; but it goes farther than the South. You can not tell me that there are not thousands and hundreds of thousands of men and women in the North who are just as much opposed to this class of legislation as they are in the South. There is no difference between them. The old issues and animosities of the Civil War have long since passed. We belong to the same kin and the same people, and we think the same way. It is not that I am not in favor of protecting the negro race under the law. I think the negro has as much right to protection under the law as the white man has, but he should be protected within the Constitution; and you have no right to rape the Constitution of your country because you think somebody has violated the rights of some citizen in a particular State.

That is the issue, Mr. President. Of course, if Senators on the other side want to adopt the policy of injecting the strong arm, we are not going to deny that we are filibustering. We want the country to know just exactly what we are doing, and I am doing it because I think it is the only way to expedite the public business. If the Dyer bill is not off the floor of the Senate and an understanding reached in reference to it, or it is passed, you can not pass your supply bills this winter, because you are going to inject a feeling between the two sides of the Chamber that is going to make general legislation impossible. I do not want that to happen. Therefore, if you think you can pass it with the strong arm, now is your time to do it; but I do not think you can under the rules of the Senate, and I want to say this, Mr. President:

Of course the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS] has cited the ruling of Mr. Reed, where he admitted that there was nothing in the rules of the House to justify the ruling that a motion to adjourn under these circumstances was dilatory; but it must be remembered, Mr. President, that the rules of the House at that time were very different from the rules of the Senate. The House at that time had adopted an absolute cloture rule, by which the majority at any time that it saw fit, by a vote, could absolutely cut off debate.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do.

Mr. CURTIS. I have not the book before me; but I think, if the Senator will read the precedent I cited, he will find that this decision was made before the adoption of any rule by the House, and at a time when there were no rules of the House.

Mr. LODGE. I was a Member of the House at the time, and it was made before any rules were adopted.

Mr. SWANSON. The House is not a continuing body, and consequently it does not have rules to govern it until they are adopted, except the rules of general parliamentary law. This is a continuing body. The Presiding Officer of this body is bound by the rules of the Senate, which are continuing.

Mr. LODGE. That is an interesting question, but that is not the point. The point is that this ruling was made before the rules had been adopted, not afterward.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I understand. The Senator is right about that; but what I am addressing myself to is the attitude of the parliamentary body. That is a point that the presiding officer of any parliamentary body will consider. This motion came before the House had passed the resolution adopting its rules, as it does every two years; but the preceding Houses had an absolute cloture rule. The policy of the House of Representatives was in favor of an absolute cloture rule. It was in favor of gagging the individual Member in order that the majority might move on and do their business. That is not the rule of the Senate. That never has been the rule of the Senate. That is not the rule under which we do business here.

The right of the individual Senator under the rules of the Senate is recognized in preference to the desire of the majority to do business. Any individual Senator can take the floor and talk for a month, if he wants to, under the rules of the Senate, and unless you can get a two-thirds vote, after a day's notice, nobody can stop him. The Senate does not stand for a gag rule or a gag decision; at least, it has not in the past. If it desires to do so this morning, it will set a precedent in the Senate; and, of course, it is not very material, as I said. We may not be able to stop all the business you are going to do, Senators, but you can not prevent us from having a roll call on every affirmative thing that you want to do. You can not hold that that is dilatory. The Constitution guarantees to us the right to a roll call on every single affirmative thing you are going to do, and the rules of the Senate guarantee to us the right to demand a quorum here before the roll call is started, after each transaction.

Just take your own calendar. The nominations of certain men have been sent in here for confirmation in executive session. Two roll calls consume half an hour. The confirmation of ten men, without anybody opening his mouth, means an ordinary legislative day of five hours. The Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON] smiles, but he will not smile when we run this thing for a week or two, because that is what you are going to get. You might just as well make up your minds to that—that we are going to have a roll call on every proposition on which the Vice President will allow us to have a roll call, and I know he will not deny a roll call on every affirmative proposition that you have in mind.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, will the Senator from Alabama yield to a little interruption?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Certainly, if I do not yield the floor.

Mr. NELSON. I shall be very brief.

It seems to me the Senator is proceeding to unusual and unnecessary lengths. Granting that the other side of the Chamber are fully justified in preventing the passage of this bill, they certainly are not justified in filibustering when we take up other measures. They ought to be content with defeating this bill; but the remarks of the Senator indicate that unless we withdraw this bill they will defeat everything, and allow nothing to come up.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. To be sure; undoubtedly.

Mr. NELSON. That is wholly unnecessary. You ought to be content if you can defeat this bill, without obstructing the wheels of legislation.

The Senator refers to Speaker Reed's conduct and says that it was necessary to go and see him about getting recognition. It was my fortune to be a Member of the Forty-eighth, Forty-ninth, and Fiftieth Congresses. The House was Democratic. Carlisle was Speaker. I represented a district of 29 counties. I had no end of local legislation, and every time I wanted to get a little bill through I had to go to Speaker Carlisle and get permission to get recognition.

Why is not the Senator content with defeating this bill, instead of holding out a threat here and saying: "We are not content with defeating this bill, but we want to punish the other side of the Chamber because they advocate the passage of the bill. We want to punish your side and not let you do any kind of business at all." Why not be content, whenever a motion is pending, to take up this bill, with filibustering all you can against it? When we attempt to bring up other legitimate business, why should you filibuster against that? That is the main question. That is in the nature of a reprisal; that is in the nature of a threat unworthy of the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, this is not the first time I have engaged in a filibuster. I thank my friend from Minnesota for his kindly suggestion. We are old-time friends. I once lived as a boy in his State, and one of the great glories that I get out of having lived in Minnesota at one time is that that grand old State is represented in the United States Senate by a very great man whom I love and honor and reverence; but I am not prepared to take his suggestions in all matters, and if my friend will allow me, I will tell him why.

This is not the first time that I have ever engaged in a filibuster. I do not often do it, and I do not intend ever to do it without adequate justification.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, will the Senator allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Certainly.

Mr. NELSON. I do not dispute the Senator's right to have a hold-up on this particular bill. Grant that; but I say, and my contention is, that when you have accomplished that, if you can prevent the passage of this bill, you ought not to stand in the way of other important legislation.

For example, we now have an important nomination pending before the Senate. Two of the judges of our Supreme Court are off the bench. The court needs reinforcement. The committee has reported the nomination of an Associate Justice of the Supreme Court. I ask the Senator from Alabama, for whom I have the highest respect, why is it necessary to hold up the consideration of that matter to defeat this Dyer bill, as it is called?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I shall be glad to explain it to the Senator.

Mr. NELSON. And why is it necessary to hold up any other public business? We can make an exception in every one of these cases; we can agree to take up public business and go on with it; and when this Dyer bill, as you call it, comes up for consideration filibuster to your heart's content on that bill. I am not quarrelling with you on that point, but I say you have no right to carry your war farther than that. If you do, you are doing an injustice to the American people and the public of this country.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I am glad to have my friend from Minnesota say that, because I want to answer him and put the record straight. Of course, he understands thoroughly, as I have already said several times, that the minute we can reach an understanding with the other side that this Dyer bill is not going to be considered at this session of Congress, we will co-operate and help to transact all the business coming before us. I am anxious to do it. I am anxious to have the Executive Calendar cleared. I am anxious to see the appropriation bills passed. There may be some other business the other side may bring up, which I may vote against, but I know of nothing the majority are going to bring up which I shall delay unnecessarily, as far as I am individually concerned. I can not speak for everybody, but as far as I am individually concerned, my friends on the other side need expect no delay.

This proposition is fundamental. We regard this bill as a rape of the Constitution. We regard the bill as an infringement of the liberties of our people and the freedom of our State governments, and we feel that we are justified in making any attack on it.

I want to say to the Senator from Minnesota, in all candor, I have no meanness in my soul against any man on the other side of the Chamber. I have a feeling in my heart of the utmost friendship for you all, the kindest feeling, both individually and collectively, and I have no desire to punish you.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President—

Mr. UNDERWOOD. If the Senator will allow me a moment, I will explain why I do not want anything to come up.

So our action is not in the way of reprisal; but I am not going to punish the gentlemen on this side and let those on the other side go without their share of punishment. If we agree that we are merely going to fight the Dyer bill, and let the majority lay it aside and transact such business as they want to transact, they will have it as a bumper against anything we may want to do. We will be gagged and stopped from any work during the session, and they can go ahead with what their leadership determines is business of prime importance; and therefore we will be the only ones to get the crushing. They will only have to keep the Dyer bill here as a bumper against other legislation, and put through what they think is necessary during the session. They are not going to do it in that way.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Certainly.

Mr. NELSON. Let us see what an attitude the Senator from Alabama presents. Here I am, a "black" Republican from the State of Minnesota. I am trying to get a Democratic justice of the Supreme Court confirmed, and just because of this Dyer bill the Senator intimates that that shall not be done.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do not say it can not be done. Perhaps the other side can do it; but they are going to do it against any efforts we can make.

Mr. NELSON. What connection has that with the Dyer bill? Can not the Democrats continue their filibuster on the Dyer bill and make an exception and let us go ahead with executive business? My point is that the Dyer bill can be held up the whole session without obstructing public business. There is no occasion to obstruct the legitimate public business for the purpose of defeating that one bill. I am not taking any issue with the Senator from his standpoint. He probably is justified in fighting that bill. Grant that. But he is not justified in continuing his obstructive tactics in respect to every other matter of public business.

Our Supreme Court is now partly incapacitated for need of a working force. We need an additional justice. We in the State of Minnesota would have been glad if the President had tendered a Republican nominee, but the President has not seen fit to do that; he has tendered one of the best Democratic lawyers in the country. He will be one of the best judges in the country, and I am anxious to see him confirmed. There is no reason why the Senator from Alabama should obstruct that matter in his desire to defeat the Dyer bill.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, I love the Senator from Minnesota so much, and have loved him so long, that if I were disposed to make an exception for anybody, I would make it for the senior Senator from Minnesota; but I am not so disposed. So far as the nomination of the distinguished lawyer from Minnesota for a place on the Supreme Court bench is concerned, I think the President acted splendidly in appointing a Democrat to that vacancy, and, of course, it is not that we desire for a moment to interfere with an appointment of that kind that we are pursuing these tactics; but when we are following this kind of tactics we can not make exceptions.

Some gentlemen whom I see on the other side of the Chamber, who have served with men in both Houses for many years, probably recall an incident which happened about 20 years ago, when a gentleman by the name of Jim Butler was commissioned as a Congressman from the State of Missouri. The Republican side of the House had turned him out once, but the people sent him back. He was reelected and sent back, and it was a short session. They took the testimony in the case, and when it came in it would make a large volume. The Republican committee declined either to print the testimony or to read it, and started to turn Butler out, and did turn him out, without either printing or reading the testimony. I happened to be on the Rules Committee of the House with Mr. Richardson at that time, and the Republican side did no business for about three weeks. That was when they adopted their famous rule to pass appropriation bills and agree to the amendments en bloc. What was the result? They never have turned another man out of the House of Representatives without printing the testimony and giving his case fair and reasonable consideration. The practice of making a man walk the plank with a black flag stopped after that time.

This is not the first time a "force" bill has come before the Senate of the United States.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is ready to rule on the point of order, unless the Senator wishes to say something more.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. If the Vice President will allow me just to finish the sentence, I will stop. This is not the first time a "force" bill has come before the Senate of the United States. Such a bill has always met the opposition this one is meeting now, and such bills are going to meet that opposition, and the other side of the Chamber may as well recognize it. It is not with any animosity that we say that, but it is fundamental to us. We can not make anything by just letting the other side dillydally with it and pass their other legislation. The only way we can fight it and make the majority understand we are fighting it, and let the country understand we will always fight such a measure, is to simply obstruct legislation until we come to an understanding about it.

Mr. KELLOGG. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I yield.

Mr. KELLOGG. Suppose the shipping bill comes before the Senate, is the Senator going to take the same position, that there will be no business done until that is laid aside?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I can speak for no one but myself, but so far as I am concerned, I shall not attempt in any way to obstruct that legislation. I want to say to the Senator that I have always believed in a merchant marine. I have never voted for a subsidy, and I will probably not vote for a subsidy this time, although I am not committed, and do not want to commit myself on that question until I hear all the arguments; but I should be very glad to see a bill go through the Senate which would build up an American merchant marine, and let it live. But I can assure the Senator that so far as I am concerned, he will find no obstructive tactics on my part against that bill, even if the other side presents it in such a way that I can not give my affirmative vote for it. I may, and probably shall, have to vote against it, but I shall not obstruct it, because it is a legitimate piece of business legislation. This is a very different thing. This is not business legislation. We regard this proposition as fundamental, going to the freedom of our State governments and the liberties of our people. We would not feel justified in making a fight of this kind against a mere matter of spending dollars. It is a very different proposition.

I thank the Vice President for his courtesy.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, does the Presiding Officer desire to rule without hearing more with respect to this question?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is ready to make a ruling.

Mr. HARRISON. I wanted to call to the Chair's attention the issues which we fought out in past elections, and I can read some utterances of some very distinguished citizens, representatives of the State of Massachusetts, who fought "Reedism" and "Cannonism," which is one of the questions here. I desired to call the attention of the Chair to the fact, too, that some of the Senators who are now trying to get the Chair to rule in an autocratic way were at that time particeps criminis to the proceedings which were afterwards condemned by the American people. Of course, if the Chair does not desire to hear the utterances of some very distinguished Republicans touching the autocratic rules of the House, upon which this decision is based, then, of course, I do not want to take up the time of the Presiding Officer and the Senate, but I have the textbook of the Republican Party here, and the campaign textbook of the Democratic Party for the years 1908 and 1910, when this issue was fought out before the American people and was overwhelmingly condemned by them, what was condemned would seem to me out of keeping with the trend of the day and the 7,000,000 majority which the Vice President received, with the present President of the United States, on what was apparently not a reactionary platform but on a platform of liberal views. Of course, if the Presiding Officer does not desire to hear these read I do not want to burden him.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is ready to make a ruling. The Chair thinks the Senator from Mississippi may presume that the Chair is familiar with those things to which the Senator from Mississippi would like to direct the attention of the Chair.

We are proceeding under Rule III, which provides for the commencement of the daily sessions of the Senate. It is as follows:

The Presiding Officer having taken the chair, and a quorum being present, the Journal of the preceding day shall be read, and any mistake made in the entries corrected. The reading of the Journal shall not be suspended unless by unanimous consent.

The Chair is of the opinion that that rule covers the present situation, that nothing but unanimous consent can suspend the reading of the Journal. The Chair therefore rules that the point of order is well taken.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, I appeal from the ruling of the Chair. I wish to say that I do not question that if the status were as the Chair indicates, the Chair would be right; that if we had once entered upon the reading of the Journal nothing could interrupt it except unanimous consent. Rule III applies only to the reading of the Journal, but we have not reached that stage. The Journal has not yet been presented to the Chamber; it is not open for consideration; and, therefore,

I do not agree with the Chair that we can not adjourn before the Journal is read.

On my appeal I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. JONES of Washington. What is the question, Mr. President?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is, Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the decision of the Senate?

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Assistant Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. EDGE (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] and vote "yea."

Mr. FLETCHER (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BALL]. I am advised that he is absent. Being unable to obtain a transfer I withhold my vote.

Mr. McCUMBER (when his name was called). I transfer my general pair with the junior Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] to the junior Senator from South Dakota [Mr. NORBECK]. I will let this announcement of transfer stand during this calendar day. I vote "yea."

Mr. SUTHERLAND (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON]. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from New Mexico [Mr. BURSUM] and vote "yea."

Mr. WATSON (when his name was called). I transfer my general pair with the senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] to the junior Senator from Arizona [Mr. CAMERON] and vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. BROUSSARD. I am paired with the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. MOSES]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST] and vote "nay."

Mr. FLETCHER. I transfer the pair which I have heretofore announced to the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GERRY] and vote "nay."

Mr. HALE. Transferring my pair with the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS] to the junior Senator from Nevada [Mr. ODDIE], I vote "yea."

Mr. CURTIS. I wish to announce that the senior Senator from Delaware [Mr. BALL] is detained on official business. He stands paired on this vote with the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GERRY].

I wish also to announce that the Senator from Illinois [Mr. McCORMICK] is paired with the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. KENDRICK].

The result was announced—yeas 41, nays 24, as follows:

THE JOURNAL.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the Journal.

The Assistant Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings.

Mr. CURTIS. I ask unanimous consent to dispense with the further reading of the Journal.

Mr. McKELLAR. I object.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is objection, and the Journal will be read.

The Assistant Secretary resumed and concluded the reading of the Journal.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. JONES of Washington in the chair). The question is, Shall the Journal be approved?

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, very much to my surprise, I notice that the Journal omits a very important part of the proceedings of yesterday. It does not incorporate the prayer by Rev. J. J. Muir as it appears on page 325 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. I therefore make the motion that the Journal be amended so that at the proper place it may show who delivered the prayer and set out the prayer in full.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, if the Senator has concluded his motion, I desire to make a point of order.

Mr. HARRISON. I desire to discuss the motion.

Mr. CURTIS. Then I desire to make a point of order when the Senator shall have concluded.

Mr. OVERMAN. If the motion is going to be discussed, there ought to be a quorum here; and I make the point of no quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Mississippi has the floor.

Mr. OVERMAN. But I can rise to suggest the absence of a quorum at any time, no matter who has the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair thinks so.

Mr. OVERMAN. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Carolina suggests the absence of a quorum. The Secretary will call the roll.

The reading clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Bayard	Gooding	Myers	Smoot
Borah	Hale	New	Spencer
Brandeggee	Harris	Nicholson	Stanfield
Broussard	Heflin	Norris	Sterling
Calder	Jones, Wash.	Overman	Sutherland
Capper	Kellogg	Page	Swanson
Caraway	Keyes	Pepper	Townsend
Curtis	Ladd	Phipps	Wadsworth
Dial	La Follette	Pittman	Walsh, Mass.
Edge	Lodge	Ransdell	Warren
Elkins	McCumber	Reed, Pa.	Watson
Fletcher	McKellar	Sheppard	Weller
Frelinghuysen	McLean	Shortridge	Willis
George	McNary	Smith

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-five Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present. The Senator from Mississippi has the floor.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. HARRISON. I do not wish to lose the floor.

Mr. SMITH. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield the floor?

Mr. HARRISON. I do not want to lose the floor.

Mr. SMITH. I make a motion, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator can not make a motion while the Senator from Mississippi holds the floor.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. If I should yield for that motion, would I lose the floor?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator would.

Mr. HARRISON. Then, I will ask the Senator from South Carolina to withhold his motion for a few moments.

Mr. SMITH. I withhold the motion.

Mr. HARRISON. I inquire of the Senator from Kansas if he now wishes to make a point of order?

Mr. CURTIS. No; I do not intend to make a point of order on the pending motion.

Mr. HARRISON. I desire to address myself to the motion.

Mr. President, I had always thought that the prayer of the Chaplain of the Senate was a part of the Journal, but in the proceedings of yesterday as they appear in the Journal which has just been read I observe that no mention is made of the fact that there was prayer at the opening of the Senate on that day. I suppose other Senators were just as much surprised as I was to find that no mention of that fact was made in the Journal. I am casting no reflection upon the very efficient Journal clerk when I make that observation, because it may have been the policy of the past. I have not looked over the Journals, and perhaps he was just following the precedent. If it has been the practice there never was a better time to adopt a different practice than to-day.

I presume that the vote here will be unanimous for my motion to incorporate the prayer in the Journal. One might argue that it is in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, and that will do. CONGRESSIONAL RECORDS are destroyed. The Journal is the official document to preserve the proceedings of this body. All the CONGRESSIONAL RECORDS may in time vanish, but the Journal will be preserved, and always should record what takes place in this body.

What if a hundred years from now your great-great-grandchildren should look over the Journal of yesterday and discover that no mention is made of the fact that there was prayer yesterday in opening this body, and then they should take the proceedings of the following day, as they will appear in the Journal to-morrow, and should read that their great-great-grandfathers voted against my motion to amend the Journal so that the prayer might be incorporated in the Journal? Why, those children of to-morrow would hang their heads in shame over the action of their ancestors. So we must change this policy, if it has been a policy, and start a new one to-day, so that the record of this body that is to be handed down to future generations will reveal the fact that we had prayer in opening this august body.

I have not made my motion merely to apply to the fact that there was prayer, but I have gone further than that, because generations to come should know who delivered the prayer; and so the amendment gives the name of the chaplain who on yesterday offered prayer. The only excuse that could possibly be given by any Senator for voting against my motion is that he is disgusted over the proceedings of yesterday, and that it is such an outrageous piece of legislative monstrosity that the majority is attempting to put over on the country and their methods are so high-handed that they do not think any prayer should be connected with the proceedings of yesterday. If that is the excuse that some Senators may offer for voting against my motion, then well and good; but it is the only one that could be concocted in the fertile mind of any of my friends over on the other side.

Of course I know that the policy of this body has become autocratic. There are some Senators here who were once Progressives and led in progressive movements, and some who were willing to style themselves Bull Moosers—a name which in those days was the synonym of progressive action upon the part of the representatives of the people—but you have changed from that policy and gone back to the old reactionary days of Thomas B. Reed. He was a wise man; he was an able statesman; he was a great apostle of Republican principles; but everyone knows, and history records the fact, that with but one exception the greatest autocrat who ever occupied the chair of Speaker of the House of Representatives was the distinguished ex-Speaker, Thomas B. Reed. He ruled with an iron hand. He wielded a power in that body that destroyed legislation when he willed it or passed it when he directed that it should be passed. In those days he was part of the Rules Committee. Five Representatives in that body composed the Rules Committee, and one of the men on the Rules Committee was the Speaker of the House. Mr. Reed was a part of the Rules Committee, and that committee was more autocratic—and when I say that I am condemning it with all the force I can command—than the steering committee of the Republican majority in this body to-day.

Its actions in legislative matters brought upon the heads of its members and upon the head of the Republican Party the condemnation of the American people. Reedism became an issue from one end of this country to the other. Every campaign orator employed it. You could hardly find representatives of the Republican Party in the western country who believed in progressive principles who would defend it, but enough of the Republican majority were for it to continue it in practice for a while. Why, Cannonism was but the successor to Reedism. Cannonism was fought out a few years later. My distinguished friend from Ohio, the present junior Senator from Ohio [Mr. WILLIS] made speeches, but I have not any idea that he defended Cannonism, although no doubt in that campaign he blew hot and cold, and it was a proposition that politicians were a little afraid to touch.

I am looking now into the face of a Senator, the distinguished junior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS], who perhaps had more to do with the overthrow of Cannonism in this country than any other individual in America. He was a Member of the House. He believed in progressive principles. He believed in the liberality of rules. He was against autocracy and one-man domination, and he led a fight over there. He was helped by the Democratic minority of the House of Representatives in those days. He had but few members of his own party to unite with him, but they were sufficient in numbers, with the Democratic minority, to drive the Speaker of the House of Representatives from his high position and cause him to relinquish that high post. I congratulate him for the great fight he made in those days.

Here we are confronted with a decision of Thomas B. Reed, delivered back there in those reactionary days, when he was voicing the sentiments of reactionism, when he was delivering opinions carrying out the autocratic policies of the House of Representatives as controlled by the then Republican leaders. I do not know whether my friend the distinguished senior Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS] was in the House in those days or not, but he had to fight out in the State of Kansas some years ago this Cannonism issue, this Thomas B. Reedism proposition. He had to do it, because he had fallen into the clutches of the thing in the House of Representatives; and whatever you may say against the distinguished senior Senator from Kansas, you know he is always one of the cogs in the wheels that move the machinery of legislation in any legislative body of which he may be a member, and he was one of the cogs over there in the House in those days when Cannonism and Reedism afflicted this country. But even though he may still indorse his position then and defend his allegiance to Reedism and Cannonism, I serve notice upon him now that he can not revive those old autocratic ways in a popular branch of the Congress of the United States. He may by his eloquence and popularity and pleasing ways and qualities of leadership carry his crowd temporarily astray, as he did this morning, but that is just for the time being. When these men who have sworn allegiance to progressive principles read in the Record to-morrow what they did to-day when they indorsed the action of the Vice President in holding that a motion to adjourn the Senate was not in order they will repent in sackcloth and ashes. So I am not going to accept the movements of my friend this morning as indicating that it will be the future practice of this body to go back to the old days of Reedism and Cannonism.

I hold here some pieces of American literature that will live throughout time. One is the Democratic Campaign Textbook of 1908. The other is the Democratic Campaign Textbook of 1910. I know that Senators in my presence are familiar with almost every line and every clause of them, because in those days you had to familiarize yourselves with their passages in order to combat them before the American people, and some of you, because you did try to answer them, fell by the wayside just temporarily; but that is the way the American people do. When you do not act right they will spank you, and then when you get right and can persuade them with your promises that you are really going to carry out their wishes they may forgive you and let you come back again.

Mr. NEW. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. HARRISON. I do.

Mr. NEW. The Senator from Mississippi spoke of the volumes which he presents there as romantic in character. I merely rose to inquire if he is presenting them as samples of romance?

Mr. HARRISON. They are romantic in a sense, for once in a while Republican papers become romantic and tell the truth; and I am going to read some of the passages that happened to find their way into the Democratic Campaign Textbook of 1908 that were taken from some Republican literature, and for once these Republican papers told the truth.

For instance, this campaign textbook says:

The shadow of JOE CANNON—

A splendid, fine, stalwart, true American, one whom I am sure, without respect to political parties, we are all sorry to see voluntarily retire from public life. Socially and personally we all love him, but he represented, back in those days, what Reed had represented before—principles that were obnoxious to the American electorate.

I am sorry the Vice President is not in the Chamber. Of course, I do not reflect upon the distinguished senior Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES of Washington in the chair] when I make that statement, because there is no better presiding officer anywhere than the distinguished senior Senator from Washington. He is always fair and courageous and decisive. He has perhaps less of autocracy about him as a presiding officer than any Member on the other side of the aisle. He sometimes votes with the Democrats, and when he does he is always right, and the only time he is ever wrong is when he does not take our advice.

But getting back to the question, I am sorry the Vice President, who made the ruling a few moments ago, is not in the chair, because I wanted to read this to him. He was elected by 7,000,000 majority—many of whom, of course, and more, were sorry for it afterwards—because the voters thought he would not wield an autocratic power, but that he would carry out the liberal campaign pledges of his party. He had presided over the Senate of the State of Massachusetts. He made a splendid record up there, but he never displayed any autocracy in those days. In fact, I have never seen him exhibit it here until to-day, and it was perhaps perfectly excusable, because he fell under the bewitching wand and influence of the distinguished senior Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS]. I almost have to catch myself sometimes for fear that I will fall under it; he is so entrancing and bewitching and amiable. But the idea, in this progressive day when autocrats are being driven from power, of anyone in this body beginning to use that kind of a javelin again!

I find here an editorial from the Odebolt (Iowa) Chronicle. Iowa is still progressive, always has been progressive, is known as one of the most progressive States in the Union, and I know that no one within the sound of my voice would take issue with me in the statement that the State of Iowa is progressive.

I read from a Republican paper of that progressive State a statement about "Cannonism" and "Reedism," which my friend from Kansas, one of the great leaders on the other side of the aisle, is attempting to foist upon this body again. If this Republican paper speaks disrespectfully of my good friend, JOE CANNON, I shall not indorse it. I would not even read anything that was disrespectful of him. I am merely employing it as an argument against the system the majority is attempting again to put in one of the high places of this Government. This editorial says:

Is JOE CANNON to be conceded the speakership in the event of the Republicans carrying the House at the coming election?

That is what this Republican paper says.

This is a pertinent question. Upon the reply, or failure to reply, hang enough votes to determine the election of a President.

Let us treat CANNON charitably, if you will, as charitably as his best friends would treat him, and what must be said of him?

He is the most inveterate foe of Roosevelt policies—

I shall not discuss that part of it. I will drop a little.

What happened during the last session of Congress? Under an abominable system which began with Tom Reed, and was later reduced to a science by CANNON, the Speaker of the House played the part of an autocrat.

Could I have a better witness to prove that that was a part of the system that the Republican press of the country, in those days, built as a species of autocracy that could not be defended? These utterances have not been this soon forgotten, and this has been 10 or 12 years ago. If they have lived this long, they will probably live longer. Yet my friend the Senator from Kansas is trying to invoke a practice here which was condemned by a great Republican paper just over the border in the State of Iowa, likening the Cannon tactics to the Tom Reed tactics, and the action of my friend this morning is merely an indorsement of the old tactics of Reed and CANNON.

I did not finish this article. I will read more of it:

Nero's fiat was never more absolute than CANNON's decision for or against legislation. When Roosevelt recommended legislation with the approval of nine-tenths of the votes of this country, CANNON tilted his cigar and tersely announced that he opposed it and therefore it could not be considered. When it was absolutely certain that a majority of the members of both parties in the House and Senate desired the passage of a bill abolishing duties on wood pulp and printing paper—

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. HARRISON. Always.

Mr. CURTIS. Does not the Senator know that his side is trying to do now just what that paper charged that CANNON tried to do—that is, prevent legislation?

Mr. HARRISON. No; we are discussing propositions which are of great moment to the American people. We are fighting a revival of autocratic methods in this body, and I thought I was making a very eloquent speech against it.

Mr. CURTIS. I want to state to the Senator that I believe if the Senate would adopt rules which would shut off dilatory motions and shut off debate not directed to the subject before the Senate, adopting rules by which we could go on and do business, it would be applauded by every paper, Republican and Democratic, from coast to coast and from the South to the Lakes.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, if I have accomplished nothing else, I have caused the opinion of the Senator from Kansas to be changed. I am glad he is coming around to my way of thinking and becoming a liberal in this body. I accept the apology of the distinguished Senator from Kansas.

In this same remarkable campaign textbook I find this:

How the Speaker controls the House.

I am going to read it, so that we can refresh our memory of those days. It reads:

It is because of the rules of the House and the autocratic disposition of the Speaker that the will of the people is not carried out in legislation.

The Speaker is permitted to name all the committees in the House. He designates as chairman of each committee a man who will follow his direction and control, as nearly as may be, the action of the committee in all matters submitted to it. The Speaker expects the chairman to see to it that no bill is reported from the committee that does not meet the Speaker's approval.

Here is what a Republican said about it, a great progressive Representative from the State of Wisconsin. If it was not good, it would not be in this book. This is the statement of Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin, who now graces a seat in the other body, one of the oldest Members in the House of Representatives in point of service. Of course, he never would allow himself to be shackled by those who controlled the leadership of that body. He always spoke out and declared himself, and this is one of his memorable utterances, and he received the indorsement of his people. He said:

I agree with the gentleman from Mississippi—

Mr. WILLIAMS had then spoken—that there is altogether too much power concentrated in the Speaker of the House of Representatives. It is more power, gentlemen, than ought to be given any man in any government that pretends to be republican in form and democratic in spirit.

It was such utterances as these upon the part of progressive Republicans, together with the great fight made by the united democracy of the country, that forced Cannonism from its high place in the Government service and created a system over there in the House under which the committee on committees makes the appointments on committees and under which this committee is chosen, not by the Speaker but is elected by all the representatives of the American people.

It is not out of place for me to say that it was only after the fight led by the present distinguished Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] and my friend here, the leader of the Democrats to-day in the Senate, the senior Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], and other distinguished Democratic Senators on this floor and in the country, who were then Members of that body, that we drove from power Cannonism, which meant nothing more or less than "Reedism," and as soon as they took control they took away from the Speaker the power to name committees, and the Representatives selected a committee to make the appointments to the various committees in the House. It was such a progressive movement upon the part of the representatives of the American people that the Republicans adopted our tactics and followed our procedure, and the practice has worked so well that it still holds good in the House of Representatives.

I can show how practically the same thing has been done in this body. The old order of things, the autocracy holding high places and dominating the proceedings of the Senate, has been changed and the Senators elect for themselves the committees to transact the public business. We had thought that gag rules and "Reedism" and "Cannonism" and autocracy had been dethroned, but when such a leader as the distinguished Senator from Kansas, who is recognized not only in this body but throughout the country as one of the spokesmen for the majority in matters of procedure and legislation, takes the position he did this morning, to try to resurrect and revive "Reedism" in this body and through his charming eloquence persuades the Presiding Officer to rule as he did, then it behooves some of us to speak out and give notice to the American people what is about to happen again.

I can read many other very convincing statements from this book. For instance, it is said on this page:

The way to get rid of Cannonism is to get rid of CANNON.

It says, however—Mr. Busby, private secretary to Speaker CANNON, is quoted. He knows, and this campaign textbook quotes from Mr. Busby. Let us see what he says about Cannonism. I do not think I have read this, so it is going to be information to me as well as to my friend from Kansas:

As a final stroke the chairman said: "Then, Mr. Speaker, this bill is to fail by the will of one man, who is in the chair by our votes. We have no redress from this one-man power." "Yes, you have," replied the Speaker.

He was talking about Speaker CANNON then.

You have a way to pass your bill. You placed me in the chair to shoulder the responsibility of the legislation here enacted. In my view I can not assume the responsibility for this bill. You can elect a new Speaker to-day and pass your bill, if you can find one who will accept that responsibility; but if you leave me in the chair that bill will not become a law.

Mr. Busby, private secretary to Mr. CANNON in those days, was relating an incident between one Member of the House and the Speaker of the House touching the passage of legislation. That was the way autocracy enshrouded itself during the days of Reedism and Cannonism.

Now, Mr. President, the hour of 2 o'clock has arrived, much to my regret, because I wanted to read some other interesting passages, which I am sure the country, if not Senators on the other side, would be interested in hearing. Here Senators are trying to storm a fortress and pass what they say is a great and important piece of legislation, so that they can go back to the colored population in their respective States and say, "Look what we did." Yet, as I now scan the other side of the Chamber, I see 54 vacant seats over there which ought to be occupied by 54 Republican Senators, all of whom will try to make their constituents believe they were doing all in their power to enact the bill into law. Here the issue is before the Senate, and 54 of them have deserted their posts and refused to stay here and join hands with the 3 on the other side who are here to pass legislation—4, I should say, because I did not count the Presiding Officer. If their constituencies, who are interested, as Senators on the other side believe, in this proposed legislation, should look down from the galleries now on the other side of the aisle and see the 54 vacant seats of their 54 Senators who are away from duty when this important matter is being considered, they would be humiliated as well as disgusted.

I ask for the yeas and nays on the important amendment which I have offered and which I want to state again, so there will be no confusion about it.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. HARRISON. Certainly.

Mr. CURTIS. If the Senator would ask unanimous consent, there would be no objection to amending the Journal as he suggests.

Mr. HARRISON. But I want to put Senators on record to see if there is a single Senator who will vote against incorporating in the Journal, the record of this body, the fact that we had prayer yesterday, even though the proceedings may be obnoxious and humiliating.

On my motion I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. If the Senator will allow me, there is not a quorum present. I think a quorum should be here to vote on the important proposition. I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There has been no business transacted since the last call for a quorum was made.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I think that is very unfortunate, because there are so few here, but we will ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Mississippi moves an amendment of the Journal in the manner designated by him, and the yeas and nays are demanded.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the reading clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BROUSSARD (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. MOSES]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST] and vote "yea."

Mr. FERNALD (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from New Mexico [Mr. JONES]. On this matter I am not informed as to how he would vote, so I withhold my vote.

Mr. STANLEY (when his name was called). I transfer my general pair with the junior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. ERNST] to the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] and vote "yea."

Mr. SUTHERLAND (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as before with reference to my pair and its transfer, I vote "yea."

Mr. WATSON (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as before with reference to my pair and transfer, I vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. GLASS. Transferring my pair to the junior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GERRY], I vote "yea."

Mr. HALE. I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS] to the junior Senator from Nevada [Mr. ODDIE] and vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 49, nays 8, as follows:

So the Senate refused to adjourn until Friday next.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I note that the Journal of yesterday states at the beginning that the Vice President being absent the President pro tempore took the chair. The next mention of the occupant of the chair is that the Vice President resumed the chair immediately before a vote was taken. The Journal, however, does not state exactly at what time the Vice President resumed the chair or when the President pro tempore of the Senate relinquished the chair. It is most important that the Journal should state just when the Vice President took the chair and when the President pro tempore relinquished the chair. So I move that the Journal be amended to show that fact; and on that motion I ask for the yeas and nays.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair does not exactly understand what the motion is.

Mr. HARRISON. I am sorry that I did not express myself more clearly.

The VICE PRESIDENT. What does the Senator move that the Senate shall do?

Mr. HARRISON. Although the Journal did not show that a prayer was delivered, the Senate has very wisely agreed to insert the prayer; but it does show that, the Vice President being absent, the President pro tempore took the chair. That is splendid; that is fine. The Journal proceeds to the point where a vote was taken and it shows that the Vice President was then in the chair; but the Journal does not show just when the Vice President took the chair and when the President pro tempore relinquished the chair. That fact is very important and should be noted in the Journal.

The VICE PRESIDENT. What does the Senator move?

Mr. HARRISON. I have moved that the Journal be amended so that the exact time, as far, of course, as human frailties can ascertain it, be placed in the Journal when the Vice President assumed the chair.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President.—

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. HARRISON. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I ask unanimous consent that the correction of the Journal suggested by the Senator from Mississippi be made.

Mr. McKELLAR. I object.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, the force of the suggestion I am making is demonstrated when a Senator on the other side reinforces my argument and speaks in behalf of the amendment which I seek to make to the Journal. So I ask for the yeas and nays upon the amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is unable to state the motion.

Mr. HARRISON. Perhaps the Secretary may be able to state it. He probably understands it thoroughly. I thought I explained it satisfactorily.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair may be in error; but the Chair assumes that when a Senator moves to amend the Journal he has to state what changes he wishes to have made in the Journal.

Mr. HARRISON. I will make the motion in this way: That somewhere in the Journal between the place where it states that the Vice President was absent and the President pro tempore was in the chair and the place where it states that the Vice President resumed the chair, it shall state "at approximately 1 o'clock"—because the Journal should speak accurately; and I recall yesterday it was somewhere about that time when the Vice President took the chair—"at approximately 1 o'clock p. m. the Vice President came into the Senate Chamber and took the chair."

The VICE PRESIDENT. On this question the yeas and nays have been requested and ordered. The Secretary will call the roll.

The reading clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President, I desire to be heard.

Mr. HARRISON. A point of order, Mr. President. The roll call has been started.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I submit that there has been no response.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will have to rule that there has been no response. The Senator from Ohio has the floor.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President, I certainly shall not lend myself to the filibuster against the antilynching bill which has been going on here for a couple of days, and therefore shall occupy but a very few minutes; but I want, in the time I am on my feet, to call the attention of the country, so far as I may, to the situation as it now confronts the Senate.

My experience here has been very limited; but so far as my observation goes, and so far as my reading of history has gone, it has not disclosed heretofore in the parliamentary history of this country such a situation as is now presented.

In order that the Record may contain for convenient reference in one place the statements that were made by the distinguished leader on the other side, I propose to read some of the things that he said yesterday. Before I do that, I want to commend him for his entire frankness. The same thing could not be said of all of those who are filibustering to prevent a vote on the Dyer antilynching bill. The leader, the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], was perfectly frank. He announced that it was a filibuster, announced what the purpose of it was, and stated that he and his party assumed full responsibility for it. That frankness is characteristic of the Senator, and certainly is most commendable.

He said, in part, yesterday:

We are not disguising what is being done on this side of the Chamber. It must be apparent, not only to the Senate but to the country, that an effort is being made to prevent the consideration of a certain bill, and I want to be perfectly candid about it. The bill is known in the RECORD as the Dyer bill, I believe; I have forgotten its number.

Then the Senator went on with his usual clarity and eloquence to state that which nobody doubted, that he was, of course, opposed to mob violence.

Then, farther down, he says:

I think that if the bill became a law it would threaten the very fabric of our Government, and it is not going to become a law at this session of Congress.

I do not say that captiously. I think all men here know that under the rules of the Senate when 15 or 20 or 25 men say that you can not pass a certain bill, it can not be passed. You could not pass your tariff bill last summer until we agreed to vote on it, and you are not going to get an agreement to vote on this bill. It is perfectly apparent that you are not going to get an agreement to vote on it. If you should change the rules, and adopt a cloture rule under which the majority would have a right to cut off debate, the majority could pass any bill they wanted to.

The Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR] thereupon interrupted to say:

They could not do it at this session.

Then the Senator from Alabama concluded by saying:

They could not do it at this session, of course, and under the rules of procedure in the Senate this is an impossible proposition.

Then, a little bit later on, so as to make it perfectly clear where the responsibility for this situation lies, the Senator from Alabama said:

I want to say right now to the Senate that if the majority party insist on this procedure they are not going to pass the bill, and they are not going to do any other business. There are a large number of men whose names have been sent to the Senate, who have been appointed to important offices, and who are entitled to confirmation, and who ought to be confirmed; but they are not going to be confirmed; we are going to transact no more business until we have an understanding about this bill.

Later on in the discussion the distinguished Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] rose in his place and interrupted the Senator from Alabama to say that in his judgment, after talking with a great many Senators on the other side of the Chamber, he was of opinion that the position of the Senator from Alabama was absolutely the attitude of the Senators on the other side of the Chamber.

In other words, it was then and there clearly stated that it was the definite purpose of Senators on the other side of the Chamber—that it was the policy of the Democratic Party—not only to prevent the enactment of this legislation, but even to prevent its consideration. It is not sufficient for Senators to say that they are opposed to this provision of the bill or that provision of the bill when they do not have the courage even to permit a discussion of the bill.

Mr. President, there is no occasion for heat or excitement about this matter, or for some of the bitterness or sectionalism that was manifested yesterday. It is simply a cold proposition that is put up to the Senate as to whether the Senate of the United States can or can not do business. Here is a majority on this side of the aisle, and they are told, and correctly told under the rules as they stand now, that a minority of 15 or 20 or 25 propose to say to the Senate that no business can be transacted.

As I said when I rose in my place, I commend the Senator from Alabama for his courage and his frankness; but I want to state to the Senate that the time is coming, and I think it is here now, when the Senate will have to work out some method whereby it can transact business. If it does not reform its methods of procedure so that a majority in the Senate can express its will, the people of the country will find out a way to reform the Senate. In other words, we are face to face with a condition that in my judgment demands such a readjustment and amendment of the rules of the Senate as will permit the business of the people of the country to be transacted and not put it within the control of a small minority to say to the majority, "Not only shall you not pass this bill but you shall not discuss it, you shall not consider it, you shall not take it up for examination."

That is the situation to which I wish to call attention—that it is the policy of the Democratic Party, for which the distinguished Senator from Alabama and the distinguished Senator from North Carolina so ably speak and which they so ably lead, not only to defeat this legislation but absolutely to prevent any consideration of it; and under the rules they can do it and are doing it.

I said I regretted the note of bitterness and sectionalism that was interjected. I think there is no occasion for that, because it is lamentably true that the crime of lynching is not peculiar to any section of this country. Lynchings have occurred in very many of the States; but I was sorry to hear the statement made by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR] in which I think he was misled as to the facts, because in some heat he said, at page 338 of the RECORD, in part:

Some of the worst lynching crimes that have ever occurred in this country have occurred in States of the North.

I have no objection to that statement. I think that is true. Then the Senator from Tennessee went on to say:

They are getting to be more prevalent in the North in comparison to the total population, than in the South.

I doubt whether we get far in promoting the interests of the country by going into a discussion of that kind. I simply want to say to the Senator from Tennessee that he is absolutely mistaken in that statement; that if he will take pains to look at the figures he will find that he is entirely wrong, and I know that he wants to be fair.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, of course I want to be absolutely accurate. I shall be very glad if the Senator will put in the RECORD the figures of the various lynchings in the country, so that we can see just exactly what they are. If he has the figures, let them show what the facts are.

The Senator will recall that there have been a number of lynchings in Ohio and Illinois and other Northern States, where great cruelty was exhibited by those who did the lynching. I hope he will put the figures in the RECORD, also the figures of the colored population, so as to show the exact facts, so that there can not be any controversy about them.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President, my attention was drawn to the inaccuracy of the Senator's statement first from a study of the report on this bill. I think, if I may have permission, in response to the Senator's suggestion, I will incorporate in my remarks at this point a paragraph at the top of page 5 of the report which will shed some light on the subject. If I have that permission, I shall incorporate that in my remarks without reading it.

Mr. McKELLAR. Inasmuch as it is to be used in contradiction of something I have said, I should prefer that the Senator read it.

Mr. WILLIS. All right; I will read the paragraph.

Mr. McKELLAR. I want to make this suggestion to the Senator—

Mr. WILLIS. Will the Senator permit me to read this paragraph, so that it will appear where it should be?

Mr. McKELLAR. Certainly.

Mr. WILLIS. I am reading from the committee report:

In the 30 years from 1889 to 1918, 3,224 persons were lynched, of whom 2,522 were negroes, and of these 50 were women. The North had 219; the West, 156; Alaska and unknown localities, 15; and the South, 2,834, with Georgia leading with 386 and Mississippi following with 373. Yet in Georgia negroes paid taxes on 1,664,368 acres, and owned property assessed at $47,423,499. Of the colored victims 19 per cent were accused of rape and 9.4 per cent of attacks upon women. In the year 1919, 77 negroes, 4 whites, and 2 Mexicans were lynched. Ten of the negroes were ex-soldiers; one was a woman. During 1920 there were 65 persons lynched; 6 were white and 59 were negroes; 31 were hanged, 15 shot, 8 burned—

I pause there to say, Mr. President, that this is the only country in the world that pretends to be civilized that permits burnings at the stake; and yet when legislation is proposed, when it is sought to bring to officials and to communities, whether they are North or South or East or West, a sense of their responsibility in that matter, Senators cry out about the rights of the States and about the liberties of the people. What State or what people have any right to take the life of a man contrary to the law and to burn him at the stake?

But I read further from the report:

Two drowned, 1 flogged to death, and 8 in manner unknown; 24 were charged with murder, 2 assault on woman, 15 attack on woman, 3 insulting woman, 1 attempted attack on woman, 1 attack on boy, 1 stabbing man, and 3 assaulting man.

I think that is all in the paragraph that refers to the matter; and since the Senator from Tennessee has suggested that I point out the figures, I have done so. I should not have introduced such a subject if he had not made a statement which was so inaccurate.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator give us the figures as to the relative colored population in those various sections of the country?

Mr. WILLIS. I have not those figures before me. I have no objection at all to the Senator getting them and putting them in the RECORD.

Mr. McKELLAR. Of course the accuracy of the statement can not be determined unless we have the relative figures as to the colored population.

Mr. WILLIS. Of course, Mr. President, that is not the point, because these lynchings have occurred amongst the white population as well as the colored population.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President—

Mr. WILLIS. I yield to the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. WATSON. The difference between the two Senators, as I understand, is this—that however many of these lynchings may occur in the North, whether there be few or many, whether there be one or a thousand, we are entirely willing that legislation shall be enacted to prevent them in the future.

Mr. WILLIS. We are asking for such legislation.

Mr. WATSON. While however many may occur in the South, whether few or many, they are unwilling that any legislation of this kind shall be passed to prevent that crime in the future, which is the difference between the two sections.

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes, and there is another difference—that we are upholding the Constitution of the United States, and Senators over on the other side are going contrary to the express provisions of the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, will the Senator from Ohio yield to me just for one moment?

Mr. WILLIS. I yield to my friend from Arkansas for a question.

Mr. CARAWAY. I just want to show how inaccurate the Senator from Indiana is. Ordinarily he is absolutely letter-perfect on any statement, and I think a very great deal of him; but this bill that you are championing does not propose to punish anybody for the peculiar kind of lynchings you have in your section. You say that if a man is lynched for having committed a crime, then the Federal Government shall have jurisdiction, but if you kill him because he wants to work in a mine, or as you did in Indiana when you had your riots, or in East St. Louis when you had your negro riots, that is all right. In other words, it is a crime to kill a man if he is guilty of a crime, but it is no crime if you kill an innocent man. That is the result of the language of your bill and if the Senator will take the time to read it before he eulogizes it, he will discover it is not attempting to try to punish the kind of crimes that prevail in his section; that is, where you lynch a man simply because he is black, as they did in Springfield, Ohio, and as they have done in Illinois, as they did in East St. Louis, or, as they did in Marion, Ill., kill him because he wanted to work. But you want to make it a crime to kill a negro who assaults a woman; but it is no offense, under this bill, if you kill 40 men who simply want to make a living for their wives and children. That is the difference between the two sections.

Mr. WILLIS. I prefer to have my friend from Arkansas and my friend from Indiana carry on their discussion in their own time.

Mr. CARAWAY. If the Senator will pardon me, inasmuch as we were all engaging in the filibuster, and the Senator from Ohio has already aided us 30 minutes, I thought he would not object. We are in one common cause, the winning of the filibuster.

Mr. WILLIS. The Senators can arrange that matter in their own time.

Mr. CARAWAY. Very well.

Mr. WILLIS. I started to give the facts to the Senator from Tennessee, who seemed to be very much in doubt about some matters.

Mr. McKELLAR. I am not in doubt at all about these matters.

Mr. WILLIS. I wanted to put it charitably. I will say he was wrong. I will state the bald fact, he is absolutely wrong. But since the interruption has been made by my friend from Arkansas, I should like to make this suggestion: If the bill does provide as the Senator from Arkansas suggests—a matter which I very much doubt—then let us act like men, take up the bill and amend it. If this bill is so drawn as not to apply to every section of the country, then it ought to be amended in that particular, and I will vote for an amendment along that line. But the trouble about Senators on the other side is that they will not permit a consideration of the bill, even an opportunity to offer amendments. That is what I am pleading for, the opportunity to take up the bill and perfect it and make it right if it is not.

To come back to my friend from Tennessee, to show how far he was from the facts, I will read his statement in the RECORD. As I say, I should not have thought of replying to this phase of the matter if he had not made the statement, because I do not think the question of place enters into the matter at all. If there have been lynchings in Ohio—and I hang my head in shame and have to admit that there have been—then those guilty of the crime ought to be punished. If there have been lynchings in Arkansas, or anywhere else, those participating ought to be punished. So it is not a matter of the State.

Mr. McKELLAR. May I ask the Senator if those lynchings in Ohio have been punished?

Mr. WILLIS. So far as I know, they have been. I have not made it my business to follow up the cases. But regarding the statement of the Senator, I want to fix him up on that. He said:

They are getting to be more prevalent in the North, in comparison to the total population, than in the South.

Let us see whether that is true. I looked up the figures in the World Almanac, a nonpartisan, or bipartisan or omnipartisan, publication. I took, for example, the State of the distinguished Senator who made the statement. The great State of Tennessee has a population, according to the World Almanac, of 2,337,000. The State of Indiana is nearly the same size, somewhat larger, with a population of 2,930,000. The Senator said in his statement yesterday that, according to the population, lynchings were becoming more prevalent in the Northern States.

Mr. McKELLAR. Of course, the Senator knows I meant in proportion to the colored population.

Mr. WILLIS. I understood the Senator to mean just what he said and what he put in the RECORD.

Mr. McKELLAR. If the Senator just misconstrues my remarks and is undertaking to make an argument based on something I did not say, well and good. I do not think anybody else understood me to say it. Of course, I meant in comparison to the colored population in the various States. No one would have made the statement that they were greater in comparison to the population of the whole country. No one put that construction on it except the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. WILLIS. Of course, if the Senator wants to disavow it, all well and good.

Mr. McKELLAR. I am not disavowing it at all. I am saying just what I said, that in accordance with the colored population they are more prevalent.

Mr. WILLIS. I read it to the Senator. If he has the RECORD let him turn to page 338 and read it. The Senator said:

They are getting to be more prevalent in the North, in comparison to the total population, than in the South.

That is the Senator's language. If he wants to crawl and get away from it, all right.

Mr. McKELLAR. I was talking about the colored population, and everybody understood it that way. Nobody took exception to it, and nobody takes exception to it now, I am sure, except the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President, I decline to yield for the Senator to make a speech he thought he was going to make, but which he did not make. I am answering the speech he made. If he crawls away from it now, that is his lookout.

I have given the population of those two States. In his State during this period, according to this publication, the World Almanac, page 720, from 1885 to 1920 there were 198 lynchings, whereas in the State of Indiana, a larger State, there were 31, about one-sixth of the number.

In Alabama, with a population of 2,348,000, there were 260 lynchings. In Wisconsin, with a population of 2,632,000, there were 5. So there were more than fifty times as many in the southern State.

In Mississippi, with a population of 1,790,000, there were 400 lynchings. In Kansas, with almost the same population, 1,679,000, there were 37; less than one-tenth of the number that occurred in Mississippi.

In Georgia, with a population of 2,895,000, there were 528 lynchings. In Iowa, with a population of 2,404,000, there were 10.

In Texas, with a population of 4,663,000, there were 304 lynchings, and I am ashamed to say that in the State of Ohio, with a population of 5,759,000, there were 20 lynchings.

I have only referred to this because I want to get my friend the Senator from Tennessee straight, and call attention to this fact that it is not a sectional matter, it is not a racial matter, but it is a matter which, in my judgment, goes to the very life of this Republic. Either we shall have in this Republic orderly liberty, regulated by law, or else we shall descend to the weltering chaos of the mob.

I think this pending bill is a good bill. I think it is constitutional and that it ought to become a law. I think it will aid in the eradication of this frightful danger to free institutions and this burning shame to the American Republic. At all events, it seems to me the part of courageous, honorable men is to permit this bill to come before the Senate. Then, if it develops that amendments should be made, we can make the amendments.

So I say in conclusion that I think, first, the thing that is before the Senate now is the question as to whether the Senate is going to transact business or whether it will permit itself to be controlled by a minority. Second, whether by passing the antilynching bill it is willing to take this step in the direction of the maintenance in this country of free civilized government as distinguished from mob violence. I am for the law and against the mob.

Mr. NEW. Mr. President, I desire to address myself very briefly to the bill before the Senate and to the situation with which we are at this moment faced.

Long before I became a Member of this body I was convinced that some such measure as the Dyer bill was absolutely necessary if we are ever going to emerge from the condition, not of semibarbarism but of complete barbarism, under which we rest so long as we permit the perpetration of such crimes as have been enacted within recent years, both in the South and in the North. Like the Senator from Ohio [Mr. WILLIS] I do not mean to make this a sectional matter at all. I absolutely disavow any such purpose. I would be for the passage of the bill if there were not a colored man in the United States. I would be for it because I believe it is absolutely necessary to the credit of this people as a Nation that we stop these outrages. There is no country in the world to-day that is regarded as even as halfway civilized in which such outrages occur as are reported with almost weekly regularity from sections of the United States. I must say that they predominate in the South, as everyone knows, and for reasons which are peculiar to the South, of course. But wherever they are, they should be stopped, and if they can not be stopped under the laws of States, made in conformity with the sentiment of their respective communities, they should be stopped by Federal legislation.

The question of the constitutionality of this bill has been brought in question. Senators on the other side who are opposing it assert that it is unconstitutional. If I believed it were unconstitutional, certainly under my oath I would not vote for it or stand here advocating its passage. I do not believe any such thing. I do not believe the Constitution of the United States ever contemplated that sort of crime at which the bill is aimed—I mean the crime of lynching—should be perpetrated in the United States without let or hindrance.

The Constitution of the United States contains a provision in the fifth amendment that no citizen shall be deprived of his life or liberty without due process of law, and yet men are deprived of their lives, and deprived of them by methods that are most shocking, most revolting, and not to be tolerated anywhere in any civilized land.

Mr. CARAWAY. May I ask the Senator a question?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. NEW. I yield for a question, yes; but not for anything but a question. The assertion has been made that there have been lynchings even in my own State. It is lamentably true. I was myself an eyewitness to the concluding scenes of one in the days when I was a newspaper reporter, long ago, and the impression the incident made upon me has rested in my mind ever since. It was a white man who was lynched; and I think that if a man's life should be forfeited under the laws for a crime committed, that man's life should have been forfeited; but it should have been forfeited by due process of law, as it was not.

I regret to say, too, because I anticipate the question, that no one was ever punished for the crime. An attempt was made to ascertain who was responsible for it, but beyond the fact that from 50 to 75 people congregated, seized the man, took him from a jail, took him out and hanged him, and riddled his body with bullets, nothing was ever known as to who the individuals were.

I also witnessed another attempt at lynching, which was frustrated by a courageous sheriff and a half dozen courageous deputies, who threatened to empty a lot of sawed-off shotguns into a crowd if they did not disperse—and they would have done it.

But the question of locality has nothing to do with it. It is the question of right and wrong, a question as to whether this country will permit itself to longer labor under the just criticism that attaches as the result of permitting the continuance of this sort of thing, or whether it shall be discontinued, by whatever means it may be found necessary to stop it.

Much has been said about the autocratic methods of the Senate. Nobody in this body holds the leader of the minority in greater respect than I do. I have for him a genuine feeling of personal affection as well as the highest possible regard for him both as a gentleman and as a legislator. But, Mr. President, what can be more autocratic than for the leader of the minority to stand before the majority and say to us, "You shall not legislate upon this question."

The Senator from Alabama in the course of his remarks said that we were injecting the bill into these proceedings. I find by consulting the record that the bill has been on the calendar since the 28th day of last July. True, it was not made the unfinished business of the Senate, but it was given a place in exact accordance with the custom of the Senate. It appears just as every other bill comes before this body. What does it displace? It is said that appropriation bills will be held up in order that consideration of this bill may not be had.

Why, sir, the appropriation bills are not even here. They have not passed the House. They are not before the Senate at all. Neither is there anything else before the Senate that is of crying importance. We are simply deferring all legislation because this one piece of proposed legislation is objectionable to a minority.

Now, Mr. President, the Senator from Ohio [Mr. WILLIS] spoke also of what we were unable to do under the rules which govern this body. There are many Senators here who view with much apprehension any change in the rules of this body which shall curtail debate. But, sir, this is the thing, this attitude of a minority, which is going to compel a change in the rules governing the Senate, whether there be those among us who may be regarded as ultraconservative and do not want to see those changes or not. Public sentiment, as a result of this kind of opposition and obstruction, is going to require such a modification of the rules as will permit the Senate at least to perform the public business.

The Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CARAWAY] said that the bill does not cover lynchings in the North. That is begging the question. If it does not, it is the privilege of the Senator from Arkansas to move any amendment that may be required to make the bill meet his views, to make it meet the situation that may be presented as the result of a crime committed in some State other than his own. That is the course that must be taken as to every measure that comes before this body. No one of them, perhaps, suits every Senator in its original form, and it is in order that the bill may be amended, that it may have due consideration, that we are trying to bring it up at this time. As I have said, I am heartily in favor of its passage, because I believe it is necessary to enforce the clear provision of the Constitution of the United States—that provision which guarantees to every man that he shall not be deprived of life or liberty without due process of law.

Mr. President, our newspapers are filled with reports of Armenian atrocities. In our churches nearly every Sunday the pulpits ring with appeals to the American people for aid for those who are the victims of outrages at the hands of the Turk. We have public meetings to denounce the pogroms in Russia. We send missionaries to those countries to educate against the perpetration of that sort of crime. And yet, Mr. President, nowhere in the world have outrages more dastardly been perpetrated than on the Continent of America and within the confines of the United States. I say that with shame and mortification as an American citizen. Some way must be found within the limits of the Constitution of the United States to stop this sort of thing if we are not to be justly condemned by all the other peoples of the world. I am in favor of the passage of the Dyer bill.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, I presume all our purposes are the same. Some of us frankly announce them and others seek to conceal. We are all engaged in a filibuster. The Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] announced for this side of the Chamber that as our purpose until this measure should be laid aside. The Senator from Ohio [Mr. WILLIS] stopped a roll call that he might read into the RECORD nearly everything which was said yesterday, so that, without being put to the trouble of thinking up anything original to say, he could consume nearly an hour of the time of the Senate. Personally I have no objection to his doing it, and while I know that he will know that I am not critical of him, I sometimes think what he reads expresses more than what he says of his own invention. Then the better part of his speech this afternoon was the part which he read from the RECORD, although all of it was good. I shall be glad, at any time when I have the floor, if he wants to interrupt me and inject another speech as good as that, because I have listened to many of his speeches, and I think it the best he has ever made. He says it is "without heat," and then makes so much noise and beats the desk so viciously that he illustrates what he says without saying it.

I have said that this bill, the so-called Dyer antilynching bill, is not intended to become operative in that section of the country which the proponents of the measure represent. In answer to that the distinguished Senator from Indiana [Mr. NEW] said, "Let us get it up and amend it," but they have had it for months and months in their Senate committee, and the Senator who reported it said yesterday that his attention 10 months ago had been called to the fact that it would not punish people residing in other sections than the South. These Senators favoring the measure made no effort to amend it, and we have no assurance now that if we should consent to its consideration the majority would not make the bill conform to what the purpose of the bill was, merely to be a stab at the South and to excuse any offenses that may be committed in the North. There is no assurance that an amendment would be accepted, though the Senator from Indiana asks us to permit the bill to be considered and even said I might offer that amendment. Of course, it was generous in the Senator to offer me the privilege of offering it, provided I could get recognition from the Chair to do so, and I am duly grateful to him.

There is another thought to which I wish to call the attention of the Senator from Indiana which occurred to me when he was reading the fifth amendment to the Constitution, which reads as follows:

No person shall be held to answer for a capital or otherwise infamous crime unless on a presentment or indictment of a grand jury, except in cases arising in the land or naval forces, or in the militia, when in actual service in time of war or public danger; nor shall any person be subject for the same offense to be twice put in jeopardy of life or limb; nor shall be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself; nor be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law; nor shall private property be taken for public use without just compensation.

That thought is that amendment never meant that a man might not lose his life without due process of law, because every murder that is committed involves some one losing his life without due process of law, and the Constitution never intended to say that it guaranteed that man would not be murdered. If the amendment gives any jurisdiction to invade the State and punish murder, it includes private murder as well as mob violence. If it is merely the saving of life that appeals to the Senator from Indiana, he ought to be broad enough that he should want to save the man from private murder as much as from mob violence. That section of the Constitution, of course everybody knows who takes the time to read it, means that no State, no official of a State, no tribunal created by the State should deprive a man of his life without due process of law. That is, if the State of Indiana should execute a man who had been accused of crime without giving him a trial, a hearing, the State would be denying him due process of the law. That is what the Constitution of the United States prevents. That is what the Supreme Court said in passing upon a measure somewhat like the proposed bill, that it referred to official acts of the State, not to private crimes.

It is the act of officials, people who pretend to act under some legislation or with some executive power, who pretend to act by some process that is given to them to execute a law, that is what is meant as denying to one the due process of law. That is what the Constitution meant, but the Senators who are so anxious to pass this particular bill, I presume, are not very much concerned about what the Constitution really meant. I understood the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. EDGE] yesterday to say that he was perfectly willing to encroach a little upon the Constitution in order to pass this particular legislation.

Again I am calling attention to what is apparent, and for this reason: Here is a bill which undertakes to punish mobs if they lynch a man guilty of an offense, however heinous it may be. If he is lynched because of his race, his occupation, his place of dwelling, or because he is unpopular, the framers of this measure are willing that the mob may kill for any of these causes; but if the one lynched be guilty of an offense, if he be guilty of outraging a woman and then meets summary justice by the hands of a mob, they, the proponents of this bill, say, "We will not stand for that. You may kill the innocent, but you must not kill the guilty without becoming amenable to the laws of these United States."

Here is the truth about the matter: I am sure, although I have no way to substantiate it, that a society known as the society for the protection of the rights of colored people wrote this bill and handed it to the proponents of it. These people had but one idea in view, and that was to make rape permissible, and to allow the guilty to go unpunished if that rape should be committed by a negro on a white woman in the South. That was the idea in the minds of the men who wrote the bill.

The society handed it to the committee and the committee, after months of hearings and consideration, reported it favorably with that idea written into it. That is what it was intended to do. It was intended to encourage crime; it was to encourage a negro to believe that the strong arm of the Federal Government was going to be thrust down into the Southern States in order to protect him and save him from punishment, however infamous his crime might be. I say that no such blunder as that could have been written by anybody who wanted, as the Senator from Indiana says he does, the absolute enforcement of the law in all the States. No one could have made any such blunder as that; no lawyer could ever have written this bill as it is without that was his intention, and no latter-day amendment will take out the object and the purpose of the framers of the bill. I do not care what may happen to the bill in the future, that is the purpose of it, and that is the purpose which was in the mind of whoever wrote the bill and gave it to the committee.

Suppose we pass the bill. I have an idea that we would not thereby prevent a single act of mob violence. We might cause a great deal of annoyance and disturbance. We who believe in prohibition transferred to the Federal Government the joint power of enforcing the prohibition law, but I will venture the assertion that there is fifty times more whisky now sold in the State of Ohio than there was before that action was taken.

It is more difficult to enforce the law against the illicit sale of liquor in Indiana since the Federal Government assumed the enforcement of the law than it was before. Such legislation broke down the public morale of the States. They said, "Why, let Uncle Sam do it; he has undertaken to do it." The result is that the States do not enforce that law, and the Federal Government can not.

We say frankly that we do not want this bill to be passed, because it is a partisan bill, whatever Senators who favor it may say to the contrary. It is proposed to be passed for the purpose of paying a political debt. It was written in order that the peculiar kinds of violence which are committed in the States of Senators who are its proponents will not fall within its provisions. Where men are murdered because they want to work or do not want to work, or where, because of their color, they are not wanted in some particular locality of a city in which they might wish to live, as they were in Chicago and in East St. Louis, this bill does not give any protection. It is therefore only where the man has committed a public offense or is believed to have committed a public offense, or where it is believed he intends to commit a public offense, that the provisions of the bill will apply. If a man is killed for any act not a crime, his murderers go unwhipped of justice; if he is killed for the most fiendish crime, then it is desired that the Federal Government shall punish his punishers.

Whether it is true or not I do not know, but it was published in the Baltimore Evening Sun and the St. Louis Post Dispatch that the bill was reported not with the expectation of its passage; that all the lawyers on the Committee on the Judiciary—and they are all lawyers—except two agreed that the bill was not constitutional.

I was not present, of course; I am not a member of the Committee on the Judiciary, but it was published in the Baltimore Evening Sun and the St. Louis Post-Dispatch some time ago that when the bill was reported out most of the lawyers on the committee reserved the right to vote against it. I do not know what the motive might have been which prompted Senators to report a bill under such circumstances.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator from Arkansas?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. CARAWAY. Yes, I yield.

Mr. CUMMINS. I am a member of the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. CARAWAY. I knew that, sir.

Mr. CUMMINS. And I think the last statement made by the Senator from Arkansas is not well founded. It is not true that all but two members of the Judiciary Committee were of the opinion that the proposed law was unconstitutional. This is the fact: There were various phases of the question presented by the bill as it passed the House of Representatives which met with very great opposition of some members of the Judiciary Committee. A good many members of that committee were of the opinion that section 4 of the bill was of very doubtful constitutionality as it passed the other House; and that was true also as to the section of the bill relating to the liability of municipalities for crimes of this sort. I am sure that a majority of the Senators who are members of the Judiciary Committee, however, are of the opinion that the bill as it has been reported to the Senate is constitutional. I should be sorry to think that any member of that committee would vote to report a bill favorably unless he believed that the bill proposed constitutional action.

I am rather surprised at the statement of the Senator from Arkansas that the bill has a sectional operation. I wish to be entirely fair, of course.

Mr. CARAWAY. I am sure of that.

Mr. CUMMINS. The propaganda, if you please, or the motive which initiated this bill, came from those who had suffered or believed they had suffered from a failure to enforce the law in the South.

Mr. CARAWAY. Will the Senator from Iowa state just who did frame the bill?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not know. I have never inquired as to who framed the bill.

Mr. CARAWAY. To whom does the Senator refer when he says that the bill was instigated by those who had suffered and had received no redress in the South?

Mr. CUMMINS. To be perfectly frank about the matter, I will say that the initiation of the bill came from the Negro race.

Mr. CARAWAY. Does the Senator know what particular class of negroes were responsible for it? I am sure the Senator knows, because he says it was initiated by people in the South who had suffered.

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not know; I have never talked with anyone who was connected with the origin of the bill; but, as a matter of common observation, it is easy for me to believe that the origin of the bill came from the persons who are interested in protecting the negroes.

Mr. CARAWAY. In the South?

Mr. CUMMINS. Yes; I think I may say in the South, because—

Mr. CARAWAY. They do not object to shooting negroes down by the dozens in East St. Louis and Chicago, I reckon?

Mr. CUMMINS. What I say is that when the bill was drawn and when it was reported by the Judiciary Committee it was made applicable to every section of the country, and the offense is just the same in Illinois as in Alabama or Arkansas.

Mr. CARAWAY. Let me ask the Senator a question then. Why was there written into the bill in section 1 the following language:

That the phrase "mob or riotous assemblage" when used in this act shall mean an assemblage composed of three or more persons acting in concert for the purpose of depriving any person of his life without authority of law as a punishment for or to prevent the commission of some actual or supposed public offense?

Why is the measure limited to punishing those mobs which put somebody to death who has committed a crime instead of saying that if a mob shall deprive a man of his life its members shall be guilty?

Mr. CUMMINS. So far as I am concerned, if I had been writing the bill I would have used more general terms, but the terms at present in the bill mean precisely that; they are not confined to lynchings that come about on account of an assault by either a white man or a black man upon a negro.

Mr. CARAWAY. Let me ask a question of the Senator as a lawyer. Under this bill if a mob were to assemble and were to hang negroes because they insisted on living in a particular section of a city, as was the case in Chicago, we will say, does the Senator say that under this bill, if it were a law, that mob could be punished?

Mr. CUMMINS. Certainly.

Mr. CARAWAY. What public offense would the negroes in that instance have committed?

Mr. CUMMINS. The bill is designed to reach the situation where a mob or riotous assemblage has committed the act of murder and there has been a failure on the part of the public authorities of the community in which the act was committed to enforce the law.

Mr. CARAWAY. Oh, no. If the Senator will permit me, here is the way the bill reads; it says:

That the phrase "mob or riotous assemblage," when used in this act, shall mean an assemblage composed of three or more persons acting in concert for the purpose of—

Doing what?—

of depriving any person of his life without authority of law—

As what?—

as a punishment—

For what purpose?—

for or to prevent the commission of some actual or supposed public offense.

If a mob puts a man to death for any other purpose, except to punish him for a supposed public offense, or to prevent him from committing such an offense, then it is not covered by the provisions of this bill.

Mr. CUMMINS. The bill covers the case of a mob that proceeds against the person of some one—

Mr. CARAWAY. For what purpose?

Mr. CUMMINS. To punish him.

Mr. CARAWAY. To punish him for what?

Mr. CUMMINS. For some offense which it is alleged or believed he has committed.

Mr. CARAWAY. Yes; some public offense; not a private, but a public offense, which is a violation of the law. Therefore, if a negro moved into a white neighborhood, as he has a perfect legal right to do, where the white people objected to his coming and they mobbed him for that, then this bill would not give any jurisdiction, would it?

Mr. CUMMINS. I am not so sure about that; but sections 3 and 4 of the bill are the effective sections.

Mr. CARAWAY. No; I have cited the section under which the jurisdiction is given.

Mr. CUMMINS. Section 3, if I may point it out to the Senator from Arkansas, provides:

That any State or municipal officer charged with a duty or who possesses the power or authority as such officer to protect the life of any person that may be put to death by any mob or riotous assemblage, or who has any such person in his charge as a prisoner, who fails, neglects, or refuses to make all reasonable efforts to prevent such person from being put to death—

And so forth.

That and the following provisions are the effective provisions of the proposed statute.

Mr. CARAWAY. They are effective, but they are only effective when the crime was committed for this one particular purpose set forth.

Mr. CUMMINS. Oh, no; I think the Senator from Arkansas will change his mind about that.

Mr. CARAWAY. If the Senator will read section 1, which provides the definition and which sets out the only people who can be reached, it merely says:

That the phrase "mob or riotous assemblage," when used in this act, shall mean an assemblage composed of three or more persons acting in concert for the purpose of depriving any person of his life without authority of law as a punishment for or to prevent the commission of some actual or supposed public offense.

If a mob put a man to death for any other reason except that stated it does not come under the provisions of the bill.

Mr. CUMMINS. But if a man in the North were accused by the public generally, or by any part of the public, of the commission of a crime, it would not make any difference what that crime might be.

Mr. CARAWAY. Oh, but what I tried to say, and the Senator did not follow me, was this: The sectional part of it is this: In the South we never do put a negro to death simply because he is a negro. We put him to death, if at all, for some crime. In the North they sometimes shoot him, as they did in East St. Louis, simply because he is black; and you wrote your proposed law so that you could not reach the mob who mobbed the negro for being black, but you could reach the mob who mobbed the negro for outraging a white woman; and therefore I said that you wrote your law so as to make it effective in one section and to excuse the same acts of violence in another section.

Mr. CUMMINS. The only logical conclusion from that reasoning would be that we ought to extend the operation of the act so that any person put to death by a mob or riotous assembly should fall within the operation of this act.

Mr. CARAWAY. Let me ask the Senator a question. Why not, then, make all murder a Federal offense?

Mr. CUMMINS. There is this difference, and when we come to discuss it I shall be very glad to give my reasons for the belief that I hold: It is not true that this bill is founded upon the fifth amendment to the Constitution.

Mr. CARAWAY. Then the Senator from Indiana is wrong.

Mr. CUMMINS. I mean, entirely. That, of course, was taken into consideration; but the real foundation, in my judgment—lawyers do not agree about that; I confess that some of my associates on the committee do not agree with me about it—the real foundation for this statute is the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution, and the occasion upon which the procedure here provided for is to be followed is when citizens of the United States—or of a State, as they are all citizens of the United States—are denied the equal protection of the laws. In my judgment, therein lies the foundation for legislation of this character. I do not contend that every time a man is murdered the United States ought to assume jurisdiction.

Mr. CARAWAY. That man lost his life without due process of law, did he not?

Mr. CUMMINS. He may have done so, and he may not have been denied the equal protection of the laws.

Mr. CARAWAY. Let me ask the Senator a question. If two men kill a man, he has had his due process of law; but if there are three of them, then he has been denied the equal protection of the laws. If that the Senator's reasoning?

Mr. CUMMINS. This legislation assumes that there is greater enormity when a mob or a riotous assembly puts a man to death than when he suffers death by reason of the acts of a single person.

Mr. CARAWAY. In other words, it is a graver crime for three men to kill than for two to kill?

Mr. CUMMINS. I think so.

Mr. CARAWAY. Although he may have been tied and handcuffed when the two killed him, that is not so great an offense as if there was somebody else standing by? I just wanted to know the Senator's reasoning.

Mr. CUMMINS. I think there is a peculiar offense in the mob or riotous assembly. I do not say that we could not extend the jurisdiction of the United States to the point suggested, but I say that this bill does not do it.

Mr. CARAWAY. May I ask the Senator, then, from that last remark, does he believe that under the fourteenth amendment we could make all crimes punishable by Federal law?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not.

Mr. CARAWAY. What crime would not be punishable? This amendment includes both life and property.

Mr. CUMMINS. An amendment that was added to the bill on my motion in the Committee on the Judiciary illustrates my belief in that respect. The Senator will observe that a part of the section was stricken out, and there was inserted:

Provided, That it shall be charged in the indictment—

This is the instance in which individuals may be punished through Federal intervention:

Provided, That it shall be charged in the indictment that by reason of the failure, neglect, or refusal of the officers of the State charged with the duty of prosecuting such offense under the laws of the State to proceed with due diligence to apprehend and prosecute such participants the State has denied to its citizens the equal protection of the laws.

And it is further provided that this fact shall be alleged in the indictment and shall be tried by a jury; and the Federal power acquires no jurisdiction unless a jury of the community finds that by reason of the failure on the part of the State officers to prosecute, apprehend, and punish those who are guilty of a murder through mob or riotous assemblage, the State has failed to extend to its citizens the equal protection of the laws.

Mr. CARAWAY. Let me ask the Senator a question. It is not the Senator's belief, is it, that it adds anything to the constitutional power to write into the bill that certain things must be complied with in the way of allegations in the indictment? In other words, if Congress has the power to legislate, it may do it without the verbiage saying that you must charge in the indictment certain things?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not think so. It is possible that Congress could ascertain and declare that in a certain community or in a certain State the State has failed to extend or has denied to a citizen or to a certain class of citizens the equal protection of the laws. I express no opinion upon that point.

Mr. CARAWAY. It is not the Senator's argument that providing that certain allegations shall be charged in the indictment extends the power of Congress to legislate over crimes, is it?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not assert that it does.

Mr. CARAWAY. I thought the Senator said that was the amendment that made this act constitutional.

Mr. CUMMINS. But I used this to illustrate the temperateness or the reasonableness of the proposal in the bill—that these people shall not be brought within the jurisdiction of the Federal authority until a jury of the community finds that the State has denied to its citizens or to some citizen the equal protection of the laws.

Mr. CARAWAY. Here is the reason why I asked the question: I thought the Senator said that his amendment was the provision which made the proposed measure constitutional—

Mr. CUMMINS. No.

Mr. CARAWAY. And I was curious to know if he thought that merely requiring that certain acts should be alleged in the indictment made it constitutional.

Mr. CUMMINS. No.

Mr. CARAWAY. I misunderstood the Senator. Therefore the amendment offered by the Senator did not add anything to the constitutionality of the bill?

Mr. CUMMINS. My doubt about the constitutionality of that section as it passed the House was that the fact must be ascertained by some one before Congress can act or before the law can become operative. The provision in the bill as it passed the House was that it should be ascertained ex parte and in a summary way by the judge.

Mr. CARAWAY. Does the Senator think that, making the jury find it adds anything to its constitutionality?

Mr. CUMMINS. I think there must be a hearing provided for upon that subject, and in my opinion a hearing by a jury and a determination by a jury was the most available and just method of ascertaining.

Mr. CARAWAY. But that did not add anything to its constitutionality, did it?

Mr. CUMMINS. In my judgment, there must be some ascertainment of it in order to make it constitutional.

Mr. CARAWAY. The court could have ascertained it, could it not?

Mr. CUMMINS. I have some doubt whether even Congress could give a court the power to ascertain the fact.

Mr. CARAWAY. The Senator thinks, then, that the Congress could give to a jury power to ascertain a fact that it could not confer upon a court?

Mr. CUMMINS. I have grave doubt about that.

Mr. CARAWAY. Let me ask the Senator a question. The Senator voted for the eighteenth amendment, did he not?

Mr. CUMMINS. I did.

Mr. CARAWAY. What was the necessity of the eighteenth amendment if we could have written a law saying that if a jury finds that a State is not enforcing the law against the sale of liquor the Federal Government may enforce the State law?

Mr. CUMMINS. There is this objection—

Mr. CARAWAY. There are many objections; but why was not the power there?

Mr. CUMMINS. There are a great many people who believe that we can not constitutionally select certain State laws and enforce them through Federal procedure. I do not care to express an opinion upon that point. I do not see any parallel between the eighteenth amendment and the present case.

Mr. CARAWAY. No; I do not, either, I am frank to say; but I was trying to follow the Senator's reasoning, and I may not have followed him clearly.

Mr. CUMMINS. But all that I rose to say was that this law, so far as the crimes affected by it are concerned, applies with equal force to every part of the United States.

Mr. CARAWAY. Then, again, let me ask the Senator why did he write section 1 in the language that he did?

Mr. CUMMINS. I did not write section 1.

Mr. CARAWAY. Why did the Senator approve it in the language in which it appears?

Mr. CUMMINS. Because I think it does not change the principle that I have just announced.

Mr. CARAWAY. It makes it impossible to punish a riot if the victim happens to be innocent and never has been suspected of being guilty of a crime, but gives jurisdiction only where the man has been put to death either because he committed an offense or because he was thought to have committed one or where he was suspected of having intended to commit a public offense.

Mr. CUMMINS. The only conclusion that the Senator from Arkansas can justly draw from that, as it seems to me, is that the crime is committed oftener in the South than it is in the North; that is, that men are mobbed and lynched oftener on account of the alleged commission of a crime in the South than in the North.

Mr. CARAWAY. Of course. That is the only thing we ever do mob them for in the South.

Mr. CUMMINS. But the law is absolutely uniform in its application.

Mr. CARAWAY. No; with all due deference to the Senator from Iowa, it would be impossible to punish a mob under the provisions of this bill, if it should be enacted into law and be declared constitutional, unless you could show that they put the man to death for the commission of a public offense, or that the mob thought he had committed a public offense, or believed he was going to commit a public offense. If it could be shown that they put him to death because they did not want him to reside in the neighborhood, did not like the church with which he was affiliated, did not like his social pretensions, or whatever it might be, so long as it was not a public offense, then there would be no jurisdiction under this bill.

Mr. CUMMINS. That may be true.

Mr. CARAWAY. Why, of course. That is written in the bill.

Mr. CUMMINS. Nevertheless, the law is of general, equal application.

Mr. CARAWAY. Oh, that is true; but, then, you might write a law providing that all cross-eyed men should be hanged. If you were not cross-eyed you would not be within the scope of the law, although the law was general; and, therefore, to say that the fact that certain people are within the provisions of the law when the law is general gives those people no right to complain of course is begging the question.

Mr. CUMMINS. That is the reason why I say that the Senator's real objection is that the law will find a more frequent application in the South than in the North.

Mr. CARAWAY. Absolutely.

Mr. CUMMINS. But it will find its application in the North just as well as in the South.

Mr. CARAWAY. No. The bill was so written that the peculiar reasons for putting people to death by mobs in the North should not be within the provisions of the law. They shot negroes in East St. Louis because they did not like their color and their smell.

Mr. CUMMINS. That may be so.

Mr. CARAWAY. And the proponents of this measure did not want to punish them for doing that; but if a negro in South Carolina should outrage a white woman and be put to death by her neighbors and friends, you say, "Let us haul up that community and punish them. They punished a negro for an infamous crime. They are bad citizens and ought to be punished," but if you shot a negro simply because you did not like him, as they did in East St. Louis, of course, that is all right. You have a right to do that.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator does not get away from my real conclusion. We have had in the North, lamentably, a great many instances in which men have been lynched or mobbed and killed for the alleged or the believed commission of a crime, have we not?

Mr. CARAWAY. I thought in the North they were particularly desirous to put negroes to death because they did not like their color or their religious beliefs.

Mr. CUMMINS. No; the Senator is thinking of one instance.

Mr. CARAWAY. I will say frankly that I do not know what the peculiar views in Iowa are as to putting people to death by mob violence.

Mr. CUMMINS. Unfortunately, since I have lived in Iowa there have been possibly half a dozen instances of men being lynched simply because they were believed to have committed some crime of great enormity, sometimes murder, sometimes other offenses that are regarded as particularly heinous, and this proposed law would apply to them.

Mr. CARAWAY. But let me ask the Senator a question. Is not the Senator conscious that the proposed law is so drawn that in its operation it would fall upon the South and not upon the North? I am not accusing the Senator of having written it, because he disclaims that. I doubt if he had ever read section 1 with that idea in view.

Mr. CUMMINS. Oh, yes; I have read it.

Mr. CARAWAY. I say with that idea in view, because I do not think the Senator would entertain an idea of that kind. That is what I am trying to say. But the bill is so drawn, as the Senator will admit when he reads it, as to make it applicable to lynchings in the South, but excuses the prevailing methods and means of putting people to death by mobs in the Northern States.

Mr. CUMMINS. Without any definite knowledge on the subject, because I have not collected the information, I venture to say that nine-tenths of the lynchings in the North have been on account of the commission of a crime on the part of the person lynched, or the belief on the part of the lynchers that the person assailed was guilty of crime.

Mr. CARAWAY. What offense does the Senator think the people thought the miners at Marion, Ill., had committed?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not think that would come within this law.

Mr. CARAWAY. It does not come within this law; of course it does not. What does the Senator think the people in Chicago thought as to the offense the negroes had committed there when the riots broke out?

Mr. CUMMINS. That crime in the South would no more come within the law than in the North.

Mr. CARAWAY. They do not commit that crime in the South. They do not shoot men in the South because of their race.

Mr. CUMMINS. I think they do as much as they do in the North.

Mr. CARAWAY. Will the Senator name an instance?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not recall an instance, but I do not think there is any difference between the North and the South so far as crimes of that kind are concerned.

Mr. CARAWAY. I never knew a mob to put a negro to death in the South simply because they did not like his race or occupation. It was always for some offense. In East St. Louis and in Chicago, and here in the good city of Washington, I do not think that was the moving spirit at all.

Mr. CUMMINS. You can not judge a law by peculiar and isolated instances. All I say is that the law is general and uniform.

Mr. CARAWAY. The Senator knows that is begging the question. To repeat my statement, let me write a law that only cross-eyed men should be guilty. You could say that law was uniform and equal because it applied to all cross-eyed men, but all other men who are not cross-eyed would be exempt from its provisions.

This bill has been so written that if the mob is actuated by any motive except to punish a man for a public offense or to prevent his committing a public offense it is not possible for the Federal Government to intervene. Why restrict it? That is what I am trying to find out. What was the motive that made the proponents of the measure restrict its application?

Mr. CUMMINS. The violations of the law would perhaps be found more in the South than in the North.

Mr. CARAWAY. Yes; I am certain whoever wrote the bill was sure of that.

Mr. CUMMINS. But if the Senator desires to bring every lynching under the jurisdiction of the Federal authority I have no objection.

Mr. CARAWAY. I have; I do not want any of it. But may I ask the Senator one more question? The Senator said it was not true that all the lawyers on the committee doubted the constitutionality of the bill. How many did, if I may ask about that?

Mr. OVERMAN. Right here, let me say, I doubt whether it is exactly proper—

Mr. CARAWAY. I doubt it, too.

Mr. OVERMAN. To tell what occurred in the committee.

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not intend to tell what occurred.

Mr. OVERMAN. It has been told.

Mr. CUMMINS. No; it has not.

Mr. OVERMAN. Part has been told.

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not think the Senator told anything that occurred.

Mr. OVERMAN. He read the newspaper account, which, I think, was substantially true. When this bill went before the committee I have no doubt that every lawyer on the committee thought it was unconstitutional, with two exceptions. They so expressed themselves.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator from North Carolina is violating his own precept.

Mr. OVERMAN. I am doing it because the Senator denies that statement. Every man on the committee expressed himself, and among them the Senator from Iowa was the most pronounced in declaring this bill unconstitutional.

Mr. CUMMINS. Certain sections of the bill.

Mr. OVERMAN. Of course. It stayed in the committee some time, and was referred to a subcommittee, of which the Senator was a member. The Senator wrote an amendment, which was the amendment he read, and, if I recollect rightly, he said he had grave doubts about it, but that his amendment would come nearer making it constitutional.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator does not report me with absolute accuracy.

Mr. OVERMAN. Another thing, when the vote was taken, it was very close, the Senator will remember, and the Senator remembers that some four of the Senators reserved the right to vote against the bill on the floor of the Senate because it was unconstitutional.

Mr. CUMMINS. I take it for granted that every member of every committee reserves the right to vote as he pleases when the final vote is taken.

Mr. OVERMAN. That is not my point. That is true; but when a Senator comes out of the committee, when the vote is taken, and says, "I reserve my right to vote against this bill, although I am going to vote to report it to the Senate"—

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not remember how many Senators on the Judiciary Committee made that statement.

Mr. OVERMAN. There were some.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator from North Carolina undoubtedly remembers, and I do not question his statement. But I know the position I myself took, which was that there was no doubt about the constitutionality of section 3 of this bill; that with regard to section 4, I did not believe we could constitutionally decide the question of whether a State had denied to its citizens the equal protection of the laws without a plenary procedure to determine that fact. That was the reason I offered my amendment, and when that amendment was adopted I was entirely content with the constitutionality of the section.

Mr. OVERMAN. My recollection is that the Senator said about his amendment, "If anything will make it constitutional this will do it; but I will always have a doubt about it."

Mr. CUMMINS. No; I do not think I said that. I recognize that there are some questions that lie near the border line, and it is quite impossible to bring lawyers' minds as a whole into uniform judgment with regard to that matter; but I never expressed any doubt about the constitutionality of section 4 as it was amended. With regard to the section imposing a liability upon municipalities which fail to enforce the law, or on officers who fail to enforce the law, I still have some doubt with regard to the constitutionality.

Mr. OVERMAN. I think that is the position the Senator took in the committee.

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not surrender my right to my own judgment, and when I believe that a law is doubtful I have no hesitation in expressing my opinion. I think there is a great deal of doubt about the imposition of a penalty upon a municipality under the circumstances set forth in that section of this bill.

Mr. CARAWAY. Let me ask the Senator about section 6, which reads:

That in the event that any person so put to death shall have been transported by such mob or riotous assemblage from one county to another county during the time intervening between his capture and putting to death, the county in which he is seized and the county in which he is put to death shall be jointly and severally liable to pay the forfeiture herein provided.

Mr. CUMMINS. The answer I have already given to the Senator from North Carolina covers that.

Mr. CARAWAY. Let me go just a step further. I want to tell the Senator what the fact is, and then ask him whether the law would apply. I do not know whether other States have similar constitutions, but in my State a county is merely a subdivision of the State for administrative purposes, and can not be sued, nor can its officers be sued for its torts. The courts have said that a county is a part of the State. It is a quasi corporation merely for administrative purposes, and therefore it can not be sued any more than you can sue the State without its consent. Under that state of facts, does the Senator think you could hold a county in my State under this bill?

Mr. CUMMINS. The law to which the Senator refers is an exception, I assume, because most of the counties of the United States are subject to suits.

Mr. CARAWAY. In our States they are not subject to suits.

Mr. CUMMINS. My other answer is my answer to the question proposed by the Senator from Arkansas. I have a great deal of doubt about the authority of Congress to impose a penalty upon municipalities.

Mr. CARAWAY. Let me ask one other question. As a lawyer, then, does not the Senator hesitate to try to write into law a bill about the constitutionality of which he has a grave doubt, in view of the fact that we swore we would uphold the Constitution?

Mr. CUMMINS. I have no doubt.

Mr. CARAWAY. The Senator has no hesitancy in voting for a bill the constitutionality of which he gravely doubts?

Mr. CUMMINS. I believe this bill as a whole is constitutional. There are two or three provisions in it of which I have grave doubts.

Mr. CARAWAY. Is the Senator willing to vote for a bill as to provisions of which he has grave doubts, and entertains almost a conviction that they are unconstitutional?

Mr. CUMMINS. The answer to that is this, that if I favor a bill as a whole—and I have no doubt about the provisions of the greater part of this bill at all—if I have a doubt I have to resolve it in some way or other, and I resolve that doubt in favor of the provisions of the bill generally. What I might do if that particular question were presented to the Senate I do not say, but I believe that when a State fails to give to all its citizens the equal protection of the law, and that fact is ascertained in a lawful way, then the Federal authority can be given the jurisdiction to punish a crime, whatever it may be.

Mr. CARAWAY. Let me ask the Senator another question. The Senator said that under the fourteenth amendment it is not within the power of Congress to prohibit certain crimes. Will the Senator point out the class of crimes to which he refers?

Mr. CUMMINS. Any case where the evidence was sufficient to prove to a reasonable man that the person accused had been denied the equal protection of the law by the State or through some instrumentality of the State.

Mr. CARAWAY. The fourteenth amendment undertakes to protect property, just as it does persons, and all crimes must be either against the person or the property except those against government. What class of crimes would the Senator say that Congress, if it has the power to prohibit mob violence—

Mr. CUMMINS. Is the Senator now speaking of laws that have been passed by a State affecting property?

Mr. CARAWAY. Oh, no. I understood the Senator to say a while ago that he was not certain that we could not punish individual crime, murder, under the fourteenth amendment.

Mr. CUMMINS. No; I said I would not be willing to extend it to murder.

Mr. CARAWAY. But, as I understand him, the Senator said he thought the Congress had the power to enact laws to punish murder.

Mr. CUMMINS. It has the power to punish murder whenever that murder is committed under such circumstances as to establish before a tribunal authorized to hear the matter that it is a result of the denial of the equal protection of the law.

Mr. CARAWAY. Under similar circumstances, then, the Senator believes Congress could provide punishment for every crime if it could be shown that the person suffering from this crime had been denied the equal protection of the law. Therefore larceny would fall within that.

Mr. CUMMINS. Take my own State as an illustration; and I will take it rather than the State of Arkansas because it would be less invidious. If under the practice in our State a crime committed against a negro would not and could not be punished, and our State authorities deliberately and constantly failed to punish crimes against either the property or the person of a negro citizen, then I believe that the United States would have the right to punish the person committing such crime.

Mr. CARAWAY. Then it has a right to punish any person who commits a crime in Iowa, whether it be against the personal property of a negro or against the personal property of a white man, if the State does not punish him.

Mr. CUMMINS. No; I did not say that, because there are many crimes that go unpunished that can not be punished where the perpetrator can not be ascertained.

Mr. CARAWAY. Of course. I mean where the State makes no serious effort to punish.

Mr. CUMMINS. I think if my State through a long series of years should withhold any attempt to punish crimes committed against negroes, whereas it made all the effort it could make to punish crimes committed against white men, then the United States would have the right to enter that field and punish the perpetrators of those wrongs.

Mr. CARAWAY. May I ask the Senator another question? Suppose the State of Iowa made it its particular duty to punish the stealing of cattle and was rather lax in punishing people who stole hogs. Does the Senator think the Federal Government then could punish the hog thieves in Iowa?

Mr. CUMMINS. My answer is that all the people of Iowa are entitled to the equal protection of the law.

Mr. CARAWAY. Of course, the Senator is going around the question.

Mr. CUMMINS. And that if the State authorities did not punish a certain class of people or a certain class of crimes, the citizen of Iowa, being a citizen of the United States, has a right to ask Congress to clothe its judicial tribunals with the authority to enforce the law.

Mr. CARAWAY. Then, the Senator will qualify the statement he made a while ago that there are certain crimes which the Congress could not include within Federal jurisdiction. He will say now the Federal Government can step into the States and punish all crimes?

Mr. CUMMINS. No; the Senator does not correctly repeat what I stated, but he does so unintentionally, of course.

Mr. CARAWAY. I was doing the best I could to get the Senator's position.

Mr. CUMMINS. What I said was that it would be very unwise and even impossible for the Federal Government to enter the State of Iowa and punish crimes committed there unless it was shown that the State of Iowa had abandoned or abdicated its duty with respect to certain persons or a certain class of people and crimes.

Mr. CARAWAY. I beg the Senator's pardon, but he has forgotten the original proposition, which was that the Senator said he thought there were some crimes the Congress had the power to extend the jurisdiction of Federal Government to embrace and others that it could not include. That was the Senator's statement.

Mr. CUMMINS. I did not state it in just that way. I stated it with the qualification just mentioned.

Mr. CARAWAY. I beg the Senator's pardon. I believe when he reads the reporter's notes he will discover it just as I have stated it.

Mr. CUMMINS. That may be so.

Mr. CARAWAY. I am not trying to be captious with the Senator. That was my understanding of what he said.

Since the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN] and the Senator from Iowa have gone into the proceedings of the committee, may I ask how many Senators expressed their belief that the measure was unconstitutional, and at the same time voted to report it?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not know.

Mr. CARAWAY. Were there, enough, if they voted according to their belief as to its unconstitutionality, that it would have failed to be reported out?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not believe so. I would not question the word of the Senator from North Carolina on any account, but I do not even recall that more than one Senator, at most, suggested that he reserved the right to vote differently, or change his vote, when the matter was under consideration in the Senate. I do not recall more than one; but my understanding is that the vote by which the bill as amended was reported was the deliberate expression of a majority of the committee. We had the matter under consideration many times before we came to a final vote.

Mr. CARAWAY. The Senator raised one other interesting question—

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, will the Senator from Arkansas allow me to ask the Senator from Iowa a question?

Mr. CARAWAY. Certainly.

Mr. OVERMAN. I was very much surprised at the Senator from Iowa, if I understood him correctly. I understood him to say that if he had a doubt about the constitutionality of a question in favor of law, he would resolve the doubt in favor of law and against the Constitution.

Mr. CUMMINS. It depends upon the degree of doubt. There are a great many questions upon which lawyers differ with regard to their constitutionality. Some hold very decided convictions. Some are unable to reach any positive conviction. When we are determining whether a law is constitutional or unconstitutional we are attempting to project ourselves into the future and guess what the Supreme Court of the United States will do in the instant case. I do not know whether the Senator from North Carolina has that kind of doubt in mind or whether he has some other doubt in mind.

Mr. OVERMAN. I have great respect for the Senator and regard him as one of the best lawyers I have ever known and one of the best men, but I ask him if, without exception, the great law writers of the country for 100 years have not said that it is the duty of the legislator to resolve the doubt in favor of the Constitution, and if he does not do so he is as much a criminal as the man who deliberately violates the provisions of the Constitution.

Mr. CUMMINS. I have heard that expression. I do not accept it and do not adopt it.

Mr. OVERMAN. The Senator disagrees with those law writers?

Mr. CUMMINS. I make up my own mind with regard to the Constitution and I endeavor to follow, but when I make up my own mind there may be in my mind and often is in my mind—because we are dealing with constitutional questions all the time—not only upon the inquiry how do I think this matter ought to be decided, but how do I think the Supreme Court of the United States will ultimately decide it when it comes into that tribunal for decision. There is a great difference between those two things. I oftentimes have much doubt with regard to the manner in which the Supreme Court, as determined by their former decisions, will ultimately decide the question in issue.

My own conviction as to whether the matter is constitutional or not, and that difference in what one means when he says "doubt," is confusing.

A man can not have any doubt with regard to his own convictions. To him it is either constitutional or unconstitutional. But he can have a grievous doubt with regard to the ruling which will finally be made by the Supreme Court upon the question. Nothing better illustrates that than the ruling of the Supreme Court in the child-labor case. I had no doubt with regard to the constitutionality of that act, and I have none yet, although the Supreme Court has definitely said it was unconstitutional.

When one reviews the decisions of the Supreme Court upon the question we are now discussing or questions which are analogous to it, it is very easy to reach the conclusion that the decision of the Supreme Court upon that question is very doubtful. I do not think that kind of doubt ought to prevent any Senator from voting for a law if he believes it constitutional.

Mr. OVERMAN. The Senator must admit that the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States is the law.

Mr. CUMMINS. It is the law until it is reversed.

Mr. OVERMAN. Then when we come to vote upon that question, if the Senator votes contrary to the decision of the Supreme Court he does not uphold the law, but demoralizes and throws down the law by his vote.

Mr. CUMMINS. That depends entirely upon the decisiveness of the decision of the Supreme Court. I voted for an income tax law, and so did the Senator from North Carolina. I believe; at least most of his Democratic associates voted for it—

Mr. OVERMAN. Yes; I voted for it.

Mr. CUMMINS. After the Supreme Court had held that it was unconstitutional.

Mr. OVERMAN. There were four dissenting opinions there, and we thought they were correct when so many had dissented.

Mr. CUMMINS. I will say the latest decision of the Supreme Court. It was a time when the former Senator from Texas, Mr. Bailey, offered an amendment to an income tax measure which I had introduced and which I frankly said at the time was doubtful, so far as the ruling of the Supreme Court upon it was concerned, but it was offered and I hoped it would pass—and that was long before the constitutional amendment providing for an income tax law was enacted—so that we might get a further and more definite expression of that tribunal upon the subject.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. CARAWAY. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. I want to ask a question of the Senator from Iowa. In the deliberations before the committee was any authority of the Supreme Court of the United States cited at all in support of the constitutionality of this measure?

Mr. CUMMINS. We listened for hours to the reading of decisions of the Supreme Court, and I take it that every Senator who has any interest in the matter examined with exceeding care the decisions of the Supreme Court.

Mr. McKELLAR. The reason why I asked the question was because I have examined the cases which were cited by the Assistant Attorney General, and all of them were interstate commerce cases or cases hinging upon the interstate commerce clause of the Constitution. There was no case cited at all in point sustaining the bill as reported out by the committee.

Mr. CUMMINS. That simply shows the variety of the human mind. Those same decisions, as viewed by other minds and other lawyers, meant apparently a different thing. We had before us not only the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States but half a dozen decisions of inferior tribunals—circuit courts of appeals, circuit court judges, and district judges—and we had before us four or five of the most learned briefs that could possibly be composed, some of them upon one side and some of them upon another.

Mr. McKELLAR. I was wondering if there was any particular decision upon which the bill was hinged, so to speak.

Mr. CUMMINS. Some of the most eminent lawyers in the United States have furnished briefs which proved to their satisfaction that there could be no question about the constitutionality of the bill; and it is clearly constitutional.

Mr. McKELLAR. Then, I shall change the form of my question.

Mr. CUMMINS. If Senators would let us get to the bill—

Mr. McKELLAR. We are right at it now.

Mr. CUMMINS. I know, but out of order.

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes; but we are talking about it just the same as if we were in order.

Mr. CUMMINS. I am not blaming the minority for the filibuster which is now being conducted.

Mr. McKELLAR. I am glad to hear the Senator say that.

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not think they ought to do it.

Mr. CARAWAY. I thought the Senator was joining with us.

Mr. CUMMINS. I think it is a proper rebuke to the majority. Here we have been for two years or more in complete power in the Senate, and we have refused or failed to modify the rules of the Senate so as to enable a majority of the Senators to bring the main question up to a vote. So long as we are willing to permit these antiquated, unjust rules to prevail, if I were opposed to a bill I would not consider that I was guilty of any moral crime if I employed all the rules of the Senate to prevent the bill coming to a vote.

Mr. McKELLAR. We are delighted to have the Senator's support. We thank him for it.

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not think Senators on the other side are right, for I say I think they ought to be in favor of the passage of this bill; therefore they ought not unduly to interfere with its progress; but as to the reproach that I have heard cast upon my Democratic friends repeatedly for availing themselves of the present Senate rules, which are so ancient—I will not say honorable—that they belong to another civilization and another kind of government, I am not accusing those Senators of any wrongdoing in employing these artifices and these various devices in order to prevent a vote upon the bill.

Mr. McKELLAR. We are perfectly honest in our contention. The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WILLIS in the chair). The Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CARAWAY] has the floor.

Mr. CARAWAY. I merely desire enough time to congratulate the Senator—

Mr. CUMMINS. I feel deeply grateful to the Senator from Arkansas for permitting me to interpose my views in the midst of his speech.

Mr. CARAWAY. I assure the Senator from Iowa that I am delighted to have him give expression to his views.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Will the Senator from Arkansas yield for a question?

Mr. CARAWAY. I yield to the Senator from California.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. In regard to the members of the Committee on the Judiciary, I wish to advise the Senator from Arkansas and the Senate that there is one member of the committee who did not attend the meeting of the committee when the bill was reported out. That member is a very honorable and, I think, a very able Senator, and a member of the political party of the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. CARAWAY. Perhaps the Senator to whom the Senator from California refers had no notice of the committee meeting.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. No, that was not the cause of his absence. I could tell the Senator from Arkansas why the Senator to whom I refer did not attend the meeting of the committee, but, at any rate, the Senator from Arizona, to whom I refer, as I understand, is in favor of the bill, and if it ever comes to a vote will so vote. I must assume, therefore, in view of his character and learning, that he believes the bill to be wise and constitutional.

Mr. CARAWAY. He may.

Mr. OVERMAN. The Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST] did not attend a single meeting of the committee and heard no discussion of the bill. He was not present in the committee at any time.

Mr. CARAWAY. Then, under those circumstances, I can see why he might think the bill constitutional.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I have reason to know why the Senator from Arizona was not present.

Mr. OVERMAN. The Senator from Arizona may have had good reasons for not being present; but I am referring to the fact that he was not in the committee at any time when the bill was under consideration.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. It is not proper for me to state the reason for his absence. I know why he did not attend the meeting of the committee and vote on the bill.

Mr. CARAWAY. I should think it would be proper for one to say anything about the bill that he desired, but some things would have to be said in private, as it would violate the rules of the Senate to say them publicly.

What I wish to do, however, is to thank the Senator from Ohio [Mr. WILLIS], who so ably helped Senators who are opposed to the pending measure to carry on the filibuster this afternoon. If he will be here to-morrow—and I hope he will—and will then be as active as he has been this afternoon, I know the country will be grateful to him for his attitude. I also congratulate the country that the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] has also consumed an hour or two of time in order to prevent the consideration of the bill. The Senator from California [Mr. SHORTRIDGE] also has risen a half dozen times in order to get the floor and continue for the remainder of the afternoon. I am in favor of the Senator having the floor. I love to hear him speak. I think that he is possibly the most eloquent man who has sat in the Senate since I have been in public life. I listen with much pleasure when he addresses the Senate. His reasoning is always good, though sometimes his conclusions are not in line with his argument. However, he is always interesting.

Also, the closing remarks of the Senator from Iowa were likewise interesting. He said that he did not blame the minority for filibustering, nor did he fall out with the Senator from Ohio or the Senator from Indiana for joining with us in the filibuster, but that he blamed the ancient and honorable rules of the Senate. If I may say so without being offensive, it seems that the Senator from Iowa thinks that anything that is ancient and honorable is entirely unworthy of consideration; that the ancient and honorable Constitution ought not to bind a Senator; that if he has a doubt he should resolve that doubt in favor of action against the Constitution instead of for it; and likewise, I should judge, he classes the Constitution and the rules of the Senate as outworn and unsuited to the modern generation; that they were suitable for the builders of this Republic, but not at all adequate to take care of the rights of the people of the present day. I may not be quite translating into the exact language what the Senator from Iowa intended to say, but what I stated is about the impression I gained from his arguments.

Mr. CUMMINS. May I interrupt the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. CARAWAY. Yes, sir.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator from Arkansas did not correctly understand me to say that the Constitution of the United States should not be observed.

Mr. CARAWAY. I heard the Senator from Iowa say that he had grave doubts about the constitutionality of the pending bill, and then that he would resolve those doubts in favor of supporting it.

Mr. CUMMINS. No; the Senator from Arkansas understood me to say, as I afterwards explained, that I had grave doubt with regard to the outcome in the Supreme Court of the section of the bill to which reference has been made by the Senator from Arkansas; I think it is section 6; but, of course, I satisfied my own mind with regard to its constitutionality before I gave my support to it.

Mr. CARAWAY. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. CUMMINS. Certainly.

Mr. CARAWAY. The Senator knows that the Supreme Court under the Constitution is the tribunal set up to determine whether an act of Congress is within its power or without it?

Mr. CUMMINS. Certainly.

Mr. CARAWAY. And, therefore, if the Senator believes that the Supreme Court, the tribunal set up by the Constitution to determine such questions, would hold that the act is not within the constitutional power of Congress to pass, he still says that he can afford to resolve that doubt in favor of the proposed law and against the Constitution.

Mr. CUMMINS. There is a vast difference between the two things.

Mr. CARAWAY. I am curious to know where the difference lies.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Supreme Court has more than once been a little vague, to say the least, in its decisions upon great public questions, and I may have a very serious doubt in regard to the ultimate ruling of the Supreme Court upon a bill and yet be very well assured in my own mind that the bill is constitutional.

Mr. CARAWAY. I think I understand the Senator. Then he agrees with the Senator from California [Mr. SHORTRIDGE], if I do not misrepresent him, who said on yesterday that he thought the Supreme Court would refuse to follow itself and follow him in the view that the proposed act is constitutional.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. No; I did not say that.

Mr. CARAWAY. Did not the Senator from California say that in substance?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. No; not at all.

Mr. CARAWAY. I believe if the Senator will read what he said he will find that is in effect what he said.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. What I said, if the Senator will permit me, is this: I think there are two or three decisions of the Supreme Court—

Mr. CARAWAY. That are wrong.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Yes; to use that term.

Mr. CARAWAY. That is what I understand the Senator to say.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. In my judgment, they are wrong. But let me explain with respect to that tribunal that I think not enough attention has been paid to section 5 of the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution. I think that under that section it is perfectly competent for Congress to determine what is appropriate legislation to the end of vouchsafing to a citizen of the United States full protection under the law. In that connection I am very sure there are other decisions of the Supreme Court which hold that if Congress adopts a given plan, considering it "appropriate legislation," the courts will not interfere, it being held that that is a legislative function and not a judicial one. Therefore, I conclude, and have always contended, that if Congress hits upon a form of legislation which it deems appropriate to safeguard the rights of a citizen of the United States guaranteed by the Constitution the Supreme Court will never interfere to disturb it.

Mr. CARAWAY. Then, as I understand the Senator from California, he thinks that if the Congress should see fit to enact any law touching the punishment of offenses and say that it deems that law appropriate legislation to enforce the constitutional guaranties of equal protection of the law to the citizen, it might punish any and all crimes.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. To answer that would require many words, and we have had enough words for the day.

Mr. CARAWAY. Very well. I am going to yield to the Senator in a little while.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I did not intend to reflect upon the Senator's remarks—

Mr. CARAWAY. Yes; I understood the Senator was very much interested in what I was saying.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. But my views can not be expressed in a few words.

Mr. CARAWAY. At any rate, finally the Senator will have to express his views if he means to say that Congress does have the power to enforce all the laws of the States and to punish all offenses if it shall see fit, and that it deems it necessary in order to carry out the provisions of the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I will undertake in a sentence, not desiring to detain the Senate for but a moment, to state my opinion.

Mr. CARAWAY. Very well.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Here is my view expressed offhand—and we can not always speak with perfect accuracy in that manner—I have in mind the fifth amendment to the Constitution.

Mr. CARAWAY. The Senator from Iowa put that out of consideration a while ago.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. No; the Senator from Iowa did not do that.

Mr. CARAWAY. He tried to do so.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. No; the Senator from Iowa did not.

Mr. CUMMINS. There is another difference of opinion as to that.

Mr. CARAWAY. The Senator from Iowa said that that was not where the authority for this proposed legislation was found.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Will the Senator permit me a brief statement of my views?

Mr. CARAWAY. All I want to say is this: That I hope Senators on the other side will finally get together upon the provision of the Constitution that gives to Congress the right to enact this proposed legislation. Three authorities have spoken, and they have not agreed.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I have said, and I repeat, that if called upon to cite those sections of the Constitution which I think give full support to my ultimate conclusion, I would cite first, paragraph 18, Article I, section 5 of the Constitution. If the Senator has a copy of the Constitution before him I will be glad to have him read it.

Mr. CARAWAY. Does the Senator refer to Article I?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. To Article I, section 5, paragraph 18. I think I recall the section and paragraph.

Mr. CARAWAY. The Senator is mistaken, for there does not happen to be a paragraph 18 in section 5 of Article I of the Constitution. Section 5, I will say to the Senator, is on page 373.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I refer to the section which enumerates the powers of Congress.

Mr. CARAWAY. That is section 8, and it will be found on pages 375, 376, 377, and 378 of the copy of the document which is before us.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. It begins "That Congress shall have power," and the particular provision to which I refer is, I think, in paragraph 18.

Mr. CARAWAY. The Senator has in mind, I presume, the provision which reads:

To make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers, and all other powers vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States, or in any department or officer thereof.

That provision is found at the bottom of page 377.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Let me put in the record the provision I have in mind. I think I said Article I of the Constitution, section 5.

Mr. CARAWAY. Yes, sir; but that is under section 7.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. The Senator is right. It is Article I, section 7, paragraph 18.

Mr. CARAWAY. Let us correct both of ourselves. It is section 8.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. It is paragraph 18, at the bottom of page 377.

Mr. CARAWAY. Yes; but it is section 8.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. That section reads:

To make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers and all other powers vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States, or in any department or officer thereof.

I also rely upon amendment 5 of the Constitution, which, for the purpose of the record, I will have inserted.

Mr. CARAWAY. That is on page 390.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. That is on page 390. And in order that anyone concerned with what is now going on may have it before his eyes, let us read it:

No person shall be held to answer for a capital or otherwise infamous crime except on a presentment or indictment of a grand jury, except in cases arising in the land or naval forces, or in the militia, when in actual service in time of war or public danger; nor shall any person be subject for the same offense to be twice put in jeopardy of life or limb; nor shall be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself, nor be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law; nor shall private property be taken for public use without just compensation.

I invite thoughtful minds to this language. This is not any inhibition against a State, observe. This is no inhibition against any department of our Government, State or Federal. It is in effect an affirmative declaration of certain rights and immunities of a citizen of the United States. Now, carry in mind the language first quoted, namely, that Congress has power to carry out the foregoing powers or any thereafter vested.

Mr. CARAWAY. Let me ask the Senator a question. Why did you add section 5 to amendment 14, then, if that was true?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I can explain that, and it has been explained by the law writers, as to why section 14 was adopted.

Mr. CARAWAY. No; I am talking about section 5 of amendment 14.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I did not catch the Senator's question.

Mr. CARAWAY. If you thought the powers just enumerated were so broad, why was section 5 added to amendment 14?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Oh, we did not add section 5 to amendment 14. Amendment 5 was one of the first amendments adopted.

Mr. CARAWAY. I did not say amendment 5; I said, "Why did you add section 5 to amendment 14?"

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Oh! Similar language will be found in other amendments of the Constitution.

Mr. CARAWAY. I know; but why do it if the other authority was broad enough to cover it?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I claim that amendment 14 without section 5 would be broad enough to give power to enact this measure.

Mr. CARAWAY. Then why was section 5 added?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I think out of abundance of caution. I think those who framed those later amendments, out of abundance of caution, specifically used those words in order to confer upon Congress the power to do the things referred to.

Mr. CARAWAY. In other words, the Senator thinks it was not necessary, but the framers were just overcautious?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I believe the Senator may so state it.

Mr. CARAWAY. In other words, the men who wrote amendment 14 did not agree with the Senator's construction of paragraph 18 of section 8?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I can not tell what the great men of that period thought.

Mr. CARAWAY. At least, it seems that they did not.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I know that they used that language, and I think they used it knowingly, and I think it confers specific powers, very large and extensive powers, upon the Federal Government.

Mr. CARAWAY. It did not confer upon the Federal Government any authority broader than paragraph 18 of section 8, according to the Senator's contention.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I think not. I think the power of Congress was ample without that additional and specific delegation of power; but I rely, in response to the question, very largely upon amendment 14 to the Constitution of the United States. That amendment contains many things to which attention has not been called.

Mr. CARAWAY. I thought it had been pretty well fought over in the Supreme Court.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. It has been pretty well emasculated and pretty well ignored, in my judgment.

Mr. CARAWAY. The Supreme Court went wrong on that section?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I think they did.

Mr. CARAWAY. And it is the belief now, if the Senator will pardon me, that the Senator can set the Supreme Court right by getting it to reconsider its decision?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Oh, as to this proposed legislation, I think the Supreme Court will hold it to be entirely constitutional.

Mr. CARAWAY. But it will have to reverse itself to do it?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. No; not necessarily.

Mr. CARAWAY. I thought the Senator predicated his belief that this law was constitutional upon the statement that the Supreme Court heretofore had erred in construing the Constitution.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. But I added that I think it very easy to differentiate between the decisions that have been made and the one which will necessarily be rendered should this act come before the Supreme Court.

Mr. CARAWAY. Then that will not necessitate the Supreme Court being wrong, will it?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Not necessarily.

Mr. CARAWAY. But I think the Senator started out with the proposition that the Supreme Court was wrong, and it had not given due consideration to this amendment, and this new law was going to call to the attention of the Supreme Court wherein it had been wrong heretofore.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Oh, no; not put in that form. I answered the Senator from Arkansas in this way: I, with great respect, think that the decision of the Supreme Court on the civil rights bill was erroneous.

Mr. CARAWAY. That means "wrong."

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I always have thought so, and I think so now; but I think this legislation is constitutional and will be so held, and that in order so to hold it will not be necessary for the Supreme Court to reverse decisions upon other phases of the Constitution.

Mr. CARAWAY. I beg the Senator's pardon. I thought yesterday he predicated his statement that he thought this act to be constitutional upon a statement that the former decisions of the Supreme Court were wrong.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. The Senator will see that I hastened to add there that I did not think that those decisions would be out of harmony with the decision which would uphold this proposed legislation.

Mr. CARAWAY. I did not understand that part of the Senator's statement.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. For the record, amendment 14 provides:

All persons born or naturalized in the United States and subject to the jurisdiction thereof are—

What? I pause—

Are citizens of the United States and of the State wherein they reside.

Not to prolong the matter, there is a very clear distinction between United States citizenship and State citizenship.

Mr. CARAWAY. Oh, let me ask the Senator—

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I will show the Senator authorities for that proposition if he wishes them.

Mr. CARAWAY. There is a difference between residence and citizenship; but if a man is a citizen of my State he must be a citizen of the United States. He may be a resident of California and a citizen of Japan.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. That is quite true.

Mr. CARAWAY. But I could not go with the Senator as far as he went.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I merely throw out the idea, which I thought was familiar and would be admitted, that there is a citizenship of the United States which is distinct in legal essence from State citizenship, and this provision here in the Constitution states who are citizens of the United States.

Then the section proceeds:

No State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States; nor shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law; nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws.

Answering the Senator's question, I think that if the constitutional amendment had stopped there this proposed legislation would be constitutional; but I attach great importance to section 5.

Mr. CARAWAY. I thought the Senator said a while ago that section 5 was absolutely without any force and effect.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. The Senator from Arkansas ought not to—

Mr. CARAWAY. Just wait a minute. The Senator from California said that under paragraph 18 of section 7 of the Constitution all these rights and immunities were guaranteed.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Yes, sir.

Mr. CARAWAY. And that the writers of amendment 14 merely added section 5 out of abundance of caution.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I so say.

Mr. CARAWAY. Then it does not add anything to it.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Oh, on the contrary, I say I attach great importance to section 5 of this amendment. Why do I? I may be wrong as to the force or scope of paragraph 18, quoted. I may be in error as to the scope or power of Congress or the Federal Government under amendment 5. I may be in error in my view that amendment 14 would be ample if it stopped at the first section; but now I say I attach great importance to section 5, which reads:

The Congress shall have power to enforce, by appropriate legislation, the provisions of this article.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me? Mr. CARAWAY. Certainly.

Mr. OVERMAN. All of this argument is based upon the assumption that there are some States of the United States that do deny their citizens the equal protection of the laws. Can the Senator sustain that assumption?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I hope to God it is not so; but if it is so, then this law covers such a case as that.

Mr. OVERMAN. Unless it is so, the Senator's argument falls to the ground.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Oh, of course, if no facts can ever be developed which make this law applicable, it is an idle thing for us to enact it. Of course, we must assume, however, that there are conditions, not limited to one section—and let no one think that I am speaking of sections—we must assume that there is a reason for the proposed legislation; but if the facts can never be developed, of course, our action is entirely nugatory.

There is another thing I should like to add, and if Senators care to pursue it they may. I respectfully call the attention of the Senate to the fact that there is such a thing as United States citizenship. If that be so, then my position is that that citizenship carries with it the right to life, to liberty, and to the possession of legally acquired property. If that be so, I further contend, I hold—and I would hold it if I had the honor to represent North Carolina here in the Senate—that this Government, this Nation, speaking through the Congress set up and established by the people through their Constitution, can pass such legislation as will protect the national citizenship in all these rights.

Ah, but you say that is invading the rights of the States. Oh, no; it is not. I submit that it is not. If the State affirmatively denies this protection, of course no one contends that the Federal Government could not step in; but if a State through nonaction denies the protection, or if the State—North Carolina, Alabama, Arkansas, California—shall be overrun, its machinery of government broken down, and its people deprived of life or liberty or property without due process of law, then my doctrine applies, that this Federal Government, your Government and mine, can protect the humble, the weak, the poor, the white, the black, whoever is within that territory denominated a State having American citizenship and claiming and entitled to the protection of the laws of the land. That is my view, that is my doctrine, and that is the view or doctrine of this proposed legislation.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, it is very enlightening to have the Senator's views upon the Constitution. It is to be regretted that such a great measure should be offered to the Senate and the country with those who favor it differing as to where the authority rests in the Constitution to grant to Congress the power to take away from the State its right to punish crime and transfer it to the Federal Government.

Mr. President, I admire the Senator from California. He is always interesting, but he was laboring under a very great deal of embarrassment in trying to differentiate between a citizen of the United States and a State citizen. Whenever he commences to talk about equal rights, the attitude of California toward the Japanese rises up to plague him, and it has to be explained, and the explanation is that the Japanese who is a citizen of California is not a citizen of the United States, and therefore the Constitution does not protect him. I can see the very great difficulty that confronts the Senator, and I admire his skill in getting ready to go around that question.

I shall add just this one word. I want to see the law enforced, and in my section of the country we do enforce it. I make the statement, based upon my own experience in the courts, that in the courts of my State a negro is protected in every right he has under the Constitution. In fact, if a white man shall descend to the level of the negro—and I use that language advisedly—and engage in litigation with him, he always loses his lawsuit, or nearly always. I do not recall a single incident in which a white man had a lawsuit with a negro and did not lose it. They hold that he ought not to dispute with him about his rights. They are careful of the negro's rights. This bill, as I said before, is merely an instrumentality of certain associations situated in New York, whose officers are white men who are working for a salary, to arouse the negroes and make it profitable to wage a contest in the Congress to have the Federal Government invade the sovereign States. I do not accuse the committee of having been a party to it, but it has been imposed upon. Those men so wrote the bill that it would not affect the peculiar manners of lynching people in California or Iowa but would reach those people in Arkansas and in Georgia. I absolve the committee from being willingly the instrumentality of this organization, but that is the language of the bill, and if Senators favoring it had read it they must have known it.

Mr. President, I promised to yield to the Senator from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN].

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I want to submit a few remarks upon this question.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is in doubt as to whether the Senator from Arkansas yielded the floor.

Mr. LODGE rose.

Mr. HEFLIN. If the majority leader is ready to adjourn until Friday at 12 o'clock, I am willing to yield for that purpose.

Mr. LODGE. I do not think the Senator from Alabama has the floor.

Mr. CARAWAY. I yield the floor.

Mr. HEFLIN. The Senator from Arkansas yielded to me.

Mr. LODGE. The floor can not be handed over by one Senator to another. A Senator has to be recognized by the Chair.

Mr. HEFLIN. He yielded to me, and then I proceeded in my own time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair was trying to find out whether the Senator from Arkansas yielded the floor.

Mr. CARAWAY. I yielded to the Senator from Alabama; I yield the floor.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. If the Senator from Arkansas has yielded the floor, the Chair is going to recognize the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. HEFLIN. Then we ought to have a quorum. Very well; if the Senator wants to make a motion, I will withhold my point of no quorum.

ADJOURNMENT OVER THANKSGIVING DAY.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I am satisfied from the inquiries I have made on both sides of the Chamber that it would be almost impossible to get a quorum in the Senate to-morrow, and I think we ought to adjourn over Thanksgiving Day. I move that when the Senate adjourns to-day it be to meet on Friday next at 12 o'clock.

The motion was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will recognize the Senator from Alabama now if he desires recognition.

Mr. LODGE. Unless Senators desire to continue the debate—

Mr. HEFLIN. What was the motion? I was interrupted when the Senator from Massachusetts made a motion.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The motion was that when the Senate adjourns it be to meet on Friday, and the motion has been put and carried.

Mr. LODGE. Unless Senators desire to remain here to carry on the debate—

Mr. HEFLIN. I have no desire to speak now, if it is the wish of the Senate to adjourn.

Mr. LODGE. Very well; then I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate (at 4 o'clock and 55 minutes p. m.) adjourned until Friday, December 1, 1922, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, November 29, 1922.

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our heavenly Father, as we are now approaching our national festival day, in which labor ceases and our firesides are made radiant with the joy of thanksgiving, in the sanctity of this quiet moment we would breathe: "Praise ye the Lord!" For the sacrifices, services, and the traditions of our forefathers we give Thee thanks; for the preservation of our free institutions we bless Thee; for bread enough and to spare we offer Thee our tributes of gratitude. Bless our President, the judicial and legislative branches of our Government, and may the spirit of Thy wisdom dwell with them. Be with all governors of the States and all who interpret the laws of our land. Direct our country on its errands of helpfulness. O let us work that which is good toward all men. May the law of justice be in our Nation's conscience, the law of truth in our country's will, the law of love in all hearts and the law of self-denial in all lives. O may the spirit of the Lord God be in the very soul of our Republic. May ignorance and intolerance fade away as the night before the dawn. Bless all schools, all instruments of education, and all institutions of beneficence. O abide with our Republic and may it always be a defender of the helpless, an example for the oppressed, and a Christian light for the world. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

THE MERCHANT MARINE.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 12817.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee) there were 36 yeas and 22 noes.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I object to the vote on the ground that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. Evidently there is no quorum present. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will bring in the absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 229, nays 99, answered "present" 1, not voting 103, as follows:

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The doors were opened.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union with Mr. TILSON in the chair.

The Clerk reported the title of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

TITLE VII.—MISCELLANEOUS PROVISIONS.

TRANSPORTATION BY WATER OF GOVERNMENT OFFICIALS.

SEC. 701. (a) Any officer, employee, or agent of the United States, including legislative, judicial, diplomatic, and consular officers, and officers serving in the military or naval forces of the United States, traveling by water, when the expense of such passage is chargeable directly or indirectly to the United States, shall when practicable travel in a public vessel of the United States or a vessel registered, or enrolled and licensed, under the laws of the United States. When passage in such a vessel is not practicable, the voyage may be made in a vessel under a foreign flag only when specifically ordered by the head of the department or other Government establishment concerned or upon order specifically approved by such head of department or other Government establishment, who shall as promptly as possible report each such voyage made in a vessel under a foreign flag, together with the reasons showing necessity therefor, to the board.

(b) Any person subject to the provisions of subdivision (a) who fails to comply therewith in respect to the passage taken shall not be reimbursed for such passage money, or shall be surcharged in his accounts with the United States with the amount thereof, as the case may require.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee: Page 57, line 13, after the words "to the" strike out the word "board" and insert in lieu thereof the following: "the appropriate official in the Government department of which he is a member."

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I am in full sympathy with the general principle of this section. I think that all Government officials should be required to travel upon American ships whenever possible. My amendment provides that whenever they can not travel on American ships and do travel on a foreign ship, and make a report of the reason why they did so, they should not be required to make such report to the Shipping Board, but they should make it to their own department. The section provides that any officer, employee, or agent of the United States, including legislative, judicial, diplomatic and consular officers, and officers serving in the military or naval forces of the United States, traveling by order, when the expense of such passage is chargeable directly or indirectly to the United States, must make their report not to their own departments but to this all-powerful, autocratic Shipping Board, and that Shipping Board is to determine whether or not they were justified in making such passage, and they are thus given the power to determine whether or not the traveling expenses of such officials shall be paid. I say that no such power should be lodged in the Shipping Board. I say that the powers of other departments of the Government should not be thus invaded, and that such report should be made to the proper official of the department of which the traveling official is a member. That is what my amendment proposes to do, and that is all.

Mr. EDMONDS. The gentleman's amendment, if he wishes to accomplish what he proposes, is not necessary. Any employee who wants to travel in a foreign vessel under this act is required to report to his department and get orders to do so. The only reason the report is made to the board is for the purpose of finding out whether it was necessary for him to do so, and the only place you can find that out is in the board. The board can report back then to the head of the department and say whether he should have taken a foreign ship. If the gentleman wants to make the statement that this is something new for the autocratic board, to say whether a man can travel in a ship or not, then let anyone read the section, and he will see that it is not so.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EDMONDS. Yes.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Is not the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. DAVIS] in error when he says that the officer, employee, agent, and so forth, must report to the Shipping Board? Does not the section say that the report shall be made to the head of the department?

Mr. EDMONDS. That is correct.

Mr. LEHLBACH. And the head of the other department is the sole person who may order these people to travel on the foreign ships.

Mr. EDMONDS. That is correct.

Mr. LEHLBACH. And the only report made to the Shipping Board is of that fact, not by the subordinate but by the head of the department, so that the board may have a record of it.

Mr. EDMONDS. That is correct.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. But I call attention to the fact that, in lines 11 and 13, this section expressly provides—who shall as promptly as possible report each such voyage made in a vessel under a foreign flag, together with the reasons, showing necessity therefor, to the board.

The very next section provides that they shall not be paid unless the reasons are accepted.

Mr. EDMONDS. Will the gentleman read lines 9 and 10?

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Oh, yes; they may also report, but the final report is to be made to the Shipping Board.

Mr. EDMONDS. By the head of the other department. That is what it says—by the man who gives them permission to ride on a foreign ship. He makes the report to the Shipping Board.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. It says—

when specifically ordered by the head of the department or other Government establishment concerned or upon orders specifically approved by such head of department or other Government establishment.

That is, when he is ordered to make the trip.

Mr. EDMONDS. Yes.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. But the report of his reasons for traveling on a foreign ship shall be made to the board.

Mr. EDMONDS. By the head of the department.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Oh, no.

Mr. EDMONDS. It so says.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. I do not agree with the gentleman; but suppose that to be true, why should the head of any other department be required to make these reports to the Shipping Board?

Mr. EDMONDS. In order to determine whether the board could have supplied the transportation.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Yes; as I say, in order for the Shipping Board to determine the reason.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Yesterday afternoon just before adjournment the chairman of the committee, the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GREENE], put into the RECORD a telegram received from Malcolm Stewart, chairman of the Middlewest Merchant Marine Association, sent from Milwaukee, Wis., dated November 28, indorsing in effect the provisions of this bill.

I note in a copy of the Washington Post, in a dispatch dated November 27, 1922, among other things, the statement that three of the prominent speakers who spoke in favor of the merchant marine were E. C. Plummer, of the United States Shipping Board; Matthew Hale, president of the South Atlantic State Association; and Malcolm Stewart, chairman of the committee. There is considerable significance in connection with that statement. This Malcolm Stewart, whose telegram the chairman inserted into the RECORD, is the same Malcolm Stewart who appeared before our committee in May and deliberately asserted that if this bill did not provide for at least a five-year extension of the established trade routes now operating for the benefit of the Middle West commerce, he would oppose the bill and could not give it his approval. I want to read very briefly from the record exactly what he did say in that connection. I asked him the question: Whether, if the finding of the joint committee should not approve and indorse the amendment he had suggested in the bill, to guarantee the operations of these trade routes for a period of the next five years, but left the option to the Shipping Board, as now expressed in the bill, of doing what they think proper, he would indorse the bill under those circumstances, and Mr. Stewart said that he did not believe he would.

This same Matthew Hale, who was also mentioned in connection with this telegram, when before the committee, I asked whether he would favor the passage of this bill if he thought it contemplated the sale in bulk or in gross of the entire fleet within the next 30 months without any limitation on the operation of established trade routes, and he said no; that he would not. I then asked him whether he would oppose it, and he said he would; that he had so stated many times.

Mr. EDMONDS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I can not yield. These are the very same gentlemen who as representatives of their respective localities and communities offered an official amendment which I sought to have incorporated in this bill when we had that section under consideration, guaranteeing for five years the operation for the Middle West of shipping facilities for the trade routes which we had established, and it seems that Mr. Matthew Hale and Mr. Malcolm Stewart, under the sponsorship and leadership of Mr. E. C. Plummer, of the Shipping Board, traveling at Government expense, forsaking his duties in Washington, where he should be attempting to reduce the extravagant expenditures of the Shipping Board—Mr. Plummer, of the Shipping Board, has now taken those two apostates, Stewart and Hale, under his wing and has gone off and now is undertaking to sell to the citizens and taxpayers of the Middle West this 18-carat gold brick you are seeking to foist upon the people of America. [Applause].

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto do now close.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman withhold that? I want to offer an amendment and one more parting shot. Five minutes is all I ask. I want to offer a genuine amendment.

Mr. EDMONDS. Does the gentleman want to offer a genuine amendment to the section?

Mr. HARDY of Texas. To this section.

Mr. EDMONDS. And speak to the amendment?

Mr. HARDY of Texas. I do.

Mr. EDMONDS. All right. I will move that all debate close in five minutes.

The motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas offers an amendment which the Clerk will report.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment which is to be attached to the end of the section.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. HARDY of Texas: Page 57, after line 18, insert: "Provided, That the Shipping Board shall be authorized to prescribe reasonable rates for services performed by privately owned United States vessels under this section."

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Now, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, here is a section of this bill which requires that every officer, employee, or agent of the United States, and any legislative, judicial, diplomatic, and consular officer shall, when it can be done, travel by a privately owned ship of the United States or upon Government ships, and the bill proposes to turn all Army and Navy transportation over to the privately owned ships. When we require by law that officials of the Government on Government service shall travel by these subsidized vessels it does seem to me that we ought to require the Shipping Board to prescribe reasonable charges for that service. Here we are transporting troops, say, to Manila, and it may be that private ships are called into requisition to do it, the law absolutely compelling the military authorities of the Army to utilize these private ships, and there is not one syllable anywhere in this bill that authorizes any department of the Government to require reasonable rates for that service. It might be that foreign ships are willing to transport those men at $100 from San Francisco to Manila, and our privately owned ships would want $200, but they must go that way according to this provision, and I want the proviso to be added to it providing that the Shipping Board may have the right to prescribe reasonable charges for the service. That is all, gentlemen. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a vote on the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced the yeas appeared to have it.

On a division (demanded by Mr. HARDY of Texas) there were—yeas 68, yeas 93.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

TRANSPORTATION OF GOVERNMENT SUPPLIES.

SEC. 702. All goods, wares, merchandise, and material of every nature (including supplies for the military or naval forces of the United States) belonging to or intended for the United States, transported by water, shall when practicable be shipped in a public vessel of the United States or a vessel registered, or enrolled and licensed, under the laws of the United States. When shipment in such a vessel is not practicable and the shipment is made in a vessel under a foreign flag, it shall be the duty of the officer, employee, or agent of the United States authorizing or making the shipment, within one month thereafter, to mail a written notice to the board, stating the ports of departure and destination, the date, the name of the vessel, and the reason why the shipment was not made in a public vessel or a vessel registered, or enrolled and licensed, under the laws of the United States.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection the pro forma amendment is withdrawn.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 58, line 6, after the words "notice to the" strike out "board" and insert in lieu thereof the following: "proper official of the Government department of which he is a member."

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, this is an amendment along the same line as the one I last offered, except it refers to shipment of materials and supplies instead of passenger travel. Some gentlemen on the other side quibbled over the language of the other, but this language is plain and I want to read it for your own information:

When shipment in such a vessel is not practicable, and the shipment is made in a vessel under a foreign flag, it shall be the duty of the officer, employee, or agent of the United States authorizing or making the shipment, within one month thereafter, to mail a written notice to the board, stating the ports of departure and destination, the date, the name of the vessel, and the reason why the shipment was not made in a public vessel or a vessel registered, or enrolled and licensed, under the laws of the United States.

Now, my motion simply is to strike out the word "board" and insert the name of the appropriate official in the department of which such officer or agent is a member.

Now, what is the consequence of this? This section provides that "All goods, wares, merchandise, and material of every nature (including the supplies for the military or naval forces of the United States) belonging to or intended for the United States, transported by water, shall, when practicable, be shipped," and so forth, and no exception is made in case of war. Consequently, if we should become involved in war and the Navy or the Army desires under the preceding section to transport troops, or under this section desires to ship munitions or any other supplies and it is necessary to do so upon a foreign ship, or upon a ship of an ally in the war, they would be required, even in the midst of war, to make a report of their reasons and all about it to this autocratic Shipping Board, for their approval or disapproval. Now, the question is whether you want to give such extraordinary powers to this board, not only in time of peace but in time of war, and in respect to every branch of this Government. I ask for a vote. [Applause.]

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. LEHLBACH] is recognized in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. DAVIS] is unduly alarmed concerning the autocratic powers given to the Shipping Board under this section. No powers whatever are given to the Shipping Board by this provision.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. LEHLBACH. Yes.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. When was the Shipping Board created?

Mr. LEHLBACH. In 1916, under a Democratic administration and upon the recommendation of a Democratic President.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. It is therefore autocratic? [Laughter.]

Mr. LEHLBACH. Yes; it is therefore autocratic.

No power is given to the Shipping Board to control any shipment of supplies or goods by any department of the Government whatsoever. The only thing this section provides is that where it is necessary for an official of the Government to ship supplies or goods on foreign vessels he shall report that fact to the Shipping Board, in order that the board may have information that the American Government has not facilities for shipment at that place, so that this board may, upon the information brought home to it of the necessity for American service at that point, take appropriate action to provide it.

I move, Mr. Chairman, that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in five minutes, those five minutes to be used by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON].

The CHAIRMAN. In the confusion the Chair did not catch the wording of the gentleman's modified motion.

Mr. LEHLBACH. I did not modify it. It is the original motion, that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto be closed in five minutes, the five minutes to be used by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON].

Mr. LONGWORTH. That would require unanimous consent, but I give mine.

Mr. CLARKE of New York. I rise in opposition to that proposal. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The proposal is not debatable. Is there any point of order raised against the form of the motion? If not, the Chair will put it. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the gentleman from New Jersey.

The motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. There is an amendment already pending.

Mr. BLANTON. I offer it for information.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, then, the amendment will be read for the information of the House. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BLANTON: Page 57, line 20, strike out all of section 702.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I hope the House will not tie the hands of the Navy and of the Government by passing any such a provision as this section.

We have in the Navy now between 600 and 700 boats that are subject to the orders of the Secretary of the Navy in time of war. If we pass this provision we could not transport any of our military supplies in those boats without having a controversy with the shipowners concerning those ships that are subsidized by this bill. They would claim that they have the right to ship every portion of our military supplies and be paid for it by the Government, notwithstanding the fact that the Government has 600 or 700 naval ships upon which many of these supplies could be shipped.

That is just an illustration of the way in which we are seeking to tie the hands of this Government at the expense of the people of this Nation.

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. In just a moment. Strange as it may seem, I find myself in direct accord, for one time at least, with the American Federation of Labor and with Mr. Samuel Gompers. I want to commend every single suggestion that he this morning made to every Member of this House with reference to this bill.

What did he suggest? Let me read a few of his suggestions. He says that he is convinced that in the recent election the country displayed its hostility to this subsidy. He says that after careful study the American Federation of Labor has failed to find anything in this bill that is constructive and helpful, and that he condemns it without reservation. He says—

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. BLANTON. He says that the debate has served only to increase his condemnation. He says we are expending the people's money stupidly, if not criminally. He says that in order to pass this bill the shipping interests have used methods more subtle than bribery. He says that the bill is the most brazen Treasury-looting scheme ever devised. He says that the framers of this measure have wrongfully sought to take refuge in patriotism. He says that labor denounces this bill as a fraud and as a robbery and as wholly indefensible, and for one time in my life I say "Amen" to every single suggestion that this distinguished president of the American Federation of Labor to-day makes to the membership of this Congress. [Applause.]

Mr. LEHLBACH. And the gentleman is now following the leadership of Samuel Gompers.

Mr. BLANTON. In this particular instance I am working in double harness, shoulder to shoulder, with the American Federation of Labor and its president to save the people of this country from the results of this awful ship subsidy bill. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired. All time has expired. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I have a perfecting amendment to the proposal to strike out. There should be a vote on mine first.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. DAVIS].

The question being taken, the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. HARDY] offers an amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. HARDY of Texas: Page 58, line 10, after the words "United States" insert: "Provided, that the Shipping Board shall have the right to prescribe reasonable rates and charges for services performed under this section."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas.

The question being taken, the amendment of Mr. HARDY of Texas was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] insist on his motion to strike out?

Mr. BLANTON. I take it that it would be futile in the present atmosphere, so I withdraw it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to withdraw his amendment. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

REPORTS BY SHIPPING BOARD.

SEC. 703. The second paragraph of section 12 of the shipping act, 1916, is amended to read as follows:

"It shall, on or before the 1st day of December in each year, make a report to the Congress, which shall include its recommendations and the results of its investigations, a summary of its transactions, a statement of all expenditures and receipts (including the merchant marine fund and the construction loan fund), and of the operations of the Emergency Fleet Corporation and of any corporation which is managed or controlled by the board, and the names and compensation of all persons employed by the board."

Mr. CARTER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. A great many absurd claims have, in my opinion, been made for this ship subsidy bill, but the most absurd of all is that it will benefit the farmers and laboring people of the country. The difficulty with certain gentlemen is that they underestimate the intelligence and understanding of the producing classes of this country. There may have been a time in the past when such statements would mislead the great mass of producers of this land, but the farmers and working people have learned a few things within the past few years. They know that this measure is being fostered and promoted strictly in the interests of those few persons who expect to own and operate ships, and that any assertions to the effect that the farmers and laboring people will prove the beneficiaries constitutes pure unadulterated bunk. They know that a subsidy is a sort of bonus given to some company, institution, or class for performing some alleged service on behalf of the public and that such bonus is given in addition to the regular charges made in their rates and fare. They understand that a ship subsidy is a bonus given to the ship operators for performing some alleged service and that this bonus is paid from the Treasury of the United States. They understand that the money is placed in the Treasury of the United States from taxes which are assessed upon all the people in one way and another, and that the subsidies and bonuses carried in this bill are a donation to a class of special interests, which must be paid by taxing all others. Gentlemen representing agricultural and labor districts will have a difficult time convincing their people that they are benefited by a system which taxes money out of their pockets and places it in the coffers of the Shipping Trust and other special interests.

The best evidence of how the great producing classes of this country look upon this measure is the expression that has been given by their own organizations. Since debate began on this bill protests against the passage of any character of ship subsidy has been voiced under resolutions read into the RECORD from practically every farming organization in the United States. Protests from many labor organizations have also been presented to show their feeling in the premises, but one of the strongest arguments yet put forth is that contained in the letter of the President of the American Federation of Labor under date of yesterday. Since our friend from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] has brought himself into complete accord with union labor I would suggest that it is now appropriate to have the full letter of Mr. Gompers spread in the RECORD, and I therefore ask unanimous consent that it be read from the Clerk's desk in my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent for the reading of the letter indicated by him in his time. Is there objection?

Mr. UNDERHILL. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is made.

Mr. CARTER. Then I will read it myself.

Mr. UNDERHILL. The gentleman has the right to read it himself.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. Gompers's letter is as follows:

AMERICAN FEDERATION OF LABOR,
Washington, D. C., November 28, 1922.

SIR: Because the ship subsidy bill is to come before you on Wednesday for a vote, I take the liberty of communicating with you at this time in order to lay before you a point of view which will, I am sure, impress you as worthy of consideration.

I am convinced that the country in the recent election intended to convey, among other things, its hostility toward the proposed subsidy. However, there are others who either do not so interpret the country's decision or who do not see fit to follow the country's decision.

It is unlikely that anyone has given the subsidy bill more careful study than has the American Federation of Labor. We have tried to find if by any possibility there was anything constructive and helpful in the measure. We are bound, as the result of study, to condemn the measure without reservation.

If study of the bill itself has failed to convince labor of its soundness, the debate upon it thus far has been equally without result. Little that has been said in official circles indicates any real understanding of the subject.

When former subsidy bills were before Congress the whole cry was "Ships, ships, ships; give us ships and we will have a merchant marine." Now we have the ships and the one great question is, What are we going to do with them? We can not compete, so it is stated; and as things really are, it is largely true.

Within the last two years the shipowners and the Shipping Board have done their utmost to destroy what skill and efficiency exist on American vessels at sea. That they are doing this consciously is not conceivable. They are doing it, however, and evidently because they do not understand that the human element in shipping, as in all other competition, is the determining factor. While we are driving all the skilled men from the sea, England is drawing to herself the skilled men by her policy. This last spring England adopted the policy of gradually getting rid of inefficient men. She is doing it by a combination between the seamen themselves through their organization, the shipowners through their organization, and the board of trade. The officers on the vessels provisionally select the men, who then go to the office of the union, to be further passed upon under a regulation known as port consultant regulation No. 5. Under this system and the wages paid, she is drawing to herself the efficient men and pushing the inefficient men over to us.

When the war ended Germany had no ships. She had shipowners who knew commercial geography, and therefore were to have their ships, if possible, at a given time. She had officers and seamen who could handle ships at sea and in harbor and keep those ships out of the repair yards. She is coming back into ocean carrying with the speed of a race horse. We have the ships, but our shipowners seem to have no understanding of the world's freight market or commercial geography, nor any appreciation of the skill and efficiency needed on board of vessels, and we are spending money stupidly if not criminally. Why is it that business men who ordinarily have common sense seem to be incapable of realizing that in the competitive business success is determined by the human element to the extent of at least 75 per cent, while something less than 25 per cent is dependent upon the material element?

The subsidy bill now before you will not bring men and competence into the merchant marine. It will bring enormous sums of money into the pockets of a group of subsidized shipping financiers, and this group will constantly grow smaller under the monopoly-creating provisions of the bill.

Labor's position on the question of subsidy remains without change. The most strenuous efforts have been made to bring about a change in this position. In earlier years shipowners resorted to attempts at bribery, these being matters of official court record. I know of no such crude efforts in connection with the present bill, but in abundant measure friends of the bill have used subtler methods. Our position on this bill, however, is based on a study of the bill itself. It is without doubt one of the most brazen Treasury-looting schemes ever devised.

And scoundrelly measures, like scoundrelly men, take refuge in patriotism when no other offers. The bill is urged on grounds of patriotism. It is difficult to think of anything more unfitting.

This bill will not give America a merchant marine, though it may give us a bankers' marine. Labor joins with all others who want a well-manned, adequate merchant marine. But it denounces this bill as a fraud, a robbery, and wholly indefensible.

Let it not be forgotten, either, that once enacted the bill must remain in force for 20 years. Contracts made for that length of time will tie the hands of future Congresses.

I am laying these views before you in behalf of the executive council of the American Federation of Labor and in conformity with the findings on the subject as approved by the last convention of the American Federation of Labor.

Sincerely hoping that the above may receive your early and favorable support, I am,

Very truly yours,

SAM'L GOMPERS,

President American Federation of Labor.

Hon. CHARLES D. CARTER,
House Office Building, Washington, D. C.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan is recognized in opposition to the pro forma amendment.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Chairman, yesterday an amendment was adopted with reference to the nonpayment of this subsidy to owners of vessels where liquors had been transported on such vessels. Of course the intent of the House was in the direction of the enforcement of our prohibitory laws. Many of us are very much afraid that the effect of the amendment, if it should become a law, would be the opposite of what was intended. There is existing a penal statute against the transportation of liquors under those conditions. That penal statute is being sustained by the courts. The provision adopted yesterday it is true is not a penal statute, but it is the imposition of a penalty by the withholding of a subsidy. It is not as strong or as far-reaching in its terms as the existing law, and the adoption of it at this time by Congress might lead to complications. On the one hand it can accomplish nothing desirable, because there is already sufficient law. On the other hand, by reason of complications that it might introduce as to what was the intention of Congress, it might even be argued that it was intended to supplant the existing penal statutes. For these reasons it is to be hoped that when the committee rises the amendment adopted yesterday will not be concurred in by the House.

Mr. LINEBERGER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRAMTON. In just one moment, when I have uttered one more sentence. I shall ask a separate vote on the amendment and hope that it will then be voted down. In that connection I invite the attention of the Members of the House to the statement of the Anti-Saloon League and the Woman's Christian Temperance Union on this matter, which I inserted in the RECORD yesterday on page 269. Now I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. LINEBERGER. On what page is the amendment?

Mr. CRAMTON. The amendment is on page 269.

Mr. HILL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRAMTON. I yield to the gentleman from Maryland.

Mr. HILL. I should like to ask the gentleman why it was that his orders which he received from Wayne B. Wheeler were dated Toronto, Ontario? Is the House taking orders from Canada now?

Mr. CRAMTON. The gentleman has been keeping such close watch on St. Louis, Mo., from which he has been taking his orders [laughter], that he has evidently overlooked the fact that there has been a world convention of those believing in temperance held in Toronto, Ontario.

Mr. HILL. Then is Wayne B. Wheeler now in Ontario?

Mr. CRAMTON. No; the gentleman had better watch out. Mr. Wheeler is in Washington.

Mr. HILL. And the gentleman is against this amendment?

Mr. CRAMTON. I am against it.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRAMTON. I yield to the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. BANKHEAD. On yesterday I offered a real, bona fide prohibition amendment—

Mr. CRAMTON. Does the gentleman desire to ask a question?

Mr. BANKHEAD. The amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania was not a prohibition amendment, and on a separate vote in the House I trust the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania will be defeated.

Mr. CRAMTON. I think the gentleman will admit that no such provision is needed in the law; that we have sufficient law already.

Mr. MILLS. Will the gentleman yield for another question?

Mr. CRAMTON. If I have the time.

Mr. MILLS. As I understand it, the House yesterday adopted an amendment to this bill relating to prohibition. Since yesterday the gentleman has heard from the Anti-Saloon League.

Mr. CRAMTON. No; the gentleman is incorrect. I heard from it yesterday, as the Record will demonstrate.

Mr. MILLS. I should like to ask the gentleman whether he is solemnly asking this House to reverse the vote taken yesterday because the Anti-Saloon League objects to that vote?

Mr. CRAMTON. Not at all, but because the action taken yesterday was undesirable; and I hope that those who are sincerely interested in this movement will not be afraid to take advantage of a little information that comes from those who are making a particular study of the question, whether they come from New York or not.

Mr. MILLS. May I say to the gentleman that I think he is asking this House to make itself ridiculous?

Mr. CRAMTON. I am sure the gentleman from New York can never make himself any more ridiculous on this question than he has for some time past.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, I do not like to let the bill pass without saying what I think is a deserved tribute to the Republican organization in the handling of this bill. They have used considerable finesse. There were a good many weak sisters on the Republican side who were between two fires—one the outraged conscience of their constituents and the other the demands of the administration to pass this bill. It was recognized that the bill could not be passed in the form in which it was reported to the House and in which the President demanded you should pass it. So they have adopted the old scheme that those who are experienced in legislative procedure recognize of saying to those gentlemen, "Now, we are going to give you ample opportunity to show the defects of our bill and we sincerely want to meet the objections, throw it open to amendment, and give you plenty of time." Of course, there were some provisions that the leaders were willing to use for trade purposes and for skid purposes to let those gentlemen down easily into the organization pool. Some of the gentlemen, after serious consideration and prayerful consideration, believe that they can vote for it. Of course, the administration does not have much hope of this bill becoming a law, but they think by bringing it out they can get you hog tied so that in the future you will favor the legislation. They think that if they put the bill through the Senate they appreciate the wisdom of having you gentlemen hog tied, having met your captious objections, as they call it, in the consideration in the House, and when the bill is written as they really want it in conference and it comes back here you have got your feet wet, they have got you lined up with the organization, and you will take your orders, and you will follow the line of least resistance and continue to vote with the gang and vote for the conference report, although it may contain some of the objectionable features which you have fought the last few days and which you will advertise to your constituents as a great victory on your part.

The tragedy of the bill is that instead of building up an independent merchant marine—and if it did do that there would be some justification for you gentlemen in voting for the infamous scheme—but the tragedy of it is that instead of building up an independent merchant marine it will tend to prevent the building up of an independent merchant marine; and this bill, if it becomes a law, would have only one net result, and that would be that under the specious plea of building up an independent merchant marine you would have paid out of the Treasury a subsidy to gentlemen who do not need it and who are not moved by patriotic motives when they ask you to give them this grab and this raid on the Treasury. [Applause.]

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto be now closed.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania moves that all debate on this section and amendments thereto be closed.

The motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment is withdrawn and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

RATES OF INTERSTATE WATER CARRIERS.

SEC. 704. The last three paragraphs of section 18 of the shipping act, 1916, are amended to read as follows:

"Every such carrier shall file with the board and keep open to public inspection, in the form and manner and within the time prescribed by the board, the rates, fares, and charges for or in connection with transportation between points on its own route; and if a through route has been established, the rates, fares, and charges for or in connection with transportation between points on its own route and points on the route of any other carrier by water.

"No such carrier shall demand, charge, or collect a greater or less compensation for such transportation than the rates, fares, and charges filed in compliance with this section, except with the approval of the board and after 15 days' public notice in cases of increases and 5 days' public notice in cases of reductions, in the form and manner prescribed by the board, stating the increases or reductions proposed to be made; but the board for good cause shown may waive such notice.

"Whenever the board finds that any rate, fare, charge, classification, tariff, regulation, or practice, demanded, charged, collected, or observed by such carrier is unjust or unreasonable, it may determine, prescribe, and order enforced the just and reasonable rate, fare, or charge, or the maximum or minimum, or the maximum and minimum, to be charged, or the just and reasonable classification, tariff, regulation, or practice."

Mr. ANDREW of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, some surprise has been expressed that a Representative from Massachusetts on this side of the House should keep an open mind upon the merits or demerits of this bill. The obvious and perhaps expected course for such a Member to follow—the easiest way—is to support this bill. To me that course appeals very strongly because the bill is sponsored by my beloved and respected colleague, the dean of the Massachusetts delegation. But no Member wants to see a bill put through which involves a large expenditure of the public money unless he is convinced that that expenditure will bring at least an equal return, and will not constitute a bad precedent for future legislation. Nor ought it to be assumed that all of the Representatives from a particular section of the country must inevitably think exactly alike upon all public questions. It will be a very unfortunate day for this country of ours, if ever it arrives, when the representatives of particular geographical sections all come to think and vote together like mechanical automatons. It will mark the end of our United States.

I can claim no expert knowledge upon this question. There is nothing that I can add to what has been said. But I have followed the debates on both sides with intense interest, and I have reluctantly come to a different conclusion from many, or most, or perhaps all of my New England colleagues. I believe that this bill, which involves a possible expenditure of a billion dollars of the people's money during the next decade, is not likely to reduce shipping charges substantially or bring an equivalent benefit to the country as a whole. And I believe that, if adopted, it will offer another precedent in the way of Federal aid and paternalism which will plague us for the rest of our days. I should like the privilege of presenting to the House very briefly my reasons for voting against this measure.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the Record. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. ANDREW of Massachusetts. The ship subsidy bill has been greatly modified during the last three days and has been substantially bettered on the floor of the House through the elimination of several of its most objectionable features. When the committee presented the bill to the House last week one provision was that $125,000,000 of Government money could be loaned to shipbuilders for 15 years at a rate as low as 2 per cent. If this had been adopted, it would have offered a precedent for Government lending rates that would have been seized upon by many other prospective Government beneficiaries. Fortunately, although the Government shipbuilding loan provision still remains in the bill, the minimum rate for such loans has now been raised to 4½ per cent.

Another provision was that shippers of goods on American vessels could deduct from their income taxes 5 per cent of all shipping charges. This would probably have exempted the majority of the most important shippers from all payment of income taxes whatever, but this indirect subsidy to shippers has been altogether eliminated.

Another provision of the bill offered to industrial corporations, like the Standard Oil Co. or the United States Steel Corporation, which operate their own ships, both direct and indirect subsidies for carrying their own merchandise (an out and out subsidy in cash and an income tax rebate as vessel owners). This would have resulted in paying millions of dollars to such corporations as those mentioned, but the bill has now been so modified that such corporations will receive no direct subsidy. They will, however, still receive a disguised subsidy in the form of a rebate upon their income taxes as shipowners during a period of nine years.

The bill is much less objectionable in its details than it was when this discussion opened three days ago, but I believe that it still offers a dangerous precedent, which, if adopted, will bound us for years to come. I am inclined to believe that the time has now come when we ought to consider, first of all, the interest of the heavily burdened and long-suffering taxpayers, and when we ought, on that account, to think very seriously before opening up new channels for Federal aid. If we do not, then very soon everybody in the country will be getting Federal aid and no one will be as well off as he was before. I can not help thinking that in the present stage of our economic development commercial, financial, and industrial undertakings ought to stand on their own, ought to sail under their own power, and ought not to look to the Government to help pay their running expenses. It seems to me time that we begin to re-inspire ourselves with the spirit of self-reliance which animated our forefathers. When they settled these shores and pushed on through the West and transformed the wilderness and the prairies into a thriving continent they did not look to others to assume the risks and to pay their way. The sooner our people recover some of that ancestral spirit of self-reliance and self-help the better it will be for us all.

It is one thing for the Government to build highways or dig canals or make river and harbor improvements or reclaim arid lands. Those are permanent additions to the capital of the country; but it is another and very different thing for the Government to use the taxpayers' money to pay the running expenses of particular businesses, and that is what this bill proposes to do.

Under the guise of getting rid of ships constructed by the Government during the war, this bill proposes to establish a whole program of Government aid to meet the running expenses of different businesses. It proposes to lend Government money to ship buyers and to shipbuilders for 15-year periods at 4½ per cent, and to give Government money each year for a period of at least 10 years to shipping companies, both in the form of payments in actual cash and in the form of income-tax rebates. It sets aside for this purpose one-tenth of all our customs dues, which would mean about forty-five million this year and not improbably sixty or more million in years to come, and to add to this sum all tonnage dues, which are at once to be doubled. These funds, together with the income-tax rebates and the ship-construction fund might easily aggregate a billion dollars in the next 10 years, which means that the bill proposes to authorize a billion-dollar gift from the taxpayers' money to help meet the running expenses of private individuals and corporations, and no one has ever ventured to claim that this measure will substantially reduce shipping charges and give an equivalent benefit to shippers as a whole. It has been claimed rather that the subsidy was only a kind of adjusted compensation which would equalize the profits of American steamship lines. I believe that those who are the guardians of the people's money when confronted with such proposals to enter upon new lines of expenditures and fresh fields of paternalism might well say with the hero of Verdun, "They shall not pass." If we do not say so now or soon, we are likely to regret it for the rest of time.

As for the 1,500 Government vessels built during and after the war which we still have upon our hands, my suggestion would be this: Let us give instructions to the Shipping Board to sell as many as they can to American citizens during the next two or three years, when in all likelihood ocean traffic will increase, and then scrap the rest. The low price at which these vessels may be sold is of itself a not unsubstantial subsidy for our merchant marine.

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. EDMONDS: Page 58, strike out section 704.

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Chairman, the other day when explaining the bill I stated to gentlemen that when we arrived at this particular section I would move to strike it out. The section was originally intended to regulate the competition that was occurring between the Atlantic and Pacific coasts, which was driving the smaller and less financially strong operators out of business. My colleagues, Mr. HARDY and Mr. BANKHEAD, on the committee suggested that we ought to have some hearings, and as this has an effect in a number of other directions that possibly would not be beneficial, I want to strike it out now, so that at a later date we can have full hearings on the subject and find out what would happen if it were put into effect.

Just a word in regard to the remarks of my friend from Massachusetts, Mr. ANDREW. He objects to paternalism, but he is in favor of Government ownership, which is a rather peculiar thing to me.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. Chairman, I dislike to inflict myself on the House at this time, because I recognize the impatience of Members to get to a vote. However, I do not desire this bill to reach its conclusion without expressing my opposition to it.

Mr. Chairman, it is astonishing to observe the callous indifference of this administration to the sentiments of the American people. Just a few weeks ago there was an election in this country. It recorded the greatest political turn-over in the history of the Nation. That repudiation was overwhelming, and was caused by the universal disapproval of the record made since the beginning of the Harding administration.

One of the things which this Congress ought to realize was condemned by the people is this ship subsidy bill. Although it had not been enacted, it was and is one of the chief corner stones of this administration's shifting policies, and the American people passed on it as unerringly as if it had been already enacted into law.

They knew then, as they know now, that it is a fraud; that it is proposed in the interest of private shipowners at the expense of the American taxpayers. They knew then, as they know now, that this spurious makeshift will not preserve nor maintain the American merchant marine for the benefit of all the interests of the Nation, but that it robs the masses of the people to enrich a small group. They knew then, as they know now, that linking this subsidy up with the tariff subsidy, also given to a little group of selfish campaign contributors, instead of stimulating our merchant marine it will stifle it and handicap it beyond even the fears of those who have attempted to warn against it. Ships can not prosper unless they carry cargoes both going and coming across the ocean. There has never been a merchant marine of any nation that could maintain itself by carrying freight only one way and riding the waves empty on the return. Under the blighting influence of the Fordney tariff there will be precious little freight for our ships to bring back from abroad, and this fact will also reduce the amount they can carry from our shores to the world's markets. We can not expect to have the markets of the world open to us if we close ours to other nations. Consequently this policy of narrow provincialism will depress our foreign commerce, as it has already done, and make it difficult for our great merchant marine, built up at a cost of $3,000,000,000, to maintain itself under conditions that are honorable and appropriate. Now it is proposed to give them out of the Treasury enough money to make up for their losses on account of reduced cargoes. Having given a subsidy in the tariff to a little group of Americans who do not want our ships to carry freight, this Congress now proposes to make the American people pay the shipowners enough out of the Treasury to compensate them for hauling cargoes that do not exist and can not exist under such a foolish policy.

I do not propose to lend myself to such an outrage, and while the measure may go through this House, I hope the Senate will kill it. It is not too late for even a repudiated Congress to do one sensible thing before it expires. [Applause.]

Mr. YATES. Mr. Chairman, commenting upon what the gentleman from McCracken County, Ky. [Mr. BARKLEY], has just said, I desire to recall the attention of the House to an old story. The story is that once upon a time the proprietor or manager of a cotton field conceived a bright and happy idea, which was that a monkey might be taught to pick cotton. He started in on the experiment, and it was almost a success. The monkey was a willing worker, very industrious. He gave his whole mind to the subject. There was only one trouble, and that was that he did not recognize any geographical distinctions or limitations or boundaries, and when he got to the end of the field, instead of going back on the next row, he just hopped over the fence and plucked the neighbor's cotton, which was not in the bargain. So that, although he was very industrious, he was somewhat of a disappointment.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. YATES. Oh, no; I can not yield. The recent election reminds me of that story. Far be it from me to compare the American voter to a monkey. I do not mean that, and you can not say that I did. I seek his vote and will continue to seek it, but when he got through cotton picking in New York and New Jersey and in Indiana and Michigan and Minnesota and Wyoming he just calmly hopped over the fence and landed in a beautiful cotton plantation called Ohio. There he proceeded to pick all of the nice delicate blooms from a lively boomlet for the Presidency, being nurtured and tenderly cared for in the broad fields of one POMERENE. [Laughter.] Then, after three or four more lively skips, he landed in Nebraska, and there he picked all of the delicate blooms from another boomlet, cherished and fondly cultivated by one HIRCHCOCK.

Mr. BARKLEY. What about Beveridge, of Indiana?

Mr. YATES. Oh, wait a minute. I object to being interrupted by McCracken County. [Laughter.] Then, when he got through with Nebraska, he hopped over into Texas and brought back WURZBACH, Republican Member reelected. [Applause on Republican side.]

Now, if you gentlemen on the Democratic side can get any consolation out of this last election, you are welcome to it.

You were licked just exactly where it hurt the most. I have some right to say a few words, because I am here with a majority of 276,000 from the State of Illinois. It does amuse me—

Mr. UPSHAW rose.

Mr. YATES. No; I can not yield to the gentleman from Georgia. It does amuse me, day after day, hour after hour, to hear gentlemen on the Democratic side who have not gained a real thing but who have lost a lot of Presidential boomlets, get up here and talk about the reverses of the Republican Party and attempt to sympathize with us in regard to the matter. [Laughter.]

The fact of the case is that there was no reversal. In 1920 the American people, by a verdict unprecedented, wiped out Woodrow Wilson and all of his works, root and branch. [Applause.] But there was a swing of the pendulum, and it had to come back. As far as I am concerned, I am glad to say, owing to the fact which I have stated before that both of my parents were born in Kentucky and grandparents in Virginia, I am glad to see you come back, gentlemen, and the gentlemen over there who are going out never expected anything else. [Laughter.] There has not been any reversal. There was just one swing of the pendulum; and two years from now, in spite of our great regard for you, we are going to wipe you out again, root and branch. [Applause.]

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Chairman, we have now gotten down to the point where the political effect of this thing is being considered. I have not heard anything about that up to this time; but, speaking of the political effect, I want to cite you to an authority on that subject. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR] preached a sermon over here the other day and called for repentance for all the evil deeds contemplated here, but he did not tell you what would happen. I want to read you what is going to happen to you, because I have always noticed it did not matter how much the preacher preached about repentance, it did not have any effect until he pointed out what you would suffer if you did not repent. [Applause.] There has never been a time when you attempted to pass one of these bills except at a session of Congress after an election. They did it in 1873, after the election of 1872. They tried it in 1891, after the election of 1890, and they undertook to do it in 1901, after the election of 1900, and now you are trying it again after you have been licked. Now let us read what the distinguished gentleman from Illinois—ancient history—JOSEPH G. CANNON, said in the Forty-fifth Congress about what will happen to fellows and had happened to folks who would vote for this sort of thing. Here is what he said:

The subsidizing of these steamship lines, from the Collins Line in 1852 up to the present time, has bankrupted every prominent man that has favored it. The political ghosts of departed politicians that have squandered the money of the people for this kind of unwarrantable expenditure from the Treasury rise up and warn Representatives to avoid the errors heretofore committed by our predecessors.

[Applause.]

Now, that is the opinion of the distinguished sage of Illinois; and if any of you do not believe he is a politician, you go and look at his record of having stayed here longer than anybody else in the world ever has been here, and nobody else will ever hereafter equal his term of service, and you should accept his word spoken when he was in full vigor.

Mr. YATES. That was because he was a Republican.

Mr. STEVENSON. And Republicans are surely good politicians, but they lost their heads this time, and they are driving as straight to the devil as possible and will not heed his words of warning. Now, the gentleman talks about booms that have been canceled. They started a good one out in Indiana, and Mr. Ralston, it seems to me, canceled one of Mr. Beveridge's. We have gone over into West Virginia and canceled a good deal of Republicanism over there. We have even carried the State of New Hampshire and retired one Congressman from that State; and I suggest, if the gentleman is satisfied with that, he will consent to a judgment by default for the same kind of result in 1924.

Mr. CLARKE of New York. Mr. Chairman, another pair of World War waifs have been found on the front doorstep of the Harding administration, and the names given them were ships—wooden and steel (correct spelling, steal).

In trying to trace their ancestry, no proud father arises to exclaim, "I am the man," but we have located their dejected mother, Mrs. Willful Wanton Waste; the grandmother was "too proud to fight" and the grandfather was "neutral in thought and act," all prominent officeholders in the previous Democratic administration.

At the official christening or launching of steel and wooden ships came two prominent figures who loomed larger on the horizon short years ago than now, the one, genial Newton B.,

Secretary of War, the man in charge of our national fighting right arm, a man who boasted he had "never even fought with wooden soldiers"; the other sprang full armed and equipped for the fray from a North Carolina editorship, in command of our national fighting left arm as Secretary of the Navy, the delightfully delicious Sir Josephus.

With an abandon that knew no bounds they first "watchfully waited" unprepared, until we got into the World War, then feverishly expended, gave away, squandered in the shameful reign of the war profiteer, three billions of dollars of the people's money on a shipbuilding program subscribed and paid into the Treasury of the United States through self-denial and sacrifice, but all to patriotically back up our fighting forces.

As a result there were started or built 589 wooden ships that cost over $300,000,000, and about 1,700 steel ships that cost about $3,300,000,000.

We have, fortunately, gotten rid of those monuments of folly, the wooden ships, at approximately one one-hundredth of their cost, but there still remain about 1,500 steel ships of various kinds in good, bad, and indifferent shape, but all more rapidly deteriorating from lack of use than they would if in use.

Our exports (exclusive of trade with near-by West Indian and Central American countries) are now over three times our imports. Of these exports foreign ships are carrying about 76 per cent and our American ships carry but 24 per cent—19 per cent in Shipping Board vessels, and 5 per cent in privately owned vessels. This is the measure of our success with our own ships, unequally competing against foreign ships, seeking to establish markets for our products. To carry this 19 per cent in our Shipping Board vessels costs approximately $50,000,000 in direct operating loss, to say nothing of deterioration, depreciation, insurance, and so forth, to say nothing of the fact that we have no forward-looking plan that means a real, progressive program for the upbuilding of a merchant marine for the United States.

The question squarely presented to this Congress is, what are we going to do toward taking these steel vessels we already have as a basis or the beginnings of a real merchant marine, and how are we to meet the handicaps of existing laws unless we pass the bill now under consideration, so that our own enterprising citizens can compete on an even basis with foreigners in carrying our products?

As President Harding wisely pointed out in his strong, logical, economically sound argument to the Congress, three courses lie open to us: (1) Destruction; (2) obstruction; (3) construction. The first plan, destruction, is unthinkable to me, for I do not believe in my heart that the American people would tolerate such a policy; on the other hand, I do believe our people want a merchant marine.

The second policy, obstruction, is the one that is evidently the Democratic policy. I freely admit that I was inclined at first to vote against this bill, for I am prejudiced against the idea of a subsidy, and I have been patiently waiting for the foster parents of this willful, profligate pair—wooden and steel ships—to evolve some constructive plan for the utilization of what is still left of this great fleet. So far the only constructive plan suggested from the most exhaustive study and research of the painstaking, hard-working Judge DAVIS is to wobble along with the present policy that is admittedly costing over $50,000,000 a year, and that is all that is offered against President Harding's clearly stated, forward-looking, constructive plan for now using these ships at an estimated annual cost of $30,000,000, a saving of at least $20,000,000, with the possibility of getting the Government out of the business, instead of the Democratic way of either keeping the Government in the business or watchfully and prayerfully waiting for God Almighty and more propitious times, as if our previous experience in the Government operation of the railroads had not taught us a lesson.

Brother NELSON of Wisconsin (JOHN M.) says the farmers are unanimously against the bill, in the face of the indorsement of the Farm Bureau, while Brother ATKINSON, of the Grange, is against the upbuilding of a merchant marine in accordance with the President's plan and specifications, as embodied in this bill, and only arrived at after the most exhaustive investigation and study. Now, I disagree with both Brothers NELSON and ATKINSON as to the attitude of the farmers; the trouble is the facts have not been squarely presented to them, and for that reason no verdict of real value obtained. I can as proudly claim to represent the farmer as they can, and the only letters I have received from my constituents are for the bill and urge me to follow the leadership of the President. I am proud to represent a constituency upon whose lovely hills and in whose enchanting vales roam more good dairy cows per acre than upon any equal acreage in the world. At times we need to ship our surplus dairy products in manufactured form into the outside markets of the world, and what is our dairy farmers' condition in a small way reflects a national condition and need.

The whole question with me is simply this: I believe the decisive factor in determining whether this country is prosperous or not is in finding markets abroad for the 8 to 12 per cent excess products we produce, and I am positive that we are more certain of finding markets for those excess products when we have our own ships carrying our own products, sailing to the Central and South American countries and to the Orient, on routes determined by Americans, than we are when we have to depend on foreign ships or the advice of foreign experts. I propose, therefore, as between Judge Davis's policy of painful, costly "watchful waiting," that he was so used to under the former President, or Government operation, and President Harding's policy, which he outlined to the Congress in his masterly message, with its definite, concrete proposals, to follow the President rather than to wait for some favoring breeze from somewhere, to somehow bring us into an era of prosperity or meet a national need. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto be now closed.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania moves that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto be now closed. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania striking out the section.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

HOME PORT OF VESSEL OF UNITED STATES.

SEC. 705. (a) The Secretary of Commerce is authorized to designate such ports of entry as he deems advisable as ports of documentation for vessels.

(b) For the purposes of section 30 of the merchant marine act, 1920, and of the navigation laws, the home port of a vessel shall be that port of documentation at or nearest to and in the same customs district as the place at which there is conducted the greater part of the vessel business of the owner of the vessel; except that the Secretary of Commerce shall by regulation prescribe the home port in cases where he finds that the above rule is not applicable, including among other cases the case of vessels owned by the United States or any governmental agency thereof, the case of vessels not engaged in trade, and the case where there is no port of documentation in the same customs district as the place at which the greater part of the vessel business of the owner is conducted. The decision of the Secretary of Commerce as to the home port of a vessel shall be final. Nothing in this section shall be held to repeal section 4178 of the Revised Statutes, as supplemented.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Mr. Chairman, on yesterday the distinguished chairman who is in charge of this bill made the statement that there was nothing in the existing law which forbade railroads to own stock in steamships or any steamship companies engaged in foreign trade. Simply in the interest of accuracy I want to read a part of section 9 of paragraph 5 of the interstate commerce act, which is as follows:

From and after the 1st day of July, 1914, it shall be unlawful for any railroad company or any common carrier subject to the act to regulate commerce to own, lease, operate, control, or have any interest whatsoever, by stock ownership or otherwise, either directly, indirectly, through any holding company, or by stockholders or directors in common, or in any other manner, in any common carrier by water operated through the Panama Canal or elsewhere with which said railroad or other carrier aforesaid does or may compete for traffic or any vessel carrying freight or passengers upon said water route or elsewhere with which said railroad or other carrier aforesaid does or may compete for traffic; and in case of the violation of this provision each day in which such violation continues shall be deemed a separate offense.

Under section 604 of the pending bill that provision is repealed in so far as railroads are concerned, if they desire to own an interest in ships engaged in foreign trade or even in trade where they touch the Philippine Islands ports. Here is the point that I wanted to call attention to: The transcontinental railroads will be able to own ships plying through the Panama Canal from one coast of this country to the other coast by touching some foreign port. By doing that they can put out of commission the steamship companies that are simply plying between ports of the Pacific coast, say, San Francisco, and ports of the Atlantic or Gulf coast, because the railroad companies can afford to buy an interest in a steamship line and ply through the Panama Canal from coast to coast and then, touching some foreign port, get a subsidy on the foreign portion of the cargo but, what is far more important, get an interest in the canal shipping lines.

In that way the railroads of the United States can control the traffic through the Panama Canal, and that is the thing that this section of the interstate commerce law was enacted, I understand, to forbid. But here in the section that we passed yesterday, section 607, paragraph 9 of section 5 of the interstate commerce act is amended by putting on a proviso that this part of the interstate commerce act shall not apply to railways owning an interest in ships operating under this bill.

Now, I submit to the Members of this Congress that when the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. EDMONDS] made the statement that there is nothing in the law—in his effort to keep us from striking out that section 604—nothing in the law which forbids a railroad under the present law from owning stock in a steamship company, he was in error.

I take it that no one wants to authorize the transcontinental railroads of the United States to get control of shipping that passes through the Panama Canal. That is what the railroads wanted to do all along, and it seems to me that it is a great mistake to pass a measure which would permit that. [Applause.]

Why was the Panama Canal constructed? Primarily, of course, in the hope that we would get cheaper freight rates between the coasts. In order to prevent the railways from getting control of the traffic through the canal and thus defeating the very purpose of its construction, section 5 was put in when the interstate commerce law was enacted forbidding railways from owning any interest in ships plying through the canal or elsewhere. Now it is proposed to repeal section 5, or at least to modify it in such a way as to destroy its effectiveness.

Of course, if the railways can get control of some such shipping companies, they will not care whether they make any money out of them; they can put their competitors out of business, destroy the traffic through the canal, and then force the freight back to the railroads, with the consequent increase in rates. Where does the public come in on such a proposition?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Chairman, I would like to speak on the amendment to the section.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is recognized on the pro forma amendment.

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Chairman, I do not suppose this will need very much explanation to the Members of the House. A few years ago in the merchant marine act of 1920 we passed a mortgage bill. When the Department of Commerce came to investigate the situation in regard to these mortgages it was found that under any law that we had or any law or definition of a home port that we had they would have to be registered at the home of the man who owned the ship. Therefore, having no specific place where any other person could find out where these documents were registered, the Department of Commerce sent to us and asked us if we could not define a home port in this bill, and we have done it by stating it to be the nearest customs office to the place where the man conducts the greater part of his vessel business.

You gentlemen will realize, particularly those of you who are attorneys, the value of this section. It will enable any of you who wish to look up the documents of a ship and find out what is recorded against the ship to ascertain the place to go. I do not believe you want any further discussion on this subject, because you must all understand it.

Mr. LOWREY. Mr. Chairman, my genial friend from Illinois, Governor YATES, has, I believe, escaped from the House. [Laughter.] I certainly do not want to shoot him in the back. Before going, however, he told us a good monkey story in a very happy way. By his discussion I am reminded of a discussion which took place between a gentleman from New York and a gentleman from Mississippi in regard to a recent Democratic victory in New York. The New Yorker was saying, "The State of New York is easily Republican, and when it does happen to go Democratic it is simply because the Republicans do not hang together." "Yes," replied my friend, "that is a weakness with the Republicans down South. Most of them, if they get anything like what is coming to them, do hang sooner or later, but they do not hang together." [Laughter.]

From my own observation I can testify that my southern friend is right. They generally hang at different county seats and on different Fridays.

But, if I yet have the time, I want to tell another monkey story to match that of the gentleman from Illinois. In a southern town two negroes were watching a monkey dressed in a brilliant red coat and dancing to the music of a hand organ. One negro said, "He's des ole time folks; dat's all he is. He ain't nuffin' but des ole time folks."

"Ef he ole time folks," replied the other negro, "den why don' he talk?"

"Case he got too much sense to talk," replied the first. "He kno' ef he talk de white folks will fin' out he des a common nigger and take dat fine coat off him and put him to work in de cotton patch." [Laughter.]

My friend from Illinois undertook to apply his story to illustrate the situation in the recent elections. I rather think my story illustrates it better. Some of our friends on the other side have talked entirely too much, and consequently some of them after the ides of March will find themselves stripped of their official robes and perhaps working in harder fields.

Again, I am afraid that during the discussion of this bill some who have rejoiced in reelection have been doing some talking that will cause them to "hang together" or "separately" at the November elections two years from now. I am glad to see, however, that quite a number of those who sit on the left side of the center aisle with the goats have been wise enough and brave enough to see straight and talk straight on this ship subsidy question. And for this reason some of the most objectionable features of the original bill have been corrected by amendment, and when the bill passes this House it will be by a majority many times smaller than the Republican majority in the House.

Finally, I want to say that no man on the majority side is more anxious than I to see a creditable and efficient American merchant marine, but I very profoundly believe that this bill, if passed, would cost the taxpayers many millions of dollars, encourage and strengthen dangerous monopolies, and finally mean little or nothing toward the establishment of American trade routes and the maintenance of the American flag on the high seas.

Some gentlemen have insisted that the policy of those on this side of the aisle is entirely destructive; that we oppose this bill without offering anything in its place. In refutation of this charge, I need only to call attention to speeches such as those of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. DAVIS], the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HARDY], and the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD]. Of course, we on the minority side have had no chance whatever during this session to frame and present a merchant marine bill. Our leaders, however, have pointed the way, and when this bill fails of passage, as I believe it will when it reaches the Senate, then I hope the majority will be willing to walk in the better way that has been pointed out to them, or that the Sixty-eighth Congress will at least see the way more clearly.

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this section close in one minute.

Mr. LANHAM. May I have about three minutes?

Mr. EDMONDS. I modify my motion and move that all debate close in four minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania moves that all debate on this section close in four minutes.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Chairman, I have listened carefully to the debate on this measure and have given special attention to the opposition, as I was desirous of getting reasons, if there were any of importance, why this House should not support this bill. We all agree that as a result of the war we have three billions of public money invested in an unprofitable and unsatisfactory enterprise. Both political parties proclaim their support for an American merchant marine, privately owned and privately operated. Every speaker on the bill and every Member of the House is not only disgusted with the past or present management and accomplishments of the Shipping Board but absolutely doubtful about its future. Every man here knows it is costing the taxpayers of this country fifty millions per year loss in operating expenses, to say nothing about depreciation, interest on capital invested, and so forth, which will easily amount to another fifty millions, or, if the whole truth is actually known, it is costing this country on the annual basis of one hundred millions per year to keep less than 30 per cent of its fleet in actual operation, and with nothing but absolute ruin staring us in the face. The longer we go on under present conditions the worse we are off, and in a few years we will have wasted our capital, spent fifty millions of good new money each year, forced privately owned American ships from the sea, and have completely wiped out a possibility of an American merchant marine for the next half century. Every member of the Shipping Board—four Republicans and three Democrats—absolutely agree on this.

We all agree that is the condition that confronts us. Now, are we going to stand idly by, bickering over party politics, personal prejudices and jealousies, and let this three billions be eaten up, or are we going to act like business men and at least try and save what we can out of the wreck? The question before you to-day is not how to develop and place a merchant marine on the ocean; it is how to utilize to the best advantage the one that is now on the ocean and ready to work. If we did not have these ships, I would not consider this bill for a minute; but the proposition now is what is the best way to get out of a bad mess. Let me say in passing, the party here that is solidly opposing this rescue measure had more to do in getting us into this trouble than we did, and they are solidly refusing to lift one pound to help get us out. This Shipping Board is not a Republican child. It was created under your administration. You spent the money. We are only trying to save as much as we can. If you do not like this measure, why do you not assume your share of the responsibility and try and make it better in committee, and all of us act on behalf of the people and try and save the taxpayers' money?

This bill does not entirely please any of us, but it is the result of the best thought and best knowledge we have and the only constructive measure along this line yet presented. The only constructive suggestion that has been offered by the opposition is to abolish the whole Shipping Board and put one man in charge, and if we can not do anything better I do not know but what I would do that. The whole debate on the opposition has developed into a tariff debate, and it is largely the main principle involved in this measure. This bill aims to protect an infant industry. It aims to protect American shipyards, employing high-paid American labor, as against cheaply paid Europeans. It aims to protect well-paid, well-fed, well-housed American seamen as opposed to the coolie labor of our competitors. I am in favor of the American protective policy as applied to our ships at sea just the same as I am in favor of protecting American agriculture and industry on land. It is exactly the same proposition, and I can not understand how any man who claims to be a protectionist and believes in it can be unwilling to give this industry the same protection he asks for his home products.

I represent a purely rural district. My home county is reputed to have more dairy cows than any county in the United States. The farmers of my district want a market for their butter and cheese, and any legislation that helps to build up an American industry that employs well-paid labor in this country helps to make a bigger and better market for the products raised on the farms of my State, and I can not see how any class of people are going to be more directly benefited by this legislation than the American farmer, for when we encourage shipbuilding in this country we are increasing the high-grade consuming class to buy his product at home, thus increasing demand, and with increased demand comes increased prices. With increased prices on agricultural products comes increased prosperity for rural communities.

When we encourage sailing ships in ocean trade, we increase competition there, and that tends toward lower freight rates on his product shipped abroad. I maintain the western farmer is just as much interested in freight rates on his wheat from New York to Liverpool as from St. Louis to New York. If he is as vitally interested as some of us think he is in water transportation from Duluth to Montreal, let me tell you he is interested in water transportation from Montreal to Liverpool. And that is what we are taking care of for him in this bill. The whole trouble is that this proposition has not been put up to him in the proper way. He has not been told the whole truth. If the press and public men had spent one-half as much time telling the honest truth about the merchant marine, its possibilities and benefits, as they have in maligning it and demagoguing about it the situation and feeling in certain parts of this country would be entirely different.

Do you suppose if the honest hard-working farmers of this country knew that to-day they were being taxed this year $50,000,000 to subsidize a Government-owned merchant marine they would object to legislation that has for its purpose a much more effective privately operated merchant marine at an actual saving to them in taxation of at least $20,000,000 per year? You need not tell me he would not understand it or object to the legislation. You put all the facts before the people and I am not afraid of their judgment.

Mr. Chairman, (1) I am for this bill because it favors building American ships in American shipyards, employing American labor who eat American farm products, some of which will be produced in my State.

(2) I am in favor of this bill because of the absolute assurance of reasonable freight rates it gives the American producer in peace times and the necessary added auxiliary defense it gives our Navy in time of war. As a defense proposition alone it is worth its cost.

(3) I am for this bill because it is the only constructive measure along this line presented by anyone.

(4) I am for it because I believe that American-owned lines of communication between foreign countries and our home markets are just as necessary for our future growth and development as efficient lines of transportation at home.

(5) I am for it because every true American believes in an American merchant marine, and you will never have one unless you utilize the ships you have now.

(6) I am for it because this favors private ownership and operation as opposed to the present inefficient and wasteful Government ownership and operation.

(7) Lastly, I am for it because it will be an absolute saving of from twenty-five to fifty millions a year to the present overburdened taxpayers of our country. I am for this legislation because it is in the interest of America as against England and Japan, and every interest these countries have in America is working against any legislation that tends to perpetuate American shipping on the high seas.

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I have been seeking to analyze the statement of my good friend from Illinois [Mr. YATES] and have come to the conclusion that it is tantamount to this, that under the anesthetic of his own personal majority he did not feel the pain of the recent operation which the Republican Party underwent. [Laughter.] The situation reminds me of the story of the young man from the East who went out West. His parents did not hear from him for a long time. One day they received a telegram to this effect:

Your son John was killed here to-day in a railway wreck. His head was mashed to a pulp, his chest crushed, both arms broken and both legs broken.

Then after about an hour there came to the grieving parents another telegram which said:

Mistaken as to details. Left arm not broken.

[Laughter.]

I think that summarizes the results of the recent election, and my good friend from Illinois [Mr. YATES] is taking comfort from the fact that the left arm was not broken. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired. All time has expired. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 706. Subsection B of section 30 of the merchant marine act, 1920, is amended to read as follows:

"Subsection B. When used in this section—

"(1) The term 'document' means certificate of registry or enrollment and license, whether permanent or temporary, but does not include a provisional certificate of registry;

"(2) The term 'port of documentation' when applied to any vessel means the home port of that vessel as shown in its documents;

"(3) The term 'vessel of the United States' means a vessel having a document issued under the laws of the United States, and for the purposes of this section such vessel shall be held to continue to be a vessel of the United States until the document is surrendered with the approval of the board; and

"(4) The term 'mortgagee,' in case of a mortgage involving a trust deed and a bond issue thereunder, means the trustee designated under the deed."

Mr. LANGLEY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. LANGLEY] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. LANGLEY. Mr. Chairman, I have not sought to take any of the time of the committee in the discussion of this bill, but have contented myself with voting on motions and amendments that have come up for consideration. I am going to say only a few words now because the time for debate is nearly exhausted, and every Member has made up his mind how he is going to vote, and the only purpose I could accomplish would be to have the RECORD show my reasons for the vote which I intend to cast when the time arrives for the voting on the final passage of the bill. I believe in economy of time, and therefore prefer to set forth those reasons in the RECORD rather than undertake to do so verbally at this juncture, and I shall do the former if the request for the privilege of extension in the RECORD, which I shall presently make, is granted, except as to one or two observations I desire to make now. In the first place, I am going to vote for this bill because I believe, aside from the importance of my country having commercial prestige upon the high seas, that it proposes the best, the most business-like, and economical method of handling the legacy which we inherited from the late criminally extravagant Democratic administration. [Applause on the Republican side.] In the second place, I propose to stand by our great leader and patriotic President upon this question, and I pause here to assert that I have listened attentively to this entire debate and I have not heard a single logical answer made by either Democrat or Republican to any one of the arguments contained in his superb message in support of this bill. [Applause on the Republican side.]

It is not my purpose to assume the rôle of lecturer to any colleague on my own side of the House, but I wish to state that I think it is high time that we had some solidarity of action and some teamwork in our own party [applause] if we are going to maintain the prestige of the Republican Party in the Nation. We can not do that unless we stand by our President and our own party leaders, once in awhile at least. [Laughter and applause.] If we can not legislate with the majority we have, and are going to permit the Democrats to bullyrag us and run this Government with the Republicans in power, we might as well disband and go home. [Laughter and applause.] We need more of the spirit of cooperation, my fellow Republicans, more unity of action, if we expect to stem the tide two years hence. [Applause on the Republican side.] Our Democratic friends seem to take great pleasure in referring to what they think and what they claim was a spanking which the people of the country gave the Republican Party at the late election, and in contending that this was chiefly due to the opposition of the people to this bill. To me these are amusing contentions. In the first place, the President openly and repeatedly advocated the enactment of this legislation two years ago when he was a candidate for the presidency, and the people knew this when they gave him 7,000,000 popular majority. My version of it is that the people were so anxious to rebuke the Democratic Party two years ago when they gave this 7,000,000 popular majority for the Republican ticket that they lost sight largely of the congressional races and of necessity gave us a very large and abnormal Republican majority in both Houses of Congress. In view of all of the misrepresentation that was indulged in in the late campaign and of existing conditions in general, following as it did the abnormalities succeeding the war, we ought to be satisfied and proud of the fact that we have a majority of 10 in the Senate and 20 in the House. [Applause.] It shows one thing at least, and that is that this country is normally Republican and that it is back of the man now at the helm of the ship of state who has been confronted with the greatest problems that ever confronted a President of this Republic, Abraham Lincoln not excepted. [Applause.] That is all I have to say now. I shall say more in the RECORD a little later on. [Applause.]

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Chairman, there is room for difference of opinion as to the merits of this measure. There can be no difference of opinion among honest men as to the way in which this bill is being passed.

There is always room for honest differences of opinion upon economic measures, and for those who believe in the principle of a public subsidy for the shipping interests I have no sharp criticism. But there is never room for difference of opinion upon matters of straight dealing and political and public honor, so that I am compelled to feel contempt for the shiftiness, evasiveness, and chicanery which inspire the effort to pass this bill under whip and spur at this particular time and by special session of Congress called for that purpose.

The administration has known for 18 months that it intended to put this legislation through Congress. The Republican leaders have been in full harmony with the administration's purpose and have acquiesced in the way the matter has been handled. From the time the present administration was inaugurated on March 4, 1921, until the present, Congress has been in session practically continuously. Why has not this bill, which has for its purpose the grant of public funds from the Treasury in aid of shipowners, been brought up before now? The answer is obvious. We were to have an election on November 7. Those in control did not dare to bring the bill up. It has been on the calendar for months, but they did not dare to ask for its passage because they feared that Congressmen of their own party who were seeking reelection could not be induced to violate the wishes of their constituents and support it—they feared that such of their members as did support it would pay dearly for their action in the elections.

And why is a special session called? Why not wait until the next Congress assembles, with its new mandate from the people? Again the answer is clear that new Members of the next Congress, fresh from the people and willing to perform the will of their constituents, could not be induced to vote for the bill. The measure is being presented now and under the existing circumstances because it is realized that there is no hope to get it passed by the next Congress. Its sole hope of passage lies in the votes of Republican Congressmen who have been defeated for reelection and to whom the people have already done all that it is possible to do to show their displeasure.

This Chamber bears the aspect of a legislative hall but in reality at this time it is a morgue, a charnel house. It seems to be a place for the living; in reality it is the abode of the dead. Upon the Republican side of the House there are 110 Members who have not been reelected to the next Congress. It is by the support of these "dead men" that this bill will be passed.

You may go up and down the aisles on the Republican side and look into the face of many a dear departed one and say, "Does not he look natural?" Color is in his cheeks and he has the semblance of life but in reality he is dead. By reason of a provision of our Constitution, applicable to the old stage-coach days when it took months for Members to reach Washington after being elected, a new Congress begins on March 4 after the November election. For the intervening months Members who have been politically executed by their constituents continue in their seats and may legislate in utter disregard of the public welfare and the people's wishes. Due to this out-of-date constitutional provision, these 110 Republicans continue in office and are able to reach dead hands out of political graves to push this measure to passage.

Was there ever a greater farce? A bill brought forward with the deliberate purpose of it being passed by those who really represent no one but themselves, who are merely the gray ghosts of dead politicians. Oh, you ghostly Congressmen, I beg you to sustain in your political graves the same principles of public honor and good faith that you cherished while alive! [Applause.]

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this section and amendments thereto close in 15 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania moves that all debate on this section and amendments thereto close in 15 minutes.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Alabama has made a speech against the merchant marine bill which is under consideration. In that 5 minutes the gentleman from Alabama has advanced all the arguments against the measure which are at his command. The sum and substance of the argument of the distinguished gentleman is that we ought not to follow out the provisions of the Constitution which decide the terms of the members of the American Congress, but that we ought to follow the leadership of the new advocates who pay no attention to the Constitution and want to set up their own judgment and say that when the elections are over every member who is not to serve in the next Congress is not permitted to vote on any measure before the House. The gentleman seems to think the country in the recent elections repudiated the Republican Party in the House. Is there a Democratic victory in the House? No. The country sent back a Republican House. The country retained a Republican Senate. This country believes in an American merchant marine and this bill will be written into law.

My notion is that the people of this country want this great American Republic to have an American merchant marine, and that the people of this country want us to dispose of this great perplexing problem of $5,000,000,000 worth of ships left to us by a former administration for disposition which are costing us a loss of 50 millions per year. We can not shirk the duty which confronts us, I care not what the gentleman from Alabama may say. We must meet this problem not as politicians seeking votes but as American statesmen undertaking to deal with a great economic and national problem. [Applause.]

I do not believe personally in national disarmament, and a merchant marine is necessary unless the Republic shall entirely disarm. I believe in international agreements for the limitation of armament and we have a certain agreement pending. But my friends, unless we have an American merchant marine such as is proposed by this measure—and no substitute is offered—unless we have an American merchant marine, if the terms of the Armament Conference are carried out, we shall leave America defenseless among the nations of the world. [Applause.]

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, it has frequently been said during this debate that there has been offered for consideration of the committee no substitute proposition to take the place of the bill with which you are presented. Anyone familiar with the legislative situation knows that that would be absolutely futile. If we attempted to present a concrete proposition it would meet the same fate as the amendments which we have proposed. Before the debate closes I desire to suggest some alternate propositions to meet the emergency situation in which we are placed.

First. Abolish the monopoly of the American shipbuilders by permitting the American shipowners to buy ships wherever they can be bought cheapest and to sail her where she can make the most money, and put all ship material on the free list.

Second. Enforce in letter and spirit all the provisions of the seaman's act, thereby insuring safety at sea and the most skillful efficiency in operation and equalization of wages on American and foreign ships on all lines to and from American ports.

Mr. LANGLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BANKHEAD. No; I have not the time.

Third. Eliminate for all time all suggestions of cash subsidy.

Fourth. Enforce with full vigor the provisions of sections 5, 6, and 7 of the Jones Act. These sections provide, respectively, for the sale and temporary operation of Shipping Board vessels.

Fifth. Sell to Americans or foreigners, give away, or scrap the undesirable portion of our fleet. Mr. Lasker says that only about half of it is desirable for operation in competition. This will reduce the overhead of upkeep and administration very greatly.

Sixth. Repeal section 34 of the Jones Act.

Seventh. Abolish the managing agency form of contract and have Government ships operated by competent shipping men for a stipulated salary on a business basis.

The following Government compensation to private operators is not unconscionable—does not involve any vicious direct subsidy out of the Treasury, and, if thought desirable, involves the exercise of a reasonable discretion:

1. To provide that Army, Navy, and Marine Corps transportation may be done by privately owned vessels, at the discretion of the President, where such ships are available and will contract to perform the service on reasonable terms.

2. To require all officials of the Government, where the expense is out of the Treasury, to travel on privately operated ships where such ships are available and will contract to perform the service on reasonable terms.

3. Require 50 per cent of all immigrants to come in American vessels, after agreements to make existing treaties harmonize with immigration laws of the United States are concluded.

4. Adequate, direct compensation to ship operators for carrying United States mails.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Alabama has expired.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I do not think it would be possible for me to get an extension of time under the agreement.

Mr. MONDELL. How much more time does the gentleman want?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I would like to have five minutes more.

Mr. MONDELL. Could not the gentleman make the statement in three?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I would be very glad to have the opportunity to make the statement if I could.

Mr. LANGLEY. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, if the gentleman will yield to me for a question I will not object.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may continue for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. LANGLEY. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the right to object.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I ask for the regular order. If there is objection I want it made.

Mr. LANGLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I do not make the agreement under any conditions.

Mr. LANGLEY. Then I object.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Very well. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BEGG. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, the first part of the debate upon this question was devoted by the opposition to the question of taxation. That was horribly exploded just the other day, but in order to emphasize it I want to call attention to-day to the fact that nearly all of the time of the opposition to this bill has been consumed by gentlemen from Alabama, gentlemen from Tennessee, and gentlemen from Texas. After the bill is practically through they confine themselves to sounding condolences to the Republican Party upon what is going to happen to it. I want to say to you men seriously that if you will quit worrying over what is going to happen to the Republican Party and give a little bit of your consideration to what is going to happen to the United States of America after we have written the subsidy bill into law and provided an American merchant marine, the people from your States will be a great deal more interested than in the demagogic utterances of gentlemen on the floor of the House of Representatives.

I get tired listening to men making speeches after every great measure telling what is going to happen to the American people. We went through a period of that after the tariff bill, and I am going to tell you what happened in Ohio after the tariff bill was passed. The 5,000,000 men that you threw out of work by the Underwood bill were set to work and put on the pay rolls so they could make a decent living for their families. The same thing will happen under this bill.

Just to show the membership of this House the kind of statesmanship that is fighting this bill, I am going to begin with Alabama, because my distinguished friend here, Mr. HUDDLESTON, from that State seemed to be troubled and worried because some men on the Republican side are going to cast their ballot after the election is over. Do you know that if this bill passes and becomes a law your people in Alabama will be taxed the magnificent sum of 5 cents per head per annum, and in 10 years that every single possible cent that you can pay, so far as the money goes, will be 50 cents per head, and at the same time you drew out of the Treasury a direct subsidy for education alone last year of $1 per head. It seems to me it is about time for a man who pays a 5-cent tax and gets a 10-cent tax given him, to begin to get into line and do a little less demagoging and give a little more serious thought and study to the question of finance. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Let us now take the State of Tennessee. My genial friend, the minority leader, the other day was very much exercised over the fact that it was going to cost the State of Tennessee 9 cents per capita; and what for? To fly the American flag on the high seas over every dollar's worth of commerce that sails from this land. Go home, you men, and tell your constituents the truth. Do not demagogue about $30,000,000, because it is not going to cost $30,000,000; but tell them the truth—that the maximum tax that they can pay in 10 years is 90 cents per head, and ask them if they would rather have their American soldiers shipped under the British flag or have the Stars and Stripes flying over them?

I want to ask you men from Texas whether you would rather ship your beef and cotton in American ships, under the American flag, or pay a tribute to Great Britain or Japan? [Applause on the Republican side.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired. All time has expired. Without objection, the pro forma amendment is withdrawn, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 707. Section 4141 of the Revised Statutes is amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 4141. Every vessel, except as otherwise provided by law, shall be registered by the collector of customs at the home port of the vessel."

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the section. I have been very much entertained by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BRIGGS], who never demagogues. The gentleman continually refers to the fact that some States pay a great deal more income and other Federal taxes than other States. The fact that it is collected in New York does not mean that it is produced there. The gentleman ought to know, if he is not a mere politician or demagogue, instead of a business man, that it is what a State produces, it is the basic production of this country, that establishes the position of a State industrially and otherwise, and that because of the handling and manipulation of things at certain great centers, great profits are drawn to those centers, and the Government is enabled to collect its tax at those centers, and thus make it appear, for instance, that everything is produced in New York. The basic products which produce the wealth of the country are farms, forests, mines, mineral production, lumber, and so forth. New York, about which the gentleman speaks, produces 3.05 per cent of these basic products. South Carolina produces 2.04 per cent, and Ohio 3.83 per cent. In other words, they all run along in a class. South Carolina produces a million and a half bales of cotton and the whole South produces 10,000,000 bales of cotton; yet in New York alone they sold 101,000,000 bales of cotton on the cotton exchange and robbed the people who actually made the stuff by this manipulation and depreciation and speculation, and thereby had great income taxes. I set out here the statement of this matter, showing the per cent of basic products each State makes and the per cent of public road fund each State received from the $275,000,000 appropriated up to 1920. This table is by an expert of the Commerce Department, found on page 2949, CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, Sixty-sixth Congress.

The total value of the basic annual products of the United States from farms, forests, and mines, namely, mineral products, lumber, wool, poultry and eggs, dairy products, domestic animals, and agricultural crops, was $30,251,702,506. The following summary indicates the proportion of that total produced by each State, and the proportion of Federal aid received by each State in the allocation of the $275,000,000 heretofore appropriated under the present highway plan:

State.	Per cent of production.	Per cent of Federal aid.
Alabama.....	2.26	2.17
Arizona.....	2.17	1.41
Arkansas.....	2.01	1.73
California.....	2.70	3.14
Colorado.....	1.30	1.79
Connecticut.....	.35	.63
Delaware.....	.14	.17
Florida.....	.64	1.18
Georgia.....	2.64	2.78

Mr. ROSSDALE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEVENSON. The same way with Chicago. The people out West make an enormous amount of wheat, but what becomes of the profits of it? It is all absorbed in Chicago. The same way about the packers. The cattle business of the West is large, but the packers absorb and monopolize and get all the profits. You talk about basic products and talk about demagoguery and talk about the fact that we pay a small amount in South Carolina and they pay a large amount out in Ohio, when we make nearly as much basic products as they do, and say for that reason we ought to vote for what is wrong. I say the people of Ohio, the people of Illinois, and the people of New York need protection against the fellows they send here who brazenly vote large taxes and large expenditures of money and confessedly say they do it because they have the right to do it. The gentleman from Ohio has spoken to this House from time to time in a sneering way in referring to Texas, and says that the Texas people pay very little. Let us see about Texas. It produces of the basic products of this country 5.43, while Ohio produces 3.81. Pennsylvania alone exceeds Texas, producing 5.50 per cent of basic products.

Mr. BLANTON. Nearly twice as much as Ohio produces?

Mr. STEVENSON. Yes. Illinois produces 5.08 and she has got some right to come here and talk; and if the gentleman sneers at Texas and sneers at the small tax they pay, why, if you will keep a lot of the centers from robbing the Texas farmers of what they make and depressing their prices and confiscating their property—if you will stop that, Texas will pay more than Ohio and as much as New York pays next year. [Applause.]

Mr. HOGAN. Mr. Chairman, when we vote upon this measure to-day we are called upon to do more than decide whether we shall enact a subsidy bill into law—we are asked to determine whether the American people shall develop this into the greatest of maritime nations with resultant prosperity and civilization or give way to the power and convenience of the British Empire.

The issue is simple: Since the time of Alexander Hamilton we have contended in this country that Congress should provide a protective tariff high enough to cover the difference between the cost of production here and abroad, to encourage our manufactures, to stimulate agriculture, and to give employment to our wage earners. So unanswerable has been this contention that the Democratic Party which has opposed it in principle has not failed to provide a modicum of it in practice. And so efficacious has it been that there is no reason why it should not be extended to our merchant marine. By a subsidy we are no more benefiting a few at the expense of the many than when we restrict foreign competition with our commodities and thereby save them for the benefit of America. By a subsidy we cover labor and other differences in cost here and abroad and thereby enable our ship builders and owners to survive upon the ocean. It seems to me it is just as worth while to save our merchant marine for America, in order that we may carry our own goods in our own bottoms, as it is to save our farms and our factories and the standard of living of our workmen, the highest in the world, for America. If we do not do so, the British marine will carry our goods. It is not good for one nation to depend upon another for anything, much less free and independent America. Great Britain is for Great Britain. I do not blame her for that. But I blame anybody here who is for Great Britain before he is for America. I want America to continue to be what she is, the first nation in the world, and therefore I want her to be first on the sea. You can not be first in anything unless you are willing to sacrifice. The sacrifice in money called for in this bill is infinitesimal as compared to the great good to our commerce which will result. And so I heartily support it.

If we look back over the past we find that the peoples of the earth which have risen to dominating position have been those which have been able to maintain themselves on the sea. Had the merchants and mariners of Tyre not gone down to the sea in ships, Phœnicia would not have given to the world the alphabet. The arrogance with which she used her power at last brought her to the doom prophesied by Ezekiel. By sea power Carthage also arose to dominion and for a time disputed with Rome for command of the Mediterranean. She held it with varying success during three Punic wars, until the hand of Scipio wrested it from her, and thereby was enabled to give us Roman law. Had Athens not built ships to meet Persia at Salamis, Alexander and his successors would not have been enabled to spread abroad the civilization of Hellas. When she, too, had finally passed under the power of Rome, the Italian peninsula developed state after state, which grew to prosperity through merchant fleets. Venice, Genoa, Florence, and Naples added their chapters to the maritime history of our globe and, therefore, to the spread of civilization. Portugal rounded the cape. Spain took a mariner from Genoa and discovered the continent which was to become the beacon to free the earth and which was to supply more wealth than the rest of the world combined. Spanish pride was brought low when Drake destroyed her armada. The Hanse towns followed in the wake of the Norse sailors in seeking new lands and markets. Holland enriched herself and gave herself strength to grant an asylum for the molested of other countries by the development of a marine which also fell before that of England. Then London, "great in the midst of many waters," became a second Tyre. She swept from the seas the merchant as well as the war ships of Napoleon and gave him the incentive for selling to us the vast territories comprised within the Louisiana Purchase, extending from New Orleans up the Mississippi to the Rockies.

In the very moment of England's zenith on the seas a new people which had sprung up out of her injustice in the days of the American Revolution challenged her supremacy. By the skill of her builders, the daring of her fishermen and sailors, and the genius of her merchants the United States outstripped the motherland and earned the title of mistress of the ocean. We gained a heritage with the reckless daring exemplified by John Paul Jones. Bath in Maine and Gloucester in Massachusetts rose to fame. In 1789 the United States had 123,000 tons of deep-water shipping, carrying 17 per cent of our imports and 91 per cent of our exports. Five years later we carried 91 per cent of our imports and 86 per cent of our exports. We caused Edmund Burke to declare in the House of Commons:

Neither the perseverance of Holland nor the activity of France nor the dexterous and firm sagacity of English enterprise ever carried this most perilous mode of hardy industry to the extent to which it has been pushed by this recent people—a people who are still, as it were, in the gristle and not yet hardened into the bone of manhood.

The War of 1812, fought by Great Britain to maintain the right of search and seizure, interrupted our marine development. But when the war was over we took hold again, and 12 years after the war was over the London Times asked:

Twelve years of peace and what is the situation of Great Britain? The shipping interest, the cradle of our navy, is half ruined. Our commercial monopoly exists no longer, and thousands of our manufacturers are starving or seeking redemption in distant lands. We have closed the western Indies against America from feelings of commercial rivalry. Its active seamen have already engrossed an important branch of our carrying trade to the eastern Indies. Her starred flag is now conspicuous on every sea and will soon defy our thunder.

From 1830 to 1836 our merchant marine increased 12 per cent a year while that of Great Britain increased 1 per cent. In the forties and fifties we were supreme on the seas. Then came the Civil War—four years of it. After that came the development of our manufactures. Railroad construction, manufacturing development, and the lure of the great West furnished new outlet for American capital and manhood. In 1870 we carried 35 per cent of our trade in our own bottoms, in 1880 but 17 per cent, and in 1914 but 9 per cent.

We have built up the West. We have developed our industries until we are the wealthiest Nation of all time. We have produced the inventive genius to enlighten and transform the world. We furnished the manhood in the Great War to turn the tide of battle and save our allies. We must now return to the great task we laid down in 1860 and again show what American intrepidity can do on the ocean. We must maintain our commerce and our civilization by our trade upon the sea. We must not lag behind in our quest of outlet for our energy, but must go on and enable our ships to carry forward the message of our civilization and our liberty. We must not admit that England can do that which we can not do. Republicanism is better than monarchism. Our civilization is superior to hers. Certainly the prosperity of our people is as vital to us as that of the English people is to England. Let us then give to our marine the few millions necessary to enable us to use the fleets we developed during the Great War and to use them for the benefit of America. [Applause.]

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this section do now close.

The motion was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 708. Subdivision (a) of subsection O of section 30 of the merchant marine act, 1920, is amended to read as follows:

"Subsection O (a). The documents of a vessel covered by a preferred mortgage may not be surrendered without the approval of the board, except (1) in the case of forfeiture of the vessel or its sale by order of any court of the United States or any foreign country, or (2) in case of the renewal of the documents without change in ownership of the vessel, or (3) in case of change of documents incident to change of trade but without change in ownership of the vessel. The board shall refuse its approval unless the mortgagee consents to the surrender."

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BEGG] has repeated to-day his oft-used argument in the House that Members from those States which do not show a large payment of income taxes should be reluctant to express their views upon pending legislation involving public expenditures. The gentleman took occasion to emphasize in his remarks that debate to-day upon the Democratic side of the House has been chiefly conducted by Members from Alabama, Tennessee, and Texas, and he referred to the speeches of these Members as demagoguery. Not having participated in the debate myself until now, I think I can say without immodesty that the debate from this side of the House has been of a very enlightening and informing nature and has been very far from demagoguery. Now, the gentleman from Ohio is, of course, a statesman, also an orator and a scholar. No one will dispute it, not even himself. The press of his State speak highly of him; the pulpit of his State speak highly of him; the bar of his State speak highly of him, but I have heard no one speak as highly of him as he does himself. [Laughter and applause.]

The gentleman refers, not only in this debate but he did so in the debate upon the good roads bill, to the small amount of income tax paid by the people of such great agricultural States as Texas, which produce a large part of the real basic wealth of the Nation, as compared to the amount of tax paid by certain financial and industrial States like New York, Pennsylvania, and Ohio. I want to say to the gentleman that the people of our great agricultural States are waking up to the fact that it is a matter of very serious concern to inquire why such a very large part of the income of the country flows into these great industrial and financial centers instead of being distributed to those who really produce it. [Applause.] And we are finding out—the people are finding out the reason why New York pays such an enormous income tax. They are finding out why States like Pennsylvania and Massachusetts have such impressive income-tax figures. They know these great incomes have been built up largely because of subsidy legislation such as is proposed in this ship subsidy bill and by the Fordney-McCumber protective tariff. [Applause.] I am glad, Mr. Chairman, I have an opportunity at this hour to register my protest against this bill and my emphatic vote against it when the vote is taken.

One of the most serious economic and social problems with which we are now perplexed is the concentration of such a large part of the wealth of the country in the hands of so small a minority of the people.

I have no war to make upon capital legitimately acquired. I would like to see more men of capital. By that I mean more men of moderate means who are able by thrift and industry to accumulate something ahead and invest it in homes, in farms, in industries. Men will better be able to do this by equalization of opportunity, by removal of favoritism. Their task is made much more difficult by legislation like this we now have before us, which would vote a direct subsidy out of the pockets of the taxpayers into the pockets of the shipowners; it is made more difficult by laws like the Fordney-McCumber tariff law, which give indirect subsidies by means of high tariff rates.

These kinds of laws must stop if the average man is to have his chance. I voted against the Fordney-McCumber tariff law and I will certainly register my vote just as emphatically against this ship subsidy bill.

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, as I will not probably have another opportunity to say anything on this bill, I wish just to make a few observations.

WHAT IS A SUBSIDY?

It is peculiar of the present age that we are apt to speak in positive objection to propositions which upon investigation prove entirely different from the ideas we have acquired by superficial thought. One of the most recent examples of this is the turmoil created by the proposition to pay compensation to equalize the cost of operation between American and foreign ships, which can be termed "compensation," "subsidy," or "subvention" with equal propriety.

If you study your Standard Dictionary you will find a subsidy means:

Pecuniary aid directly granted by a government to an individual or commercial enterprise deemed productive of public benefit.

Synonyms: Aid, allowance, bonus, bounty, gift, grant, indemnity, pension, premium, reward, support, etc.

Illustration: A nation grants a subsidy to an ally, pays a tribute to a conqueror.

A subvention means "a grant" and compensation means "to recompense," taken in connection with the merchant marine. Any or either of these terms could be used to describe what it is proposed the Government should do to aid in the establishment of a merchant marine.

Subsidies for many purposes can be found by investigation into the history of all nations. The building of a merchant marine was only one of the many ways a subsidy was applied.

This also has been true of our own Government almost from the time of its origination and in many lines of endeavor. For instance, what is a tariff but an indirect tax on all of the people for the purpose of keeping American labor at a standard unknown in other countries? It is a subsidy to labor.

Much has been said about the opposition of the farmer to a subsidy to ships, particularly those farmers in the Middle West. It is a marvel to me that the farmer whose very existence on a farm was made possible by a subsidy can even think of a subsidy as an improper legislative proposition. No one knows better than he does that it was the 133 separate land grants made between 1850 and 1870 to railroad companies, covering a total of nearly 200,000,000 acres of the public domain, that made possible the opening of his markets. These grants were made with the full consent and assistance of the settled portions of the country and were indirectly a subsidy to the farmer, rendering his existence possible. A list of these grants will give an idea to many of the beneficiaries of this subsidy how dependent for their start they were upon them.

Land grants made by Congress for railroads, wagon roads, and canals.

Modern conditions have required that transportation to railroads and into near-by urban settlements should be made by vehicles and economy demanded that the old mud road should make way for the hard road so that greater loads and quicker passage of products would be guaranteed. Here, within the past few years, we again find Congress legislating in conjunction with the States for the expenditure of hundreds of millions of dollars for the joint construction of roads all over the country. Did the farmer then find the heavy taxpaying districts of the country refusing to countenance this subsidy which was of peculiar benefit to him?

And again in the past 10 years, from 1911 to 1921, the War Department has expended $357,000,000 for river and harbor improvements, $119,000,000 of which went for harbors and $238,000,000 for rivers, just to enable the people of the Middle West to market their products cheaply—another subsidy from the Government for sectional benefit, and again no objection from the large centers of the country as to the charges involved.

Does the farmer not recognize the valuable assistance given him in the eradication of plant and animal disease by both National and State Governments? In 1921 the National Government spent $24,500,000 in this work. It is fair and proper to argue that the whole country is benefited by this subsidy, but the financial benefit from this expenditure of the taxpayers' money remains with the farmer and not with the taxpayer.

In the McKinley tariff of 1890, which provided for the free admission of sugar, the cane-sugar grower of Louisiana and the beet-sugar producer must remember the bounty on sugar of 2 cents per pound provided for in that bill, and did we ever hear of those interested protesting against the payment of that subsidy?

And yet with all of these subsidies continued for years, and with the good results achieved by them, and let us hope for many years to come that the good work will go on, we find the so-called agitator describing the farmer as up in arms against a ship subsidy, the only reason for opposition being that a ship subsidy will benefit but some few capitalists, when if his better thought is given to the subject he would find that he himself is the principal beneficiary. To no one industry in the country is the prompt removal of surplus so vital as it is to the farmer. Within the past year he can remember the advance in the price of corn occasioned by the removal of the corn for Russia, and surely no farmer is so ignorant as to expect the best thought and service for the removal of his surplus products to come from his competitor whose own personal interests must always be paramount.

If you do not pay a subsidy to your ships you must perforce pay tribute to your commercial enemies.

The late David Lubin said if shipping interests had a private understanding of what rates are to be "the few holders of such advance information will be in a position to operate in the bourses or exchanges as successfully as a gambler playing with loaded dice," and further, "Such information will enable them to manipulate directly or indirectly the principal market centers in the world." Is it the desire of our people to place such power in the hands of foreign shippers instead of American shippers? Remember the price abroad sets the price at home.

The opposition to subsidies for shipping in this country in the past has not been so much to the subsidy as it has been to the manner in which the subsidy was obtained and the payment of it to certain favored individuals under suspicious circumstances. The present proposed subsidy has no favorites; it is paid to all who qualify properly; and when a reasonable return is made by the recipient, he is required to return to the Government 50 per cent of all over that return until the full subsidy is replaced in the fund. No one can ask for a fairer provision than that.

If we turn our memories back to the years following the outbreak of the war in Europe and notice the unfortunate trend of prices when the foreign shipping that we depended upon to remove our surplus disappeared, we can readily realize the enormous value to the people, particularly the farmer, in having the shipping under our flag both for commercial purposes and, if the necessity arises, for defense. All the country was united in appropriating for one or two battleships annually, costing $40,000,000 or more apiece. For the cost of one of those ships you are going to have afloat under the American flag from 700 to 800 merchant ships, useful not only for commerce but for purposes of defense. What more reasonable security could a nation like ours indulge in?

Carl Vrooman, Assistant Secretary of Agriculture under President Wilson, after experiencing the difficulties in the early days of the war, said in his address entitled "The Farmer and the Shipping Bill":

In the past the average farmer has not considered a merchant marine necessary to his happiness or his financial welfare. Our farmers have never been slow to make use of the most up-to-date agricultural implements, of the automobile, or of the tractor. Nor have they been at all backward about fighting for what they considered to be their rights in the matter of railway freight rates. But up to date most of our farmers, particularly in the Middle West, have paid little or no attention to their commercial rights and requirements in the way of ocean transportation. This is not because the question is not to them a vital one, but merely because the facts about it have not been brought to their attention.

If for any unforeseen reason Congress should fail to take steps at this session to provide the country with an independent American merchant marine, it would pay the farmers of America, and "pay them big," to chip in and build a merchant marine for themselves. Our farmers could readily afford to spend not merely the $50,000,000 called for by the pending shipping bill, but $100,000,000, or even $200,000,000, in such an enterprise. If it were necessary, which it would not be, they could run such ships at a yearly loss of from 5 to 10 per cent on the last-named sum and still profit by the undertaking.

In other words, it is a fact capable of demonstration that the most crying need of agriculture in this country to-day is for an independent American merchant marine.

EXORBITANT OCEAN RATES.

At the beginning of the war it cost about 5 cents a bushel to ship wheat from New York to Liverpool, but during the past few months it has cost over 40 cents. The rate is now 48 cents. At the beginning of the war it cost about one-fourth cent per pound to ship cotton across the Atlantic. To-day it costs in the neighborhood of 3 cents a pound. Other products of our farms and factories are paying similar extortionate freight rates.

As the world price of wheat is determined by the law of supply and demand, and is established at Liverpool rather than at your local market or mine, it is clear that if the cost of ocean transportation were to-day 8 cents instead of 48 cents, the wheat growers of this country would receive a substantial part of this difference in a higher price for their wheat. It is a highly significant fact that on February 15, 1916, the cash price of No. 2 hard winter wheat was 49 cents higher in Liverpool than in New York, while on the same day the ocean freight rate for wheat from New York to Liverpool was 47.9 cents. With facts like this staring us in the face it is not difficult to see the close connection existing between ocean freight rates and the price the American farmer gets for his wheat. It is true that we are getting good prices for wheat now, but, as Liverpool is paying enormously higher prices, there seems to be no good reason for allowing the international shipping combine to take advantage of the crop shortage in Europe and the ship shortage on the high seas to boost freight rates 100 to 1,600 per cent.

This year we have the largest wheat crop and one of the largest corn crops in our history. If we had adequate shipping facilities for carrying our goods at reasonable rates to the markets of the world, prices of farm products would be so enormously increased as to bring a net gain to our farmers of over $300,000,000 on our wheat alone or our cotton alone. Moreover, even at present exorbitant rates, it is impossible to get ships in which to transport to market a large percentage of our products of farm and factory. Not only are all the docks and storehouses of our leading Atlantic ports glutted with goods but every important railway between the West and our seaboard has its terminals so crowded with loaded cars that a practical railway embargo recently has been declared on further grain shipments from the West.

Secretary McAdoo, in an address made January 9, 1915, in Chicago, said:

If ship subsidies can not be obtained, if discriminating duties are unavailable, if Government guaranties of the bonds of private corporations can not be granted, if the standard of wages of the American sailor can not be lowered, if private capital can not, for all or any of these reasons, be induced to build up an American merchant marine, what is the remedy?

You will note his recognition first of all of a subsidy as the most favorable and permanent way of upbuilding the American merchant marine.

The only option we have that it is possible to consider is Government ownership and operation. Surely no student of our Government would be willing to have the powers expressed by David Lubin placed in the hands of a government official or board. Again the experience of the past few years has shown conclusively that our Government as it is constituted is not flexible enough to enter into a business enterprise in which foreign competition is the principal factor. Decisions must be made on a moment's notice, and can be possible only by a management which is capable and has the authority to do so. Such powers can not be conferred upon a Government board with the expectation that they would act as would a private corporation or individual. Many times during the past few years Shipping Board boats have moved in ballast at an expense to the Government because cargo that was offered at rates lower than the fixed rate could not be taken for fear that the Government or its representatives would be charged with favoritism.

Overseas trade with the competition incident thereto does not lend itself easily to rules and regulations. Nothing more could be desired by our competitors than the defeat of this bill. By the use of every argument, both openly and by underhand methods, they have impeded our efforts to build up a merchant marine. They know control of shipping means control of the world's markets, and it must be evident to us that this opposition should arm us to guard against any propaganda that would confuse the issue, which is plainly before us, and that is American ships, under the American flag, delivering American merchandise for Americans, or foreign control of our markets through control of shipping under foreign flags. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I ask permission to revise and extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Chairman, I move that debate on this section do now close.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. I would like to have five minutes on this section—well, all right.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SURRENDER OF DOCUMENTS.

Sec. 709. Section 42 of the shipping act, 1916, is amended to read as follows:

"Sec. 42. That any vessel registered, enrolled, or licensed under the laws of the United States shall be deemed to continue to be documented under the laws of the United States within the meaning of section 9 and of subdivision (b) of section 37, until such registry, enrollment, or license is surrendered with the approval of the board, the provisions of any other act of Congress to the contrary notwithstanding."

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee: Page 62, after line 19, add a new section to be known as section 7091, as follows: "Sec. 7091. All vessels which receive the benefits of this act shall be equipped with an efficient and quickly applicable vessel-saving device for quickly and effectively closing accidental openings in the hull of the vessel below the water line so as to stop the inrush of water and prevent the vessel from sinking."

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against the amendment.

Mr. EDMONDS. I make a point of order on the amendment, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas and the gentleman from Pennsylvania make a point of order against the amendment.

Mr. BLANTON. It is not germane.

The CHAIRMAN. What is the gentleman's point of order?

Mr. BLANTON. That it is not germane to the purpose of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Has the gentleman from Pennsylvania any additional point of order?

Mr. EDMONDS. This is not germane to the section. Safety devices and such things are all covered in the present law, so far as it is possible to go.

Mr. BLANTON. If the gentleman wants to discuss it I will withhold.

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee. I do not want to discuss the point of order, but I want to discuss the merits of the amendment.

Mr. BLANTON. I will withhold my point of order.

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I desire to take occasion now to state that I am in full accord with the principle of the American merchant marine. While there are provisions in this bill that do not meet with my entire approbation, my belief in the American merchant marine is such that I shall support the bill notwithstanding. I have the honor to represent a district that is distinctly American, a district that believes in flying the American flag in the commerce of all the seas. [Applause.]

I was actuated in offering this amendment mainly by the fact that I have in mind a life-saving device with which not only the vessels which may be benefited by this act should be equipped, but every vessel that plows the deep should be equipped with this life-saving device, or something similar to it.

As far as the point of order is concerned, I do not care to discuss that.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. My main objection to the proposition is that it is in line with a propaganda—I do not know whether the gentleman has received it or not, but I know that I have on numerous occasions—that is trying to sell a certain patent of a certain individual to the Government for an enormous sum of money. I do not believe in selling patents or unloading on the Government in any such way as this amendment would ultimately imply.

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee. Neither do I; and under this amendment, may it please the committee, any worthy device might be presented and adopted. This amendment is not in the interest of any particular life-saving device, but it is offered in the interest of the seamen and passengers, as well as the cargoes, of all ships flying the American flag.

Mr. BLANTON. I make the point of order now, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee. I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BLANTON. I make the point of order, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman desire to be heard on the point of order?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes. It is not germane to the purposes of the bill. It is not germane to the section preceding it. It is extraneous to any feature of this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. May I ask the gentleman, Does it not prescribe certain qualifications that vessels shall have which receive the benefits of this act?

Mr. BLANTON. I think not. You might go ahead and prescribe that they would have to be built out of a certain kind of material or that they all be oil-burning vessels instead of coal-burning, because oil-burning vessels are the best, and it might provide for other features of it.

The CHAIRMAN. Does not the gentleman think Congress has the right to provide that the ships receiving the benefits of this act shall be oil-burning or otherwise?

Mr. HICKS. Mr. Chairman, I do not think the amendment is necessary, because it is already covered in the La Follette Act. But it seems to me that it is clearly in order, because it deals with the registry of ships. I believe it is absolutely in order because it prescribes what should be on these ships that we are providing for. I contend that it is in order.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. There are numerous provisions stated in the bill upon which the subsidy shall be granted, such as speed, the character of ship, the size, the registration, and other things. I think the amendment of my colleague is clearly in order.

The CHAIRMAN. It seems to the Chair that if the Congress so desired it might prescribe that all the ships receiving aid should be painted red, white, and blue. The Congress would have the right to do this. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee provides that ships receiving aid shall be equipped with a certain kind of life-saving device, which seems to bring this amendment within the rule. Therefore the Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. HARDY of Texas rose.

Mr. YATES. Mr. Chairman, in reply to and in view of—

Mr. HARDY of Texas. I was asking for recognition when the motion was put.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair was ready to recognize the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. I will withhold for the time being.

Mr. YATES. Mr. Chairman, in view of the suggestion that we on the Republican side of the House are listening only to the voice of the Republican bosses, I desire to present for the prayerful consideration of the Democratic side of the House a telegram that I have just received from Hon. Edward F. Dunne, ex-Governor of Illinois, a Democrat. He says he would advise keeping the American flag flying on the high seas. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Here is the telegram:

CHICAGO, ILL., November 29, 1922.

HON. RICHARD YATES,
Member of Congress, Washington, D. C.:

Would advise keeping American flag flying on the seas.

E. F. DUNNE,
Ex-Governor of Illinois (Democrat).

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HARDY].

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I want, like my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. EDMONDS], to be permitted some little latitude in what I say in these five minutes. We are approaching the close of the debate and reaching a final vote, when the committee will rise and go into the House. When the proper time comes I propose to make a motion to recommit this bill for amendment, in accordance with the views of the minority members of the committee, and that motion will be to strike from the bill the provisions of Title II and the provisions of Title IV.

One of those titles, Title II, contains the provisions for tax exemptions for shipowners and owners of ship property. This title has 13 pages filled with special clauses to lessen the burdens of taxation to this special class and place those burdens upon the general multitude. The second title that we propose to eliminate—that is, Title IV—is the section making provision for direct subsidies.

In the progress of this debate there have been some minor amendments adopted which simply do not touch the root of the evil, but are homeopathic sugar-coated pills, to disguise the bill's iniquities and enable the majority to ram it down the throats of this Congress. Under Title IV, the direct-subsidy part of the bill, there are 24 pages marshaling special benefits that are given to certain great special interests. What are those interests? I will tell you what they are: Those benefits go to the Standard Oil Co. Those benefits go to the United States Steel Co. Those benefits go to the United Fruit Co. Those benefits go to the railroads of the United States that shall own the great ship lines across the ocean. I want to tell you that the four beneficiaries under this act which I have named—the Standard Oil, the Steel Trust, the United Fruit Co., and the railroads—will receive nearly all the benefits of this law. Those four beneficiaries in five years from the date of this act will own 90 per cent of the shipping overseas sailing under the United States flag. I challenge the successful contradiction of that statement.

Mr. BROOKS of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARDY of Texas. If I am allowed time.

Mr. BROOKS of Pennsylvania. Would you not rather have Americans have that privilege than foreigners?

Mr. HARDY of Texas. I do not propose to give a hand-out of $100,000,000 to foreigners or Americans. [Applause.] And no man within the sound of my voice ever dreamed of such a thing until these recent days. Why, when you were in power 15 years ago you had the opportunity, and a greater reason then for giving a subsidy than now. Then under the law and existing conditions American ships cost 50 per cent more than foreign ships, and it was argued, with some reason, that the subsidy was necessary to equalize the additional first cost of our ships; but to-day an American owner will buy his ships more cheaply than they can be bought anywhere else on earth by buying them from the Shipping Board; and the great railroad combinations and other great combinations, who run their ships across the Pacific and Atlantic, will own every line running from the United States, and they will buy these ships from the Shipping Board more cheaply than you can buy them anywhere else in the world. There was some excuse for your offering a subsidy when an American ship cost more than foreign ships, but there is none to-day when the American ship is the cheapest ship in the world.

My motion to recommit is designed to test the Members of this Congress and see what ones of them are willing to vote a hundred millions in tax exemptions and direct subsidies out of the pockets of the people and into the pockets of just four great combinations—the railroads owning ships, the Standard Oil, the Steel Trust, and the United Fruit Co. Three of these are the richest single corporations in the world to-day and their ships carry their own products, and the fourth, the railroads, already have a strangle hold on the private industry of the country. [Applause.]

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto be now closed.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wyoming moves that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto be now closed.

The motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. TAYLOR].

The question being taken, the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEPARABILITY.

SEC. 711. If any provision of this act or the application thereof to any person or circumstance is held invalid, the validity of the remainder of the act and of the application thereof to other persons and circumstances shall not be affected thereby.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MOORE of Virginia: Page 63, line 6, add a new section, as follows:

"SEC. 711(a). No provision of this act shall become effective until July 1, 1924."

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I know the House is anxious to reach a final vote, and I will therefore take only a minute or two to discuss this amendment. It is offered in perfect good faith, and is intended to postpone the effective date of the act until the 1st of July, 1924.

Now I venture to state briefly three propositions: First, that this is a comparatively new measure and that there has been no full opportunity either for the House or for the country to consider it. It is not a life and death matter, and to delay the administration of its provisions, even though it should pass, for less than the 30-month period that has been so often talked about here, and for only about 18 months, certainly will not work any great disadvantage or harm.

The second proposition is that to postpone is in the interest of representative government. There has been a good deal of reference to what an existing Congress should or should not do after the election of a new Congress. My own personal view is that it would be much better and much wiser for the old Congress to devote itself to ordinary business and avoid the consideration of controverted business. There is now reported from a Senate committee a proposal to amend the Constitution so as to bring in at once a freshly elected Congress. I do not fancy the idea of tinkering with the Constitution, but I think it would be very well for Congress itself to determine, and have the backing of the public in determining that a Congress that is just about to go out shall confine itself mainly to the appropriation bills and other routine measures, and allow the incoming Congress freshly elected by the people to take up matters that are really in dispute, and particularly matters that have been made more or less issues in the course of the campaign.

The third proposition is stated for the purpose of showing that so far as I am concerned there is no partisanship in what is suggested by the amendment, the purpose of which is to give the newly elected Congress an opportunity, if it sees fit, to deal with this bill, if it is enacted into law, by amendment or by repeal after the 4th of next March, either in extra session or in the regular session beginning the first Monday of December of next year. And in order to show my friend from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL], who stands there ready, I have no doubt, to move the closing of the debate, that there is no taint of partisanship in the amendment, I remind him that the next Congress will not be Democratic. The next Congress will be Republican. It will be of the same politics as the President who urges this measure, and certainly there should be no apprehension, if this Republican Congress can be counted upon to adopt this measure because it is meritorious, that the incoming Congress will undertake to repeal or materially amend it. [Applause.]

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition only to say that when a good thing is to be done the sooner you do it the better.

I move to close debate on this section and all amendments thereto.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wyoming moves that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto do now close.

The motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MOORE].

Mr. FREAR. May the amendment be read?

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment may be again reported.

The amendment was again read.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MOORE].

The question being taken, on a division (demanded by Mr. MOORE of Virginia) there were—ayes 45, noes 175.

Accordingly the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SHORT TITLE.

SEC. 712. This act may be cited as the "merchant marine act, 1922."

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. LANHAM. I desire to offer an amendment.

Mr. MONDELL. I will yield to the gentleman from Texas for the purpose of offering his amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. LANHAM] offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. LANHAM: Page 63, lines 8 and 9, after the word "the," in line 8, strike out "merchant marine act, 1922," and insert "ship subsidy act of 1922."

Mr. LANHAM. This is literally an amendment to strike out the last words. This section represents the final coat of camouflage. The ruling passion of the majority party in this measure, which seems to be an effort to deceive, is proving strong to the last. This section reads:

This act may be cited as the "merchant marine act, 1922."

I recall the substance of a statement made by Mark Twain in his Innocents Abroad. You know, there is a street in Damascus by the name of Straight. As a matter of fact, it is a very winding and crooked street. Mark Twain observed that St. Luke in referring to it says:

The street which is called Straight—

And then the great American humorist adds—

you notice that St. Luke was careful not to commit himself; he did not say the street was straight, but merely that it was called Straight.

It is much the same with reference to this bill. This final section says:

This act may be cited as the "merchant marine act, 1922."

It does not say that it is indeed a merchant marine act, but that it may be cited as such. The Republicans are careful not to commit themselves to the real fact that in essence and in truth this is a ship subsidy bill. [Laughter and applause.] And this amendment is offered in the final hope that a spade may be called a spade. [Applause.]

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment. Mr. Chairman, this is one case where "may" means "shall." This bill shall and will be cited as the merchant marine act of 1922 [applause], and as so cited it will bring joy and comfort and gladness to the hearts of those of the American people who love the flag, who glory in the story of its former triumphs on the high seas, and who pray to have it restored to all the water highways of the earth. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, at the beginning of this debate certain gentlemen objected to specific provisions in this bill. Gentlemen became quite eloquent, quite excited, I may say without exaggeration, because they felt that under it the Standard Oil and the Steel Trust were to become beneficiaries to a large amount. We believe that it is highly important, particularly in the event of war, that oil tankers and the ships of the steel corporations should carry our flag, but realizing that if these classes of vessels were allowed to share in the benefits of the bill the enemies of the legislation could and would create prejudice against it, the bill has been so amended that these two great organizations do not share in its benefits as to the ships they own and which carry their merchandise. Certain gentlemen objected because of that provision in the bill that gave American shippers in American bottoms a limited exemption in the payment of an income tax. That was a provision inserted in the bill wisely, in my opinion, in order that we might insure the ships we hope to place on the seas with full cargoes; but out of consideration to the tender sensibilities of certain gentlemen who claimed they wanted to vote for the bill if we only give them the opportunity to do so by eliminating everything that did not square with their consciences, we struck those provisions out. Then it was claimed that the bill did not give Congress complete power over the expenditures under the bill, and in order that gentlemen might not have that excuse to vote against the bill, provision was made by which Congress shall have control of all expenditures.

We now present the measure for a vote, with every provision stricken from it that by any possibility could meet with reasonable or even unreasonable objection from the standpoint of those who desire to help pass the measure and accomplish its purposes of establishing and maintaining an American merchant marine. I do not understand, Mr. Chairman, how any man can now vote against this measure unless he is determined that so far as he is concerned he will make no effort whatever to solve the great problem placed on the American people by the building of a great merchant fleet during the war, unless he is prepared to say that as for him and his people he neither desires nor expects to have a merchant fleet that shall carry our flag to all ports of the seven seas.

Mr. Chairman, the question is squarely presented to us, Shall Great Britain and Germany and all our rivals in international trade do all the shipping of the world, including ours, or shall America do her part of it? [Applause.] Shall we provide the ships necessary as auxiliaries of the Navy in any and every emergency, or shall we again be placed in the position that we occupied in the beginning of the World War, where we must depend upon the merchantmen of other nations to carry our men and munitions overseas? Unless we are prepared to say that we have no hope of an American merchant marine, that we have no desire for the maintenance or the building up of an American merchant marine, that we are willing for all time to come that the American flag shall be a stranger to the ports and harbors of the high seas, we must support this bill. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this section be now closed.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wyoming moves that all debate on this section be now closed.

The motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill to the House, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order that under the rule adopted November 22, found on the top of page 38, action can not be taken until the hour of 4 o'clock arrives. I call attention to the language, "that the consideration of the bill for amendment shall continue not later than 4 o'clock." [Laughter.] Mr. Chairman, I ask for order, that is not all of it. "Not later than the hour of 4 o'clock postmeridian on November 29, at which hour"—that is, the hour of 4 o'clock postmeridian—"the committee shall rise and report the bill. It says it shall rise and report the bill" at the hour of 4 o'clock postmeridian. I submit to the Chair the point of order that Members of this House had a right to believe that when the rule was passed this vote should not be taken until the hour of 4 o'clock. There may be Members who are away from the Chamber, believing that the rule will be carried out. I submit, Mr. Chairman, that the rule should be carried out and that the committee should not rise and report the bill to the House for vote until 4 o'clock.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not construe the rule as the gentleman from Texas construes it. As the Chair reads the rule, it means that at any time after the reading of the bill under the five-minute rule for amendment it would be in order by a vote of the Committee of the Whole to report the bill back to the House with such amendments as have been agreed to. In case the debate ran until 4 o'clock this afternoon it would be the duty of the Chair at that hour to declare that by the order of the House the committee should rise and report the bill to the House. Construing the rule in this way, and believing it to be the proper construction of the rule, the Chair overrules the point of order and will put the question.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, the rule provides for the automatic rising of the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. There is a doubt about that, as to whether the committee can rise automatically and report the bill without a vote before 4 o'clock. Therefore the Chair will put the question.

The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Massachusetts that the committee do now rise and report the bill back to the House with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. TILSON, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 12817) to amend and supplement the merchant marine act, 1920, and for other purposes, and had directed him to report the same back to the House with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The SPEAKER. Under the rule the previous question is considered as ordered. Is a separate vote demanded upon any amendment?

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask a separate vote upon the Edmonds amendment on page 31 with reference to liquors.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any other amendment? If not, the Chair will put the other amendments in gross. The question is on agreeing to the other amendments.

The other amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment on which a separate vote is demanded by the gentleman from Michigan, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 31, at the end of paragraph (d), insert a new paragraph, as follows:

"(e) Compensation shall not be paid in respect to any vessel for mileage covered upon a voyage if at any time during such voyage liquor for beverage purposes (the sale or transportation of which on land is prohibited by the national prohibition act, or any act in amendment thereof, supplemental thereto, or in substitution thereof) has been transported on the vessel with the knowledge or consent of the owner, charterer, agent, or master of the vessel, or sold on the vessel by or for the account of, or with the knowledge or consent of, the owner, charterer, agent, or master of the vessel."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. STAFFORD) there were—ayes 21, noes 207.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, on that I demand the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin demands the yeas and nays. As many as are in favor of ordering the yeas and nays will rise and stand until counted. [After counting.] Thirteen Members have arisen, not a sufficient number, and the yeas and nays are refused.

So the amendment was rejected.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was read the third time.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I move to recommit the bill with instructions, which motion I send to the Clerk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. HARDY of Texas moves to recommit the bill to the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries with instructions to the committee to report the same back to the House forthwith with the following instructions:

"Strike from the bill all of the provisions of Title II, which said provisions all relate to granting exemptions from taxation not now allowed by law, and strike from the bill all the provisions of Title IV, all of which relate to granting subsidies to shipowners."

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, on that I demand the previous question.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the motion to recommit is not in order.

Mr. BLANTON. I make the point of order that that comes too late, the previous question having been moved.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman states that he was on his feet ready to make the point of order, the Chair will recognize him.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. I was.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, if the reading of the motion to recommit is correct, the motion to recommit is that the committee send it back to the House with "instructions" to the House. Then, there is an additional matter of argument in the motion.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is correct. The motion does say "with instructions to the committee to report the same back to the House forthwith, with the following instructions." Obviously the gentleman from Texas has made an error in what he intended to do.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I ask to modify the motion in accordance with what the Speaker just suggested.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can withdraw his motion and offer another one.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Then I offer the following motion to recommit.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I desire first to be heard.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I do not think the precedent ought to be established, after the previous question has been ordered, that a gentleman may offer a motion to recommit and in that motion add an argument or what is supposed to be an argument in favor of the motion. He may make a motion to recommit, or he may make a motion to recommit with instructions to amend, but he can not be permitted to make an argument after the previous question has been ordered.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I do not think the point of order is well taken. Of course, after the previous question is ordered is the only time that one can offer a motion to recommit under the rules of the House, and so far as there being an argument is concerned, I take issue with the gentleman upon that as a matter of fact. It is true there is descriptive matter in the motion. It gives the subject matter of the title. That is merely for the information of the House, but there is no argument in it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will not rule at this time; but this is the way it strikes the Chair at first blush: It is true that in this case there is what appears to be a description, but it is hard to say what is description and what is argument.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I think we can obviate the objection by removing that part of it. I offer the following motion to recommit, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the gentleman withdraws his previous motion to recommit and offers another, which the Clerk will report.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. HARDY of Texas moves to recommit the bill to the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries, with instructions to the committee to report the same back to the House forthwith with the following amendment:

"Strike from the bill all of the provisions of Title II, and strike from the bill all of the provisions of Title IV."

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the motion to recommit.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. I move the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion to recommit.

LEAVE TO EXTEND REMARKS.

By unanimous consent, leave to extend remarks in the Record was granted—

To Mr. GRIFFIN.

To Mr. SABATH.

To Mr. ROSSDALE. (On veterans' hospitalization and on the merchant marine bill.)

The extensions of remarks referred to are here printed in full as follows:

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Speaker, no man ought to be blamed for consistency, yet so strange is the perversity of human law we frequently put him in jail. In putting forth this ship-subsidy proposal at this time the Republican Party must be complimented; it is running true to form; it is perfectly consistent in the policy which has characterized its recent history of catering to special interests at the expense of the taxpayers. The ship subsidy bill is the culmination of that policy; it is the consummation of their economic program; it is the natural sequel of the enactment into law of a series of economic fallacies.

In order to understand and place this legislation in its true historic perspective we must go back to the great World War. The country incurred debts of great magnitude, unlike anything before in its history. The people had contributed their sons to the battle fields and gave up cheerfully of their substance in order to bring victory to our cause. While our boys were fighting in France their families at home were robbed by profiteers and immense fortunes were made out of the necessities of the Nation. The immense profits which the war accorded to the few were not begrudged at the time, because they were looked upon as among the inevitable incidents of war times. But there was a feeling that the great trusts which were profiting so handsomely by the war should contribute a part of their excess profits toward meeting the obligations of the Government arising out of the war, and that sentiment was crystallized into the act providing for the payment of a tax on excess profits. That act yielded the Government an immense revenue, but the greed and avarice of great wealth stirred up a propaganda to secure the repeal of the law which made them disgorge their unconscionable profits. This propaganda fell upon willing ears in the Congress that was elected two years ago, and their first act of important legislation was to repeal the excess-profits tax.

The effect of this repeal was almost instantly reflected in our Treasury receipts. In the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921, the revenue income of the Government was $4,600,000,000. In the fiscal year ending June 30, 1922, our revenue receipts dropped to $3,200,000,000, a loss of $1,400,000,000 in revenue, as a result of Republican generosity to the trusts and moneyed interests of the Nation. This was the first error in economic policy.

The next step in the program was in the nature of an effort to recoup the national revenue losses by a new tariff bill—a bill which was to be neither flesh nor fowl—a weird economic Frankenstein which was to be designed to raise revenue and at the same time to protect American industry. Of course the veriest tyro in economic philosophy could detect the fallacy in such a program. It is not necessary to charge its authors with ignorance of economic law. They could not help but know that if they built a tariff wall around the Nation high enough to protect American industry to the extent demanded by its beneficiaries the revenue resulting from such customs duties would be almost negligible. It is therefore more creditable to their learning and judgment to say that they knew very well what they were about, and that their design was more to provide a monopoly for the profiteers than to furnish a revenue to our depleted coffers. The bill which they enacted into law, known as the Fordney tariff, augmented duties upon the necessities of life to such an extent that the profiteers are assured of being able to gouge the American people out of $6,000,000,000 per year. On the other side of the ledger it will yield our Government not to exceed $500,000,000 per year. In other words, for every dollar going into the national coffers through the customhouses of the land the profiteers will be able to put $12 in their own pockets.

As fully and completely as the Fordney Tariff Act seemed to protect all kinds of American industry, there was one gap in the profiteers' armament left unprovided for, namely, the shipping industry. In fact, the shipping industry was actually hurt. It has been a sore spot to the Republican statesmanship for years that they have never been able to round out their economic policy. They have been troubled with remorse. They know that their protective tariffs have ruined any merchant marine we ever had and eliminated any prospect of building one up; therefore, I repeat, that they are perfectly consistent in going the full length in their policy in protecting ships as they have protected shops. Of course, it is a matter of very little concern to the plutocrats and their friends how great may be the burden they impose upon the backs of the taxpayers. Their slogan is, "First shops, now ships"; alas, poor shoppers!

It is amusing to hear references made to the pledges in the Republican platform of 1920. I thought that was a matter of ancient history. It has been so little lived up to, except in respect to the promises made to the profiteers, that I did not expect any Republican to be bold enough to refer to it. Was the subsidy declaration in the platform of 1920 any more solemn or binding than the pledge for the soldiers' bonus? That was disregarded very lightly, and I expect that the shipping pledge would not have given much concern if it were not for the big financial interests at stake. But why worry about the platform of 1920? The people have spoken again in 1922, and 170 of the present Congress bear the marks of their wrath.

The shoppers of the Nation have had an opportunity to observe the blessings of Republican policies. There is not a workingman in the land who does not behold on all sides of him and suffer in his pockets the results of Republican economic fallacies. With clothing and foodstuffs, coal, fuel, and rent augmented beyond endurance, he is in no temper to behold with equanimity the presentation of further largesses to the profiteers.

It is said that it was designed to pass the ship subsidy bill as a Thanksgiving gift to the shipping and financial interests. That was done in the House according to program, but it is destined to meet with a snag in the Senate. It reminds me of the story of the clever white man and innocent red man who went hunting. As a result of their day's work they brought to camp a lean buzzard and a fat turkey. The white man said to the Indian, "Will you take the buzzard and I take the turkey, or will I take the turkey and you take the buzzard?" The American shopper—in other words, the consumer—is not in any humor at the present time to take a buzzard in the nature of a ship subsidy to round out Republican policies.

There has been a good deal of talk in this debate about putting the American flag back upon the seas. Who drove it off the seas? If we solve that riddle we will go far toward settling the question as to how it can be again restored to its pristine supremacy. If we trace back the history of our merchant marine we will find that it began to wane the moment this country, under misguided statesmanship, undertook to build up prohibitive tariffs. We made it impossible through these foolish laws either to build ships or to operate them.

The men who are going to profit by this bill can wave the American flag in vain. It is a part of our history that whenever any special interest has knocked at the door of Congress for special legislation it has invariably disguised its purpose by flaunting the American flag; so that now such tactics excite suspicion. We rightly suspect the man who unfurls the American flag to promote his own interest in time of peace. He may get away with it in war times, but in times of peace I would reverse General Dix's war mandate and say, "Any man who unfurls the American flag shoot him on the spot." The American flag should be the inspiration of men marching to battle, and not the camouflage of profiteers making a raid on the United States Treasury.

The United States Chamber of Commerce appointed a committee of 15 to study the ship-subsidy question. Eight out of the 15 are in the shipping business, and the others are more or less tied up with financial interests. Of course, they reported in favor of a ship subsidy, and the same ratio will be observed in all of the boards of trade and transportation which have bombarded Members of Congress with resolutions upon the subject. The question for us to consider is how the American consumer feels, and the best evidence of that is furnished by the American Federation of Labor and the various brotherhoods of workmen throughout the land. They all agree in characterizing the pending subsidy bill as "a most vicious effort to enrich big financial interests at the expense of the farmers, the wage earners, and small business men of the Nation."

MR. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, there is nothing that I can say or could have said on the pending bill which would be more effective and would express the reasons and objections to the bill as forcibly and clearly than which are contained in a letter I have received from the great student of economic conditions, the champion not only of the laboring man of this Nation but one who has at all times the interest of America at heart, Hon. Samuel Gompers, president of the American Federation of Labor, which I herewith insert as a part of my remarks:

AMERICAN FEDERATION OF LABOR,
Washington, D. C., November 28, 1922.

DEAR MR. SABATH: Because the ship subsidy bill is to come before you on Wednesday for a vote I take the liberty of communicating with you at this time in order to lay before you a point of view which will, I am sure, impress you as worthy of consideration.

I am convinced that the country in the recent election intended to convey among other things its hostility toward the proposed subsidy. However, there are others who either do not so interpret the country's decision or who do not see fit to follow the country's decision.

It is unlikely that anyone has given the subsidy bill more careful study than has the American Federation of Labor. We have tried to find if by any possibility there was anything constructive and helpful in the measure. We are bound as the result of study to condemn the measure without reservation.

If study of the bill itself has failed to convince labor of its soundness, the debate upon it thus far has been equally without result. Little that has been said in official circles indicates any real understanding of the subject.

When former subsidy bills were before Congress the whole cry was ships, ships, ships, give us ships and we will have a merchant marine. Now we have the ships, and the one great question is, What are we going to do with them? We can not compete, so it is stated, and as things really are it is largely true.

Within the last two years the shipowners and the Shipping Board have done their utmost to destroy what skill and efficiency exist on American vessels at sea. That they are doing this consciously is not conceivable. They are doing it, however, and evidently because they do not understand that the human element in shipping, as in all other competition, is the determining factor. While we are driving all the skilled men from the sea England is drawing to herself the skilled men by her policy. This last spring England adopted the policy of gradually getting rid of inefficient men. She is doing it by a combination between the seamen themselves through their organization, the shipowners through their organization, and the board of trade. The officers on the vessels provisionally select the men, who then go to the office of the union to be further passed upon under a regulation known as port consultant regulation No. 5. Under this system and the wages paid she is drawing to herself the efficient men and pushing the inefficient men over to us.

When the war ended Germany had no ships. She had shipowners who knew commercial geography, and therefore were to have their ships if possible at a given time. She had officers and seamen who could handle ships at sea and in harbor and keep those ships out of the repair yards. She is coming back into ocean carrying with the speed of a race horse. We have the ships, but our shipowners seem to have no understanding of the world's freight market or commercial geography nor any appreciation of the skill and efficiency needed on board of vessels, and we are spending money stupidly if not criminally. Why is it that business men who ordinarily have common sense seem to be incapable of realizing that in the competitive business success is determined by the human element to the extent of at least 75 per cent, while something less than 25 per cent is dependent upon the material element?

The subsidy bill now before you will not bring men and competence into the merchant marine. It will bring enormous sums of money into the pockets of a group of subsidized shipping financiers, and this group will constantly grow smaller under the monopoly-creating provisions of the bill.

Labor's position on the question of subsidy remains without change. The most strenuous efforts have been made to bring about a change in this position. In earlier years shipowners resorted to attempts at bribery, these being matters of official court record. I know of no such crude efforts in connection with the present bill, but in abundant measure friends of the bill have used subtler methods. Our position on this bill, however, is based on a study of the bill itself. It is without doubt one of the most brazen Treasury-looting schemes ever devised.

And scoundrelly measures, like scoundrelly men, take refuge in patriotism when no other offers. The bill is urged on grounds of patriotism. It is difficult to think of anything more unfitting.

This bill will not give America a merchant marine, though it may give us a bankers' marine. Labor joins with all others who want a well-manned adequate merchant marine. But it denounces this bill as a fraud, a robbery, and wholly indefensible.

Let it not be forgotten, either, that once enacted the bill must remain in force for 20 years. Contracts made for that length of time will tie the hands of future Congresses.

I am laying these views before you in behalf of the executive council of the American Federation of Labor and in conformity with the findings on the subject as approved by the last convention of the American Federation of Labor.

Sincerely hoping that the above may receive your early and favorable support, I am,

Very truly yours,

SAM'L GOMPERS,

President American Federation of Labor.

Hon. ADOLPH J. SABATH,
House Office Building, Washington, D. C.

Mr. ROSSDALE. Mr. Speaker, the merchant marine, or, as it is popularly termed, the "ship subsidy bill," is intended as a practical measure to keep America's flag upon the seas. It is based upon a system that has been long in practice by all the great maritime nations. It is fundamentally a sound business plan to enable our merchant shipping to compete with its foreign rivals.

In all likelihood this or any plan of ship subsidy or Government aid for ships is the least understood and most misrepresented of all great public questions. Whenever in the history of our country a subsidy of any kind for any particular purpose was at issue, it was always attacked as in the interest of a part of the people as against the interests of all of the people.

It is perhaps unfortunate in a sense that this merchant marine measure is called a "subsidy," since it provides its enemies with a subtle weapon of attack. To the unthinking and the shortsighted a subsidy always conjures up imaginative thoughts of the Government giving away something to somebody in which all will not share except in the payment of the cost thereof.

The principle of a subsidy is not new. It has been practiced throughout our history. It began with favored land grants to encourage settlements in early colonial days. At a later period we assisted private railroad construction across the then almost limitless expanse of prairie and forest by extensive grants of money and land. The area of lands granted in the form of subsidies to aid railroad construction in the United States is said to be equal to that of the thirteen original States and is greater than the area of Germany and Italy combined, or of France, Belgium, and Great Britain.

The previous Sixty-sixth Congress re-created the "War Finance Corporation." Its functioning in peace times is a subsidy to American farmers. This Congress enacted tariff legislation, which is a form of subsidy to American producers. The immense Federal appropriations for good roads are subsidies to the granger communities, some of whose representatives are conspicuously ranged in opposition to this bill.

Our second-class postage rate is also a form of subsidy. If we examine its cost, we find it is the biggest subsidy of them all. Publishing newspapers and periodicals is a business, yet newspapers and periodicals are educational and a public necessity; hence we subsidize them to the extent of carrying them in the mails at a heavy loss. Few, if any, however, will dispute the wisdom of the Government giving the press this preferential postage rate aid.

How often have those who now loudly decry against a ship subsidy argued and fought for Government aid for various other projects. Not every subsidy is generally known by its title. However, to me a subsidy by any other name is no less a subsidy. I have no apprehension on the score of Government aid in private endeavor when benefiting the public in general.

This much-debated ship subsidy is not an innovation. Long ago the United States built up a considerable ocean passenger and carrying trade by subsidies. If the darkening shadows of the threatened Civil War had not clouded and obscured the vision of the Government in the late fifties, our ship-subsidy policy would not have been abandoned, and perhaps America, and not Great Britain, would since have had the commercial mastery of the seas.

It is conceded even by the opposition that an American merchant marine is desirable. There are few who will dispute that American ships, owned by Americans, manned with American crews, riding the waves, and carrying our commerce, are of benefit to all of our people.

The opposition of our Democratic friends on the other side of this Chamber is the usual opposition of a minority who oppose legislation presented by the majority. Looking backward for a brief span of years, from 1914 to 1920, this Democratic opposition to a merchant marine now appears ludicrous. Why, the Shipping Board, with its iniquitous Government ownership and operation of ships, was wholly a Democratic Party creation. Three billions of good American dollars was sunk in that huge fleet that now lies rusting and rotting for want of an intelligent, practical subsidy operation plan.

Democratic opposition to a merchant marine now is purely political. It is pandering to the prejudices that exist in many districts far removed from salt water. This inland reaction against a merchant marine is merely temporary. It can only be explained upon the ground of a mistaken belief at present existing in the interior agricultural sections that this is a seacoast proposition which only indirectly affects them.

It would be useless to deny that it will confer great benefits upon our seacoast cities. Perhaps it will benefit them to a larger extent than it will the granger country in the South and West; but whatever directly benefits a part of our country must indirectly benefit all the rest, whether along the seacoast or in the interior.

It may be that there are those in the tobacco, cotton, corn, or wheat growing districts who do not look with favor upon this legislation upon the theory that shipping is of remote concern to them. To those I would say the benefits of keeping the Stars and Stripes upon the seas accrue to the entire Nation and not, as is intimated, only to shipping interests along the seacoast. Is there a farmer, grower, stockman, trader, or merchant in any of those districts who, pressed for a reply, would not say he preferred to have his products shipped in American bottoms? Of course he would prefer it. Let us give them the opportunity. Under the operation of this proposed act it will annually cost about thirty or thirty-five million dollars for a ship subsidy, or about 30 cents per capita per annum for every man, woman, and child in the United States. What American would not give 30 cents each year to keep our flag afloat?

This bill is not to create a new merchant marine. We already have one. It is a war-time legacy from the Wilson administration. It is to utilize the fleet of 1,442 steel vessels, totaling 7,000,000 tons, that we already have, most of which is idly riding at anchor in our harbors.

It is intended to salvage and place in operation the larger portion of this fleet, which was created in that stupendous riot of war-time extravagance, that staggering spending orgy of billions of dollars.

The present Shipping Board reduced its annual deficit to about $50,000,000. This outlay represents the most economical Government operation possible. It has about 350 vessels in actual operation. The balance of the fleet lies idle, slowly deteriorating. Already many of these ships have become unseaworthy and are only fit for the junk man to dismantle. Unless the others are soon placed in operation they, too, will have to be scrapped.

It is patent to all who have studied the subject that Government operation can not successfully compete with private operation of our foreign shipping rivals, who enjoy the favor of subsidies from their governments. If we are to salvage the balance of the fleet now idle, private operation must supplant the present system. It can only be done by subsidy, which will cost even less than Government operation does at present.

If the plan offered in this bill is not a good solution of our shipping difficulties, what substitute plan is offered by the opposition in its stead? I have closely followed the criticism brought out in the debate and fail to perceive any substitute presented to solve the problem.

It is admitted that there is no foreign purchasers' market for the ships at even a fraction of its present replacement value. A continuation of the present costly Government operation is not feasible. In the absence of any other method, perhaps taking the ships to sea and sinking them would be cheaper in the long run, but such cowardly action would clearly be indefensible and is not to be thought of.

I was raised in the great throbbing seaport of New York, and lived there all my life. I have had abundant opportunity to observe and study merchant shipping. The numerous advantages of a merchant marine are perhaps better understood by those who are closest to its operations.

As a boy I spent much spare time along the water front. I used to play about the wharves and piers where the big ships docked. I recall the strange looking sailormen of the varied ship crews. They were almost all foreign vessels that came to our port then. On those rare occasions when a ship came in flying our flag the youngsters on shore would shout with glee to see the stars and stripes at the masthead. Often in boyish wonder we queried why there were so few American ships.

In later years I learned the reasons why American ships were seldom seen in those days, and I am glad the time is now happily gone by, and may it never be again that the merchandise we import will come to our ports mostly in foreign vessels while the products of our farms, fields, and factories are exported in the same foreign bottoms.

Our course is clear, we must either decide to continue the present costly Shipping Board Government operation that can only operate a small part of our fleet or else pass this subsidy bill that will send the greater portion of these modern argosies we possess sailing the seas from our ports to and from every port everywhere on the habitable globe.

THE POWERS AND DUTIES OF A FEDERAL GRAND JURY.

Mr. WOODRUFF. Mr. Speaker, one of the most powerful agencies to reach and combat crime in high places is the Federal grand jury, and when the law is falling down in high places the average citizen should be educated in the civic duties which he or she may be called upon to perform.

At the request of Capt. H. L. Scaife, counsel for the Woman's Clean Government Organization, which is doing a great work in this country in the cause of civic righteousness, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the Record the instructions to the grand jury delivered by Judge John M. Killits, of the United States district court at Toledo, Ohio, in which the powers and duties of the grand jury are set forth in a clear and able manner:

INSTRUCTIONS TO GRAND JURY, APRIL 25, 1921.

(By Judge John M. Killits, United States District Court, Toledo, Ohio.)

It seems necessary to formally and thoroughly charge the present grand jury, and it is greatly to be desired, first, that your body should understand its place as part of the machinery of the court. You are organized under the common law, with all the characteristics and functions which pertain to such an organization.

GRAND JURY AN INDEPENDENT BODY.

When once empaneled, you have an independent, if a related, function in the administration of the law. It is the independence of the grand jury of any control when acting lawfully that should be emphasized in your understanding. That is the most effective characteristic justifying and making practical the grand-jury system.

Your body is complete within itself. Your duties are to inquire into the social conditions of this division of 21 counties and to advise by bill of indictment or otherwise respecting the observance therein of the laws of the United States. You may inquire into any transaction which has transpired within the past three years and which can be reported to the court by bill before that period has expired. In the exercise of your duties you have no control over you except the law and the facts.

COURT POWERLESS TO DIRECT.

The court has no power to direct you to do anything or to omit to do anything, so long as you are acting properly within your inquisitorial functions. It is impossible for the court to say that you shall or that you shall not direct the prosecution of any person. All we can say is that if the law as you understand it and the facts which come to your attention suggest to your judgment a probability that a Federal crime has been committed in any instance, and that the facts suggest further the personality of the probable offender, you should present a bill of indictment; but that if the conditions of law and fact do not so satisfy your judgment, you should not return a bill of indictment. The court may control your judgment of the law, and you should look to the court alone as your conclusive guide as to what the law is pertaining to any particular case, but the court has no power to influence your judgment of fact.

DISTRICT ATTORNEY MAY NOT COMMAND.

What has been said respecting the court's lack of power to interfere with your work applies with equal force to the office of the district attorney. He and his assistants have in no sense any direction over you. You are in no particular subject to their instruction. They are your servants, to assist you, to be of use to you, but no one of them is even indispensable. You will make use of them, consider their advice as to the law and their suggestion as to the probative force of the facts, but you should thoroughly understand that their capacity is that of servants to the grand jury and that you, and neither the court nor any one from any Government office, are the sole judges of the facts. It is entirely competent for you to conduct your investigations in the absence of any representative of the district attorney's office.

GRAND JURY SOLE AUTHORITY.

I hope that there will be no misunderstanding respecting any of the foregoing. There is no authority anywhere to say who shall or who shall not be prosecuted for an offense against the United States, not the court, not the Attorney General, not the district attorney or any one of his assistants—no authority except for the time being this grand jury. The Attorney General for the President, the district attorney, the court, may advise—none may order.

GRAND JURY MAY ORDER SUBPENAS.

As a matter of convenience, you will doubtless depend upon the district attorney or one of his assistants for the summoning of witnesses before you and for the range of inquiry respecting any particular matter, but you are advised, with the trust that you will heed the advice, that this is a matter of convenience only and not of obligations upon this grand jury. It is competent, and possibly it may, at times, become important, for you to direct your foreman by vote or otherwise to summon witnesses whose names may occur to the body or any individual member of it, and the foreman is authorized by law to execute the will of the grand jury in that behalf, by filing with the clerk a precept for the subpoenaing of witnesses, whether such a course meets with the approval of the district attorney, the Attorney General, or even of the court. In such cases it is the duty of the clerk and the marshal to issue and cause to be served such subpoenas. You have the power of your own motion to command the presence before you as a witness of any person anywhere within the territorial limits of the United States. A subpoena directed by you runs beyond the limits of this district. No power but your own good judgment controls you here. Only a manifest abuse of discretion by you may go before even the court.

HOW CASES APPEAR—TRANSCRIPTS.

Cases may come to this grand jury in four ways. Each is of equal dignity. And once a case comes to the grand jury in any of these ways, it should receive the same sort of consideration. First, a case may come formally through the fact that some person has been bound over to the grand jury through the action of a court commissioner. Such a case is called a transcript case. It is necessary that formal action thereon be taken by the grand jury and formal report made to the court upon every transcript case because it is already on the court's docket. On the occasion of the final report of the grand jury, there should be presented to the court a statement in writing which gives the title of every transcript case which has been presented to the grand jury, as to which it was the formal judgment of the grand jury that no bill should be returned. This report should not be made until the grand jury is ready for discharge, because it is within the power of the grand jury at any time during its session to reconsider any case in which action has hitherto been had, if unreported. No action of the grand jury ignoring a transcript case is final to the release of the transcript defendant's bond until the day of the final discharge of the grand jury.

DISTRICT ATTORNEY'S REPORT.

A second method of bringing cases to the grand jury is through verbal representations of the district attorney or his assistants. It is the district attorney's duty to inform the grand jury respecting any probable violation of law which has come to his attention and to assist the grand jury in examining into the matter. In cases of this character, if no bill is voted, there is no necessity and it is inexpedient to make a formal report thereof to the court.

GRAND JURY'S INITIATIVE.

A third manner in which cases may properly come before the grand jury is through the interest in any matter which may appeal to any member of the grand jury. Should any one of your body receive significant information concerning a probable violation of law, it is his duty to take into his confidence his fellow jurors, and it is your privilege, and may in some instances be your duty, to proceed with a thorough examination into the matter without relation to the wishes of any other officer of the Government or of the court. In this respect you have an independent initiative, and in the exercise of this function lies the greatest usefulness often of a grand jury as the conservator of law and order. It is a power which should be carefully and discreetly exercised but which, when once entered upon, should be proceeded with fearlessly, impartially, and firmly. Respecting its exercise, your foreman is subject to the majority will of the grand jury, and the breadth and scope of your investigations are limited only by the law itself. The court can do nothing more than simply to hold you to observe the law. The court commends to your most earnest consideration this independent power enjoyed by you.

COURT'S SUGGESTIONS.

A fourth way in which matters may come to the grand jury's attention is through the recommendation of the court itself. We propose further in this charge to direct your attention to some matters which seem to the court to be of sufficient importance to merit your consideration. You will observe, however, that once the court has suggested these matters to you, the court's function in that behalf ends. We have no power to enter into your deliberations and to control your conclusions. You will please observe also that in reporting these matters to you, the court is not at all offering an opinion whether there is a probable cause to find an indictment. We do not even attempt to advise you what the facts are. They are for you to discover in a more legitimate way. In venturing an instruction to you respecting any one of these matters, we apply the law to a purely supposititious state of facts, and in no way must the court be understood as advising that facts exist in any case sufficient to demand of you a bill of indictment.

TWELVE GRAND JURORS MAY ORDER BILL.

No bill of indictment can be returned unless it is ascertained, by any definite way satisfactory to the grand jury, that at least 12 of its members so decide, in which case it is the duty of the foreman to sign, and of the district attorney to prepare and indorse, a bill of indictment, no matter what may be their individual views respecting the providence of such action.

EVIDENCE BEYOND REASONABLE DOUBT NOT REQUIRED.

You will please note in this particular that the law does not require that even 12 members of the grand jury be convinced of the truth of the charge beyond a reasonable doubt. Often justice miscarries because a grand jury misunderstands this and demands evidence beyond a reasonable doubt when a prima facie case or proof of probability only is necessary. Many prima facie cases made by the Government on trial before a petit jury become convictions beyond a reasonable doubt when the defense is heard. The law is that if it be the judgment of the grand jury, or 12 members thereof, that the facts suggest a preponderating probability of the truth of the charge, a bill should be returned. This is the question, then, which a grand juror should ask himself: Does the evidence disclose that the crime in question has probably been committed by the person under consideration? If that is his judgment, he should vote for a bill. He should not insist on proof convincing his mind beyond a reasonable doubt. Involved in this proposition is the fact that the grand jury is not to take upon itself the burden of determining any case absolutely on its merits. It must not permit itself to usurp the functions of the court and petit jury. It must remember that it is a preliminary body altogether, to protect the individual against an improvident prosecution for a serious offense, and to secure to the public an impartial and dispassionate investigation into the observance of the law.

SHOULD NOT HEAR DEFENSE.

You ought not, therefore, to demand or even permit the presence of a defendant. It is bad practice and against settled Federal authority to give one whose case is under investigation an opportunity to be heard in person or by his witnesses. So to do is to go beyond your functions, and respecting a great many offenses the practice is especially pernicious. The merits of a case should be tried in the open, upon testimony under public scrutiny and under the trained guidance of the court. Only in this way can testimony be confined to its legitimate channels. Again, the merits of the case should be determined by a jury which, respecting that particular case and its particular facts shown in testimony, has the benefit of the court's explanation of so much of the law as applies to the exact issue. None of these safeguards is practicable to be had in the grand jury room, and this court will not permit a case to be so finally disposed of by the grand jury if it is aware of the fact. Just as the defendant under the Constitution is entitled to have the case against him presented in his presence and in the open, so the Government is entitled to have the defense made in the open and under the scrutiny of the only agency, namely, the court, which has the power to keep that defense within its legitimate channels.

SCOPE OF TESTIMONY.

The jury should be satisfied that evidence has been presented to it touching every essential question, consideration of which goes to make up a case. But, involved in the proposition that you are not called upon to go further in your judgment than to see in the facts a strong probability of the truth of the charge is the fact that you are not required to ask conclusive or even all of the proof upon any particular subject. It is often advisable, especially in cases of very great importance, that the district attorney be not compelled to spread his whole case before the grand jury. Yet enough of it, covering every essential element of the charge, should be presented upon sworn testimony to enlighten the jurors' judgment as to what the probabilities are.

JURY CONTROLS ITS MOVEMENTS.

As you go from this charge an independent branch of the court until your work is completed, it follows that you sit and rise upon your own initiative. The court may summon you from time to time, but once summoned, only you have the right to determine when you will recess or how long your sessions shall be. The court advises you to be as expeditious in the transaction of your work as may be practicable, to be as economical of public money as you fairly can, but at the same time do not let considerations of expense interfere with a thorough inquest into conditions.

NO STATE OFFENSES INVOLVED.

This court administers the laws of Congress only. Many alleged crimes are reported to Federal officers which can not be prosecuted except in the State courts. We have nothing to do with them. A general understanding of this fact would save the court much inconvenience and misunderstanding on part of the public.

THE NATIONAL PROHIBITION ACT.

Just now the national prohibition act is most in the public mind. Because of that fact diligence in its enforcement is very necessary, or else respect for law generally will greatly lose ground. This court conceives the enforcement of this act to be a supreme test of the question whether this is a law-abiding democracy or not. Therefore, we have no hesitation in asking this grand jury to join the court in taking up the gauntlet and in accepting the challenge that this act can not be enforced.

LAW EASILY ENFORCEABLE.

Our opinion, after an active experience of more than a year, is that the act can easily be enforced and the dignity of the law can be upheld, if there exists an intention on the part of the officers of the law to do their plain duty. It is our judgment that the so-called public sentiment, against which the operation of the law is said to contend, is not the sentiment of any considerable portion of the people of this community; that those who lack sympathy with the enforcement of the law and the law's purpose, and who proclaim a hostile public sentiment regarding it, are in a hopeless minority, prominent because of the noise they make, and more numerous in sound than in fact. It seems very clear that if there were a hostile public sentiment here toward this law, the fact would be reflected in our juries, which are drawn from the average of respectable citizenship. Our observation, here and at other places of holding court in this district, is that, given a fair presentation of the facts, our juries treat cases under this law upon their merits as carefully and dispassionately and vote for verdicts of guilty as readily as in cases of infractions of other laws. In fact, the only difficulty encountered in the enforcement of this statute is that which arises from cupidity of many persons, coupled with a further fact that the illicit liquor business peculiarly involves surreptitious and somewhat easily concealed transactions. It is the same difficulty in about the same degree which obtains in the detection and prosecution of narcotic crimes. One who engages in it is indeed largely protected by a lazy belief that the law's enforcement is not supported by public sentiment. It is this court's experience that the enforcement of any law is already half done when it is generally understood among the people that those who have an official duty to enforce it propose to perform that duty unflinchingly.

PUBLIC HEALTH INVOLVED IN ENFORCEMENT.

There is now a great public concern in the rigid enforcement of this law because of the effect of illicit liquor dispensation upon the public health. During the term which has just closed, this court has had in the neighborhood of 100 cases of sales in which were produced from each case exhibits of the commodity which passed over the bars of so-called soft drink places in Toledo as whisky. In but one instance out of this many cases has genuine whisky been obtained. In each of all the others, the liquid was imitation whiskey manufactured from alcohol with a coloring matter, or newly made with all the extremely poisonous ingredients and specially injurious characteristics which it is understood that the process of aging whisky removes. The consumption of this stuff is extremely deleterious to the public health, and to suppress this traffic should be the determination of the public and its officers. The Government has also discovered that considerable business has sprung up in the trafficking in so-called whisky bearing forged labels and Government stamps which are made to represent the liquid to be of well-known brands, while in fact it is of the vilest character. These considerations emphasize the demand that the law be enforced with determination.

I am glad to say that this grand jury will not have before it so large a proportion of small cases as hitherto have come up for indictment. It has been found possible to present by information to the court all liquor cases which involve a penalty of not more than one year's imprisonment or a fine, thus saving much expense to the Government and resulting in more expeditious disposition of offenses. This will leave the grand jury time to do what is most important in the enforcement of any law, namely, to give attention to the larger offenses.

LARGE OFFENDERS SHOULD BE PROSECUTED.

The conviction of one highly placed and influential offender against any law is much more to be desired and brings about a better respect for the law itself than a gathering in of many less prominent and less extensive violators. This court has been crowded with many small cases; the privilege has come but a few times to convict notorious and much talked of offenders. It is very probable that there are some persons of political, social, and perhaps other high influence in this community who are habitually violating these laws with large profit to themselves. It is sincerely hoped that this grand jury will use to the limit its very great power to command the resources of the Government at its disposal to bring such persons to the bar of this court. Any law soon loses respect and efficiency if large offenders are allowed to escape and less influential and less pronounced violators prosecuted, and when once there becomes a settled public conviction that any criminal act fails in enforcement crime at large is greatly encouraged.

In this connection, but not by way of setting a limit to your investigations, we suggest subjects for initial action from reports of alleged offenses which have informally come to the attention of the court.

WHAT IS IMPROPER USE OF THE MAILS.

Section 215, Criminal Code, just mentioned, is in substance to the effect that whoever, having devised a scheme to defraud, uses or causes to be used the mails of the United States in any way to assist in the consummation of that fraud, is guilty of an offense against the United States. Two ultimate questions of fact are necessary to be found, as probably present in such a case, before the grand jury should return a bill of indictment. The first is a scheme to defraud. This may be of any nature which is fraudulent in its purpose. You will please understand, however, that the fraud which must be present is not necessarily what is known as fraud in law; that is, some conduct which is in violation of some specific statute or law. If the enterprise alleged to be fraudulent is one which shocks the sense of right and wrong because seen to be with purpose to defraud the object, it is sufficiently within the reprobation of this statute whether it be specifically defined as illegal or not. The alleged fraudulent purpose need not have been one which had even a promise of success; it may have been foolish in its conception, or in plans for its execution and yet be within the law. You are instructed further that the fraudulent purpose need not be shown to have been one directed definitely against any specific person, nor one shown in the evidence to be even specifically and definitely devised. It is sufficient for the purposes of this statute if the fraudulent purpose, alleged to be entertained by the subject under consideration, is general in its nature and held against any indefinite person who may possibly come within its operation; then the law in question applies. Going now to the other element of the crime, the use of the mails, you are instructed that the use of the mails is not necessarily such use as that which would be in itself objectionable to the Government. The letter or other attempt to use the mails may be, standing by itself, purely unobjectionable, carrying with it and in its terms no suggestion of fraudulent or improper purpose, yet if it is seen in the testimony to be so related to the fraudulent purpose that it appears to have been made with an intention to effect the fraudulent purpose in any degree, such use is within the prohibition of the statute. You will also further observe in this connection that it is not the effective and successful use of the mails which only is reprehended by the statute. If the use of the mails itself comes to nothing, does nothing to promote the fraudulent scheme, or if merely an attempt to use the mails has been made, or if the fraudulent scheme itself fails, if either or both of the failures exist, nevertheless the transaction is within the law, provided the evidence tends to show a probability of the presence of both of these elements, in proper relation to each other, even with their feeble results. It is not the success or good sense of the alleged fraudulent scheme or the effectiveness of the use of the mails which counts. It is the presence of the fraudulent scheme and an attempted use of the mails to help such a scheme which combined make up the offense to which the statute attaches.

THE LAW OF CONSPIRACY.

This grand jury will have further consideration of the robbery committed in February at the city post office, and I am informed that you will have before you a charge of conspiracy in that connection.

For this reason, and because of previous suggestions by the court, you should understand how to apply the law of conspiracy. The Federal statute provides that when two or more persons agree to violate a law of the United States and, while that agreement is in existence, to further the same act is done by one of the conspirators, an offense against the United States has been committed. Simply entering into an unlawful agreement is not an offense, but the agreement with some step taken to work it out constitutes the offense. The necessary step is called the overt act. It may be but a slight matter and not be anything that succeeds in helping the conspiracy, but if it is something which is of a tendency to help the conspiracy, the case is complete. It is very desirable, respecting the matters directed to your attention in this charge, that you should note that it is not necessary, to give this court jurisdiction, that a conspiracy should be shown to have been entered upon within this district. If an agreement to violate the law has been formed beyond the territorial jurisdiction of this court, yet something, however ineffective, has been done within the district by one or more of the conspirators to help that agreement, the case can be prosecuted here and you can command the evidence from witnesses beyond the confines of the district. The existence of a conspiracy is provable by evidence showing a concert of action, a relation between the suspected purpose and transactions by one or more of the parties, which, compared with all the circumstances in the case, show that the parties moved with a common end in view. It follows that the so-called overt act, necessary to be established in order to make the offense complete, and to give the court jurisdiction, may not only serve for that purpose but may be one of the circumstances taken as tending to prove the existence of the conspiracy itself.

In any case in which a law of the United States has been violated by two or more persons acting in concert, the facts which establish violation itself, if they show action in concert by the principals, may be resorted to for a charge of conspiracy to violate the law, and all persons who consciously and willfully act to aid and abet or assist the principal actors in the transaction, either before or after the event, but still while something is to be done to bring the enterprise to an end, may be joined with the principal actors as co-conspirators, for anyone who consciously associates himself with the conspirators at any stage of the transaction, before it is concluded, even though he may not be in at the beginning nor stay to the finish, may be included in the charge. When once it is clear that a concert of action indicating mutual agreement is established, the act of every co-conspirator, even in the absence of his fellows, which tends to promote the object of the conspiracy, becomes the act of every other co-conspirator chargeable against him.

OTHER CRIMES SHOWN IN LIQUOR INVESTIGATIONS.

We have dwelt most largely in this charge on the national prohibition act because there is a peculiar interrelation of crime, and a thorough investigation of any particular case may open up leads which develop offenses of an entirely different nature. It is the experience in Federal courts that prosecutions for one class of offenses often develop and assist prosecutions of an altogether different class. This tendency is peculiarly noticeable in this court since the enforcement of this new law has been undertaken. The illegal traffic in narcotics is closely related to that in intoxicating liquor. Also the enormous profits possible in each unlawful business attract criminals whose specialties are in another line. The traffic in morphine, cocaine, heroin, and other narcotics has been a marked feature of crime in this district, largely due to the fact that Toledo is an important railroad center, situated near to the Canadian border. The jury will find that if it sets itself diligently at work in the enforcement of the prohibition act it will be of very great assistance in the limitation of the traffic in narcotics and that there will also come revelations, profitable in prosecutions, of violation of other laws. Leaving out altogether consideration of moral questions, it is the conclusion of Federal experience that the most practical way to attack crime in general is to enforce the liquor laws. If there is a real desire and intention on the part of good citizens of any shade of thought respecting sumptuary laws to restrain and reduce whatever abnormality of crime there may be in Toledo as the metropolis of this Federal division, the key which unlocks the doors of vice and crime most practically and efficiently, productive of the most comprehensive results, is this law. The records of this court prove these assertions.

CONSPIRACY IN LIQUOR VIOLATIONS.

The Federal conspiracy act is a powerful weapon to depress interest in the business of crime. The attention of this grand jury is specially directed to it in connection with liquor violations. When two or more persons, either as partners, or proprietor and barkeeper, or silent owner and a supposititious proprietor, or even as landlord and tenant, act together in the illegal dispensation of intoxicating liquor, generally the elements of conspiracy exist and prosecutions therefor may be had. Instances have been disclosed wherein persons have established drinking places and then have hired others to pose as owners, paying large wages that the latter may carry the burden of possible prosecutions. In such cases the parties might well be prosecuted for conspiracy, that the cowardly secret owner might receive a proper punishment. We have also noted circumstances in which it has seemed practicable to include landlords in a conspiracy charge. A few penitentiary sentences would inculcate a wholesome respect for this law, observance of which is as much the duty of a respectable and law-abiding citizen as any other, while the opportunity to fine up to $10,000 gives the chance to require some of the illegal gains to be given to the Government in lieu of taxes of which it has been defrauded. This law applies equally to negotiations for purchase of liquor for home consumption. The purchaser and seller may be jointly indicted for conspiracy.

PROSECUTIONS FOR PERJURY.

The crime of perjury is very prevalent. It should be discouraged by prosecutions. We propose to scrutinize testimony in open court during this term with a view of advising you of facts. You, through diligent attention to testimony before you, may also find occasion to indict for this crime committed in your presence.

WITHHOLDING EVIDENCE.

Your attention is also directed to section 146 of the Criminal Code. By its provisions one who has, but withholds, important evidence concerning an offender against the United States may be prosecuted for misprision of felony. The statute makes it the duty, under a heavy penalty, for any citizen, knowing of the commission of a Federal felony, to forthwith communicate his knowledge to some Government officer.

The members of this grand jury, other than the foreman, will please observe that while the oath they have taken was general in its character, yet its terms obligate you to the same duty of secrecy which was made a special element of the oath of the foreman, for you have promised to observe the same oath the foreman has taken. This obligation of secrecy is no idle one. You are admonished, therefore, to refrain from making the proceedings in the grand jury, either as to testimony or the identity of witnesses or the subjects under consideration, a matter of discussion and gossip outside of the grand jury councils. Much mischief in the administration of the law will be avoided if grand jurors strictly observe this injunction.

We feel sure that if this grand jury takes its work seriously, comprehending what its independent powers are, and using them, its members will find their labors very profitable personally and the work of absorbing interest. You will also find compensation for the sacrifices which some of you may be compelled to make of your personal interests in the fact that you will have contributed greatly toward the moral well-being of the community.

Mr. FULMER. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, I realize that the bill before us, known as the ship subsidy bill, deals with a very large question, which I sum up in a few words:

Shall this great Government continue to lend a hand to the monopolistic interests of the country?

Shall a party's political debts be paid by cunningly devised taxes on the masses of the people as bonuses to professional classes?

Shall we grant monopolies to business manipulators, whose policy is to squeeze the public, and then write into the law of the land an official invitation to them to walk up to the Nation's Treasury and have handed to them complimentary pay envelopes inscribed with Secretary Mellon's Christmas greetings: "Gentlemen, our people thank you for your kind services. There is more like this. Come again."

After listening to the speeches of men like Mr. DAVIS, of Tennessee, Mr. BANKHEAD, of Alabama, Judge HARDY, of Texas, and others who have served on the committee, and who have had a chance to attend the hearings upon the Treasury-looting scheme, I am unable to discover one legitimate reason for voting in favor of it.

Instead I see in it a contemplated Treasury raid, an official Thanksgiving Day dinner, a Christmas feast, a New Year's revel, an Easter offering, a Fourth of July spread for the gourmands of big business, and a dangerous encroachment upon sound and healthy lawmaking.

I have never encountered what appears to be a more studied and brazen attempt deliberately to squander the people's trust fund, sacred though it should be in the hands of their trusted and unbonded administrators, by donating millions of dollars from it for the enrichment of a favored, noncompetitive class.

Surely, gentlemen, you are not unmindful of the scandalous remarks and charges and rumors clouding the atmosphere. Why is it that every man is not credited with considering and voting upon this measure upon its merits? Why are there rumors of wholesale trading of votes for administration jobs? Why is it said that Mr. Lasker, now the head of the Shipping Board, is to head a gigantic corporation to rake in scientifically the luscious bonuses and velvety subsidies that await the inner circle should this measure become a law? Listen to this from the Washington Daily News of November 28:

The Old Guard in Congress is willing to trade everything it can lay hands on for votes for the administration ship subsidy bill.

Most of the hundred or more Republican lame ducks in the House and Senate are being given to understand that none of them will be taken care of with Federal appointments until after the vote is taken on the subsidy.

The Old Guard is using this as a powerful club to line up votes for the subsidy. And a substantial majority of the lame ducks prefer to stay on the Government pay roll after their present terms expire rather than go to work in private life.

Three other inducements are being used:

1. A proposition to deepen the Mississippi River and make it navigable for ocean-going vessels as far up as St. Louis.
2. The St. Lawrence ship canal project.
3. A promise of relief and benefits for farmers.

"Of course," declares Representative FREAR, of Wisconsin, a leader in the Republican opposition to the subsidy, "nobody expects this Congress to do anything tangible either in the matter of deepening the Mississippi or in the St. Lawrence ship canal project, but they could be used by some Members as an excuse to their constituents for voting for the subsidy."

At least one important White House conference lately is known to have been given over largely to a discussion by the President and his callers of what should be done to care for those Members who went down in the recent elections. A substantial number of defeated Members of both House and Senate are to be taken care of.

Now, listen:

But there will be no distribution of plums—at least to House lame ducks—until after to-morrow. That is the date set for a vote on the subsidy bill.

What an indictment! Jobs for votes! Votes for jobs! If you want a job just wait and let's see how you vote for the Harding-Lasker helping hand bill.

As for me, I prefer to believe that conscience will be your guide.

And hear Samuel Gompers voice the position of the American Federation of Labor in his letter to each of us this morning:

It is without doubt one of the most brazen Treasury-looting schemes ever devised. And scoundrelly measures, like scoundrelly men, take refuge in patriotism when no other offers. The bill is urged on grounds of patriotism. It is difficult to think of anything more unfitting. This bill will not give America a merchant marine. Labor joins with all others who want a well-manned, adequate merchant marine. But it denounces this bill as a fraud, a robbery, and wholly indefensible.

After experiencing the operation of the Esch-Cummins bill, giving to the railroads of the United States a subsidy, which, next to the deflation policy of the Federal Reserve Board, has done more to paralyze agriculture and stifle legitimate business than any other piece of legislation passed by Congress in recent years, we should certainly be on our guard against this companion measure.

Then, if I had no other reason, I could not support this measure when I find it supported by the United States Chamber of Commerce, one of the biggest lobbies in the interest of big business, J. P. Morgan & Co., and other powerful Wall Street individuals and groups, who by their efforts in trying to control legislation are exerting a most potent influence in bringing about extreme radicalism and even bolshevism in this country. This chamber, heavily financed by its backers, hangs about Washington for the purpose of superintending the enactment of legislation and putting over schemes which I can never approve, inasmuch as I regard them as absolutely detrimental to the best interests of the country.

For example, the United States Chamber of Commerce advocates a sales tax, as does Mr. William Randolph Hearst and other people of great wealth, expecting eventually to substitute such a tax for taxes on incomes and excess profits. If they can have their way, they will transfer the tax burdens to those who are least able to pay them—to those who have little means and small earnings and who already feel the pressure of conditions from which they can not escape. Thousands of small property owners in my section of the country, and I take it that the same applies to other sections, are now unable to meet their tax bills, and all that many of them possess is being sacrificed under forced sales.

We do not have to look far for the causes of the pitiful conditions existing in some of the agricultural sections and the bank failures and the bankruptcies in legitimate business and the suicides. We see it in the failure of the Congress broadly to vision the whole people and enact helpful legislation instead of allowing moneyed interests to lobby around Washington and write or dictate the writing of practically all important measures.

A few large manufacturing interests succeeded in putting over the Fordney tariff bill, which will benefit a few and take millions of dollars from the consumer and the producer. I have no doubt that Mr. Hearst and his associates, with the assistance of the United States Chamber of Commerce, will at some early date write a sales-tax measure and endeavor to ram it down the throats of a majority of the Members of Congress by their subtle propaganda and expert newspaper publicity—the kind that will be very convincing to those who have no chance to study these great questions.

I believe, with Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee, that if we had a real business man who knows something about the business of shipping instead of Mr. Lasker, who admitted at the time of his appointment that he knew nothing about that business—and whose policy will soon get the shipping business in such a condition that nobody can save it, and then it will be handed to the money sharks for a song—it would to-day be operating successfully. Apparently his employment of superlawyers at salaries running up to $35,000 has not brought about commensurate good.

This bill gives to a board, made independent of Congress and the President and the courts, absolute power to loan, at interest as low as 2 per cent per year, out of a revolving fund of $125,000,000, two-thirds of the cost and equipment of vessels built in private shipyards, with subsidies as also provided. This seems to be in line with the apparent privileges enjoyed by the railroads under the Esch-Cummins bill.

To a large extent the Interstate Commerce Commission takes dictation from the railroad owners in fixing rates and approving tariffs. For instance, the agent of the Southern Railway at Richmond issued tariff No. 2, Interstate Commerce Commission No. 358, to take effect October 15, 1921, Eastbound Carolina class and commodity tariff from local points in Georgia, North and South Carolina and Virginia to Eastern States and interior eastern points, forbidding the shippers of hogs to ship in double-decked cars.

What did it mean? These people from Southern States, suffering from the deflation of 1920, with cotton crops destroyed by the boll weevil, tried to get back to a living basis by raising cattle and hogs. The rate from Springfield, S. C., to Richmond, Va., on two single cars was $157 as against $92 for a double-decked car carrying the same number of hogs.

So the railroad, not satisfied with their 6 per cent guaranteed profit, attempted further to penalize these shippers by compelling them to pay $157 for a shipment that could have been made for an announced rate of $92. There was subsidy with a vengeance. I took up the matter with the commission and they agreed that the tariff looked bad and it was accordingly canceled. But see what an opportunity there was for "mopping up" as long as this special tariff (and I suppose there are many similar instances) was in effect.

Cargoes and not ships, freights and not subsidies, are the present need. The war left us with more ships than we can use and freighters by the score are rusting in our great harbors. The farming interests of the West and the cotton-growing South and the manufacturing East are not held back from the markets of the world by lack of American ships, but by import duties imposed upon the American people by the Fordney Tariff Act, which throttles export trade, and subsidies, which mean heavier taxation, only add to their burdens and produce greater revolt. Our country is to-day stifling with its own goods and the outside world is hungering and thirsting for them. Many of the foreign countries are without money to buy, but if they were allowed to export their goods in exchange for ours we would soon see a different complexion in business, both in this country and in Europe.

For this subsidy fund the Secretary of the Treasury is required to devote all tonnage duties, 10 per cent of all customs duties, the equivalent of all mail subsidies, and half of excess earnings above 10 per cent, if any, of subsidized vessels, all of this permanently appropriated without further control by the Congress. This subsidy fund is estimated at from $30,000,000 to $50,000,000 per year, to be paid out of the pockets of the people.

This bill confers upon Chairman Lasker—who when examined by the committee stated that he had "only been a regular advertising expert," not a shipping expert—and his associates, without the requirement of having to submit reports, autocratic powers which invade the province and transfer the authority of the President, the Secretaries of State, Treasury, War, Navy, Labor, Commerce, the Postmaster General, and the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, as well as of Congress, and which admittedly involve a tax burden of $52,000,000, which may indirectly reach $100,000,000.

I have heard of no real demand coming from the people or from either party for a special call of Congress to pass this bill. On the other hand, this bill was advocated by the President before the last Congress, but was delayed by the Members in order to feel the popular pulse. To my mind the passage of the Fordney tariff bill, the veto of the veterans' bonus bill, and the belief that the Republican administration would ram this indefensible ship subsidy measure through Congress was the cause of the defeat of nearly 100 Members of the Republican persuasion three weeks ago.

I agree with my good friend, Mr. TINCER, of Kansas, and with Mr. GAHN, of Ohio, that the passage of this bill will spell the winding up of the Republican Party in 1924, because the people are at last giving signs of rebelling against legislation in the interest of a few.

I know that there are thousands of parasites, middlemen, between the producer and the consumer, but I do not hear of any administration measures to weed these out and protect these helpless people. I know that our marketing system is wrong and that the farmer has much produce to sell, but in some instances he can not give it away, and in the meantime the consumer is paying inflated prices. Credits are tight, interest rates are high. Of course, much good has been done by the Federal reserve bank and the War Finance Corporation, but on account of red tape, and the great masses not being able to come in direct contact with these splendid institutions, thousands and thousands of persons who need assistance never get it.

The Federal reserve banks loan only to member banks, the present rates being from 4 to 4½ per cent. The farmer is borrowing from banks as usual, if he can borrow at all, paying from 8 to 10 per cent, besides revenue stamps, recording fees, and attorney's fees for writing chattel and real estate mortgages, which are drawn so that if payment is not made at maturity the attorney can charge 10 per cent for collecting.

Who that votes for the ship subsidy bill, carrying loans of $125,000,000 at 2 per cent, is game enough to vote for a sufficient loan fund for the farmer at 2 per cent, whereby he can be helped to pay his losses, and agriculture can be put back on a paying basis?

How many supporters of this Lasker bill will vote to have the Government furnish the cotton and grain farmers with nitrate of soda at cost prices, and thereby check the highway robbery on the part of Grace & Co. and several other importers of soda who bought the Government soda last year at from $30 to $35 per ton and, inasmuch as they controlled the imports, put the price to the farmer at from $65 to $75?

I challenge the older Members of the House who have been here for years to work out some legislation along these lines. If this is done, watch the United States Chamber of Commerce and the Fertilizer Trust, which beat Henry Ford out of Muscle Shoals, come rushing with propaganda to defeat it.

I have just had some correspondence with Secretary Wallace, of the Department of Agriculture, relative to his approval of an appropriation of $200,000 for extending the market news service of the department by telegraph to the States of Virginia, North and South Carolina, Alabama, Georgia, Louisiana, Florida, Tennessee, Texas, and Mississippi. This service would furnish to interested persons in those States daily telegraphic information on prices and conditions in the larger markets and principal producing sections of the United States. This service was rendered during the war, but on account of insufficient funds it was discontinued in June, 1919. Secretary Wallace says:

While the department feels that the expansion of this leased-wire market news service would accomplish a great deal in facilitating efficient marketing by making available to all concerned a better knowledge of daily supplies and prevailing prices, we must keep in mind the present necessity for retrenchment in governmental expenditures.

This service would cost only $200,000 to post daily the people who produce cotton and foodstuffs as to supplies and prices, yet this is considered too heavy a drain upon the Treasury. This is how the small shipping and producing people of these States "get it in the neck," but there are some who consider it absolutely all right to pay out of the Treasury of the United States from $50,000,000 to $100,000,000 a year to a favored few in the nature of a subsidy.

It is not, I say, by such legislation as the powerful interests demand that relief will be afforded to the mass or that they will be protected against further exactions, but by really constructive legislation in the interest of the entire public which it is incumbent upon Congress to enact.

Let us determine that there shall be no more such legislation as the railroad bill, which is directly to the advantage of the railroad owners and to the disadvantage of everybody else; or the tariff bill, which is to the interest of a few, comparatively, and to the disadvantage of everybody else; or the present bill, which is likewise to the interest of a few, comparatively, and to the disadvantage of nearly everybody else, including those great classes that produce the necessities of life and that labor in the various occupations that are essential to the progress and upbuilding of the country.

By unanimous consent leave to extend remarks in the RECORD was granted—

To Mr. KINDRED.

To Mr. JONES of Texas.

To Mr. KLINE of Pennsylvania.

To Mr. MICHENER.

To Mr. MONDELL.

To Mr. BANKHEAD.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, on yesterday the following colloquy took place in the Committee of the Whole:

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I ask unanimous consent to proceed out of order for five minutes in order to correct what I think is a rather grave injustice done to one of the witnesses who testified before the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes out of order. Is there objection?

Mr. SNYDER. I object.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I regret, but I have objected all day to discussions out of order, and I feel that I must do so now.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is heard.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I want to be recognized on my motion, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I shall not undertake to do by indirection what I can not obtain leave to do directly. I hope the gentleman will withdraw the objection. I am not going to raise any controversial issue, but I would like an opportunity to correct a statement with reference to the attitude of Mr. Edgar Wallace, who appeared before the committee as a representative of the American Federation of Labor. I do not say that his position has been willfully misrepresented, but it has been incorrectly represented in this debate, and in justice to him and his organization I ask this privilege.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. I was the only person who made reference to him.

Mr. BANKHEAD. It is with reference to the statement of the gentleman from Massachusetts in the debate that I ask this privilege.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. I declined to allow it because I simply spoke from memory. I am willing to have read into the RECORD what he said.

Mr. BANKHEAD. That is all I want to do.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. There is no objection to that.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Then I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by reading into the RECORD the question of the gentleman from Massachusetts and the reply of Mr. Wallace.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. The gentleman asked what he said. I stated what he said, intending to state what was true. If I made any misstatement of it—I do not think I did—it was made inadvertently. I have no objection to any correction of that statement, but I do not want the RECORD to be cluttered up with a lot of immaterial matter.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by incorporating therein the question asked by the gentleman from Massachusetts of the witness, Edgar Wallace, in the committee as to his attitude on this question and his reply thereto—only about 10 lines.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The following are the questions asked Mr. Edgar Wallace by the chairman of the committee [Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts], and the answers thereto, taken from the official report of the hearings:

Mr. GREENE. Then you would prefer to ship in foreign ships because they will take it cheaper than we will?

Mr. WALLACE. I mean to say this: We can never hope to do as much export and import business as some country that depends entirely for its living on shipping out stuff in bulk and bringing back stuff in bulk that she needs. We don't need much that would make bulk freight come into this country. I believe there is the great reason why we can't make a merchant marine pay—because that which we import generally comes into this country in small quantities, mostly luxuries. That does not come in bulk, while our exports are in bulk, or could be in bulk.

Mr. GREENE. But we did control the merchant marine a number of years ago. We had a great deal of it.

Mr. WALLACE. We traded—

Mr. GREENE (interposing). And we were then a small country. Now we are a great country with great resources, and we don't take a back seat to any other nation on anything else, but you want us to give up the sea, which is free to everybody. You want us to give up the sea and allow some other nation to possess the sea while we sit back and let them take it.

Mr. WALLACE. I have said that I believe this country could compete successfully upon the sea, in building vessels and in managing vessels.

Mr. GREENE. Our vessels have gone down, have gone out of sight. We haven't carried more than 8 per cent of our product.

Mr. WALLACE. We have carried just as much as there is a demand for, and that is all we could do if we had a private merchant marine.

Mr. GREENE. We will try to create a demand and then we will do something. That is what we are trying to do. We may make a mistake, but we will try it, whether we succeed or not. I am something of a Yankee myself, and if anybody beats me I try to beat them. Go ahead. You are not obliged to give up because for a number of years we haven't succeeded. We are stronger than we ever were. We have a merchant marine. What are we going to do with it? Put it in use.

Mr. WALLACE. But don't give it away and then pay people to run it. That is what we object to.

It will be seen, therefore, that the chairman of the committee was grossly inaccurate when he charged that Edgar Wallace had testified that "he would prefer to have American goods carried in British bottoms than American bottoms." Mr. Wallace made no such statement, nor anything else that could be distorted into such a conclusion. He was the official representative of the American Federation of Labor before the committee, and the charge made against him was a grave injustice to Mr. Wallace and the organization which he appeared for. I make these observations and incorporate the facts in the interest of truth and justice.

By unanimous consent, leave to extend remarks in the RECORD was granted—

To Mr. RAINEY of Illinois.

To Mr. VOLK.

ADJOURNMENT UNTIL FRIDAY.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Friday.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wyoming asks unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Friday. Is there objection?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Reserving the right to object, may I ask the gentleman if it is contemplated that any business of consequence will be transacted on Friday?

Mr. MONDELL. It is not. It is not expected that any business will be taken up on Friday. At that meeting, however, we should consider the question as to a further adjournment and as to whether we should adjourn to an hour before the meeting of the regular session on Monday.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Is it also safe to assume that there will be no business of consequence transacted on Saturday and probably no meeting of the House on Saturday?

Mr. MONDELL. My present thought is that on Friday we will adjourn until Monday, and possibly until Monday at 11.30 o'clock, if that is agreeable to gentlemen on the other side.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. If for any reason it should develop—and I do not assume that it will—that there is to be a meeting on Saturday, it will be safe to assume that no important business will be transacted on that day?

Mr. MONDELL. It is entirely safe to assume that. I hope there will be no meeting on Saturday.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

LEAVE TO WITHDRAW PAPERS.

SENATE.

FRIDAY, December 1, 1922.

The Chaplain, Rev. J. J. Muir, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father, with the beginning of another month we desire to recognize the hand that has been blessing us. And we do ask this morning that with the consciousness of Thy presence we may be able to fulfill the task given to us. So guide the interests of our land, bless those in authority, remembering the President at this time and all others upon whom rest the functions of government, and glorify Thyself through us. For Christ Jesus' sake. Amen.

The Vice President being absent, the President pro tempore took the chair.

PETER NORBECK, a Senator from the State of South Dakota, and JOSEPH T. ROBINSON, a Senator from the State of Arkansas, appeared in their seats to-day.

THE JOURNAL.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Mississippi will state the inquiry.

Mr. HARRISON. The Journal of the proceedings of Tuesday last not having been approved, is the approval of the Journal of the proceedings of Wednesday last the first order of business, and when that is finished is the unfinished business the approval of the Journal of Tuesday's proceedings, which was not approved day before yesterday, and does it then come up for consideration?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question propounded by the Senator from Mississippi is a difficult one. The Chair is inclined to believe that we begin the proceedings this morning with the regular morning business.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, I think clearly the first business in order this morning is to approve the Journal of the last legislative day, and when that has been approved we then take up the approval of the Journal of the proceedings of Tuesday last, which has not yet been approved.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will be glad to hear suggestions upon the point.

Mr. CURTIS. I think the Senator from Alabama is correct, and I was about to ask unanimous consent that the Journal of the proceedings of Wednesday last be approved.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. We can not give unanimous consent yet. I hope the time will come soon when my good friend from Kansas and I can reach an entirely harmonious agreement along all lines, but until we arrive at that point I do not think we can reach an agreement at all. I shall not ask for a quorum now, and I do not object to the Secretary reading the Journal of the proceedings of Wednesday last. We have some amendments which we desire to offer and to discuss for a while.

Mr. CURTIS. Tuesday's Journal had been read, and it was being considered for amendments when the Senate adjourned on Wednesday evening.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I refer to the Journal of the last legislative day, Wednesday, the new Journal; that is in order at this time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question pending when the Senate adjourned on Wednesday evening was in regard to the approval of the Journal of the preceding day. That question is the unfinished business by virtue of its pendency at the time of adjournment. Under the rules of the Senate the unfinished business does not come before the Senate until 2 o'clock. The Chair, as at present advised, is unable to see how the Senate can take up at this time the motion that was pending at the adjournment on Wednesday.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I understand that. I am raising no question about that. I agree with the Chair that the Journal which we were discussing on the last legislative day has become the unfinished business, and I have no objection to the reading of the Journal which is ordinarily offered at this stage of the proceedings, and which would be the Journal of Wednesday last. We have some amendments to offer to the Journal of Wednesday's proceedings when it has been read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is of the opinion at the present time, although it is an entirely new question to the Chair, that the first business this morning is the reading of the Journal of the proceedings of the last legislative session.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. We agree with the Chair about that, and there is no objection to that course. When the Journal has been read we want an opportunity to offer some amendments to it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the Journal of Wednesday last.

The reading clerk read the Journal of Wednesday's proceedings.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is, Shall the Journal as read be approved?

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I notice that the Journal states:

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of the proceedings of yesterday.

It is apparent that that is a mistake.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Mississippi will suspend while the Senate receives a message from the House of Representatives.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE—DEATH OF REPRESENTATIVE JAMES R. MANN.

Mr. Overhue, enrolling clerk of the House of Representatives, appeared and said:

Mr. President, I am directed by the House of Representatives to transmit to the Senate the following resolutions (H. Res. 455):

Resolved, That the House has heard with profound sorrow of the death of Hon. JAMES R. MANN, a Representative from the State of Illinois.

Resolved, That a committee of the House be appointed to take order for superintending the funeral of Mr. MANN in the House of Representatives at 2 o'clock p. m. on Saturday, December 2, 1922, and that the House of Representatives attend the same.

Resolved, That as a further mark of respect the remains of Mr. MANN be removed from Washington to Chicago, Ill., in charge of the Sergeant at Arms, attended by the committee, who shall have full power to carry these resolutions into effect, and that the necessary expenses in connection therewith be paid out of the contingent fund of the House.

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House communicate these proceedings to the Senate and invite the Vice President and the Senate to attend the funeral in the House of Representatives and to appoint a committee to act with the committee of the House.

Resolved, That invitations be extended to the President of the United States and the members of his Cabinet, the Chief Justice and Associate Justices of the Supreme Court of the United States, the diplomatic corps (through the Secretary of State), the Chief of Naval Operations, and the General of the Army to attend the funeral in the Hall of the House of Representatives.

Resolved, That as a further mark of respect this House do now adjourn.

Also, the House has passed a bill (H. R. 12817) to amend and supplement the merchant marine act, 1920, and for other purposes, in which it requests the concurrence of the Senate.

THE JOURNAL.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, as I stated, the Journal reads that "The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of the proceedings of yesterday."

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. HARRISON. As soon as I offer the amendment to the Journal which I propose to offer, I will yield to the Senator. It is apparent to everyone that the Secretary did not read the Journal of the proceedings of Wednesday; on the contrary, every Senator remembers that the reading clerk, Mr. Crockett, or the Assistant Secretary of the Senate, Mr. Rose, read the Journal. For accuracy's sake I move that the Journal be corrected in the first instance where it says "The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal" so as to say that "The Assistant Secretary of the Senate, Mr. Rose, proceeded to read the Journal." Now I yield to the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. CURTIS. We might dispose of that by unanimous consent.

Mr. HARRISON. I wish to address myself to the motion briefly.

Mr. CURTIS. I desire to advise the Senate that in connection with the resolutions which have come over from the House, I understand it is the intention of the Senator from Illinois [Mr. McKINLEY] to ask that they be laid before the Senate, and that an adjournment be had. In view of that fact, I ask unanimous consent that the Journal of the proceedings of Tuesday last and the Journal of the proceedings of Wednesday last be approved.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, we are perfectly willing to have the Senator take such action as he desires in reference to the resolutions coming over from the House of Representatives, but we can not consent to any unanimous-consent order about the Journal of the proceedings of Tuesday and Wednesday or the business of the Senate until we reach a final agreement upon all matters. So the Journal will have to remain as the unfinished business of the Senate until we reach a final agreement. I would object to the approval of the Journal by unanimous consent, but whatever order is desired to be made in reference to the resolutions coming over from the House in regard to the death of the late Representative MANN, whom we all loved and respected and whose death we greatly lament, we, of course, are ready to act in entire harmony with the desire of the other side of the Chamber.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I understand that it is the desire of the Senator from Illinois [Mr. McKINLEY] that the resolutions of the House of Representatives be laid before the Senate.

Mr. McKINLEY. I make that request, Mr. President.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I do not desire to interfere at all with a motion to adjourn. I regarded Mr. MANN very highly; I knew him well; I traveled with him for some 3,000 miles, and found him to be a great and a good man, and I am distressed to hear of his death.

I had intended, Mr. President, to take a short time in demonstrating to the Senate, as I think I can demonstrate, by a long line of decisions, including decisions in three lynching cases, that the so-called Dyer bill now pending in the Senate is clearly unconstitutional. However, I shall not do that to-day; but at some future time I hope that I can show to the Senate and to the country that the bill is a high-handed invasion of the Constitution of the United States.

DEATH OF REPRESENTATIVE JAMES R. MANN.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate the resolutions of the House of Representatives. Without objection, the resolutions will not be reread, inasmuch as they have already been read in the hearing of the Senate.

Mr. McKINLEY. Mr. President, it becomes my sad duty to announce to the Senate the death of Hon. JAMES R. MANN, of Illinois, late a Member of the House of Representatives and a former colleague of many of the present Members of this body.

After completing a continuous service of 25 years in the House of Representatives, years filled with honest, studious, and constructive accomplishment, he passed away on the evening of November 30.

JAMES R. MANN moved with strength to the surest end, worked with poise to the safest point. He held an abiding faith in enduring things. He was industrious without asking that the strokes be made of record. Honest, patriotic, sincere, his adversaries could not terrify him by assault nor friends change his fixed purposes by flattery. His untimely death is a shock to his legion of friends and a distinct loss to his country.

I may not at this time attempt to detail his great service, but at a proper time I shall ask the Senate to set apart a day for memorial exercises, when fitting tribute may be paid his life, character, and distinguished public career.

Mr. President, I offer the resolutions which I send to the desk, and ask their adoption.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the resolutions submitted by the Senator from Illinois.

The Assistant Secretary read the resolutions (S. Res. 370), as follows:

Resolved, That the Senate had heard with profound sorrow the announcement of the death of the Hon. JAMES R. MANN, late a Representative from the State of Illinois.

Resolved, That a committee of nine Senators be appointed by the Vice President to join the committee appointed on the part of the House of Representatives to attend the funeral of the deceased.

Resolved, That the Secretary communicate these resolutions to the House of Representatives and transmit a copy thereof to the family of the deceased.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, when the resolutions offered by the Senator from Illinois have been adopted I shall move the acceptance of the invitation of the House of Representatives that the Senate in a body attend the funeral of the late Representative MANN to-morrow at 2 o'clock.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is compelled to consider this proceeding as being by unanimous consent.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, I stated a moment ago that there is no objection to this proceeding being had by unanimous consent. We raise no question about it at all.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the adoption of the resolutions presented by the Senator from Illinois.

The resolutions were unanimously agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore appointed as the committee on the part of the Senate under the second resolution Mr. McKINLEY, Mr. BALL, Mr. CAMERON, Mr. GLASS, Mr. HARRELD, Mr. LENOIR, Mr. POMERENE, Mr. WATSON, and Mr. WILLIS.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I move that the Senate accept the invitation of the House of Representatives to attend in a body at 2 o'clock to-morrow the funeral of Hon. JAMES R. MANN.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts.

The motion was unanimously agreed to.

Mr. McKINLEY. Mr. President, as a further mark of respect to the memory of the late Representative MANN, I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was unanimously agreed to; and (at 12 o'clock and 25 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Saturday, December 2, 1922, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, December 1, 1922.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father who art in heaven, wilt Thou hear us? Our hearts are sore and heavy, and there is no adequate speech for the deep emotions of the soul. Out of a strong right hand Thou hast taken the staff, and the left is cold and smitten. Next to his fireside altar this place was in his loving regard and solicitude. Here the associations of the years cluster and here he consecrated his powers with the sacrament of unstinted toil. A tower of strength is fallen and lies prostrate, and in this place affection has its way. Dry the tears that no other hand can touch and give comfort and hope to those who suffer. Bestow that peace that brings light when night would distress us, that fills the void of the grave and conquers death. At the last, for us may the Jordan be dried, the wilderness carpeted, and the way made as beautiful as the gardens of heaven. In the name of Jesus. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Wednesday, November 29, was read and approved.

HOUR OF MEETING TO-MORROW.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet at 1.30 p. m. to-morrow.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wyoming asks unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet at 1.30 o'clock p. m. to-morrow. Is there objection? There was no objection.

HOUR OF MEETING ON MONDAY NEXT.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns on Saturday it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock a. m. on Monday next.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wyoming asks unanimous consent that when the House adjourns on Saturday it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock a. m. on Monday next. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

DEATH OF REPRESENTATIVE JAMES R. MANN.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, it becomes my painful duty to report the death of my colleague, Hon. JAMES R. MANN, a Representative from the State of Illinois, who died at his home in this city last night at 11 o'clock and 15 minutes p. m. after a short illness. It is needless to say that everybody in the House is shocked at the announcement of his death. In the death of Mr. MANN the Nation loses one of its most stalwart defenders. At a later date the Illinois delegation will ask that a day be set apart on which memorial services may be held in honor of our deceased colleague, at which time his life story and work on behalf of the Nation will be told. I offer the following resolutions, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Resolution 455.

Resolved, That the House has heard with profound sorrow of the death of Hon. JAMES R. MANN, a Representative from the State of Illinois.

Resolved, That a committee of the House be appointed to take order for superintending the funeral of Mr. MANN in the House of Representatives at 2 o'clock p. m. on Saturday, December 2, 1922, and that the House of Representatives attend the same.

Resolved, That as a further mark of respect the remains of Mr. MANN be removed from Washington to Chicago, Ill., in charge of the Sergeant at Arms, attended by the committee, who shall have full power to carry these resolutions into effect, and that the necessary expenses in connection therewith be paid out of the contingent fund of the House.

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House communicate these proceedings to the Senate and invite the Vice President and the Senate to attend the funeral in the House of Representatives and to appoint a committee to act with the committee of the House.

Resolved, That invitations be extended to the President of the United States and the members of his Cabinet, the Chief Justice and Associate Justices of the Supreme Court of the United States, the diplomatic corps (through the Secretary of State), the Chief of Naval Operations, and the General of the Army to attend the funeral in the Hall of the House of Representatives.

SENATE.

SATURDAY, December 2, 1922.

The Chaplain, Rev. J. J. Muir, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O God, to whom all hearts are open and from whom no secrets are hid, we come and ask Thee for Thy grace that we may so live before Thee that in all the work begun, continued, and ended we may receive Thy approbation. Enable us always to walk in the light and so render to Thee acceptable service, always seeking the welfare of the country and all the interests that bind us to others beyond our shores. We ask in Jesus Christ's name. Amen.

The VICE PRESIDENT resumed the chair.

WILLIAM P. DILLINGHAM, a Senator from the State of Vermont, appeared in his seat to-day.

SENATOR FROM IOWA.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I present the certificate of election of SMITH W. BROOKHART, Senator elect from the State of Iowa, which I ask may be read; and after the reading of the certificate, as the Senator elect is present, I ask that the oath be administered to him.

[A message in writing from the President of the United States was communicated to the Senate by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries.]

THE JOURNAL.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the Journal of the preceding session.

The Assistant Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings.

Mr. CURTIS. I ask unanimous consent to dispense with the further reading of the Journal.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Of course, I would be delighted to agree with my friend from Kansas about almost anything except the Journal, but under the present status of public business I think it is necessary to have the Journal amended. The reading will have to be proceeded with for the present.

The Assistant Secretary resumed and concluded the reading of the Journal.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, when the Senate adjourned on yesterday the unfinished business, I think, was a motion then pending to correct a mistake in the Journal of the preceding day, where the Journal had recited the fact that the Secretary had read the Journal of the preceding day, when, in fact, the Journal had been read by the Assistant Secretary of the Senate, Mr. Rose. So that very important question is pending and will have to be decided by the Senate at some time. Now, I note in the Journal which has just been read the statement:

The Journal of the proceedings of Wednesday, November 29, 1922, was read, and the President pro tempore having stated the question—

And so forth. In other words, the Journal leaves out the very important fact as to who read the Journal. On yesterday, I recall, and I am sure other Senators recall, that the Journal was read by the reading clerk, Mr. Crockett. I therefore move that the Journal which has just been read be corrected to state the fact. In order that the record may be preserved and that future generations may know precisely who did read the Journal of that day, I move to insert after the words "was read" the words "by the reading clerk, Mr. Crockett."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Mississippi to amend the Journal.

Mr. HEFLIN obtained the floor.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President—

Mr. HEFLIN. I yield to the Senator from North Carolina.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, when any considerable number of Senators are satisfied and conscientiously believe that any proposed legislation is unconstitutional, that it involves the integrity of the States and the liberties of the people, and if passed would undermine the very foundation stones of this Republic, I think they are fully justified in filibustering to prevent, if possible, a militant majority from roughshodding over a strong minority. We fully believe that the pending measure is unconstitutional; we fully believe that it is partisan in its character, and we also believe that it is sectional.

Nor, Mr. President, does it lie in the mouths of Senators on the other side of the Chamber to criticize a filibuster. They will filibuster on any occasion which they deem appropriate. We have not forgotten that only a short time ago the able and distinguished Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], with remarkable vigor, from the setting of the sun to the rising thereof, all night long, spoke against time, against the then pending shipping bill. The Senator now says, "That is right." He does not deny having done so. He engaged in that filibuster to prevent the passage of legislation in preparation for our participation in the World War, which afterwards came, and which legislation was unanimously agreed to after that war began.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the Senator from North Carolina is wrong in the statement that he has just made.

Mr. OVERMAN. Well, what is the correct statement?

Mr. SMOOT. Senators on this side of the Chamber filibustered against the bill proposing to purchase the German ships which were interned after the declaration of war by our Government. It was against that we filibustered.

Mr. OVERMAN. But the Senator and his colleagues filibustered; that is the point.

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly; there is no doubt about that at all; I agree to that; and we were successful, too.

Mr. OVERMAN. And they were successful, as we hope to be in this instance.

Mr. SMOOT. And we saved the Government about $35,000,000 or $40,000,000.

Mr. OVERMAN. As the result of that filibuster, the Senators on the other side of the Chamber caused a waste of millions of dollars.

The distinguished Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] on that occasion also spoke against time for eight hours in order to prevent the passage of the bill. The then aged Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. Gallinger], whom everybody loved, at that time the leader of the other side of the Chamber, also spoke for eight hours, and he was never afterwards a well man. His protracted speech on that occasion hastened his death.

So in this case, Mr. President, Senators on the other side of the Chamber are not justified in criticizing us for filibustering against the passage of a bill which involves a fundamental question, a question involving the very integrity of this Government, of the States, and also the liberties of the people.

The pending bill is sectional. It has been charged that it was written by a negro from the North; and that charge has not been denied; and it has been sent here for the purpose of being passed in order to corral the negro vote.

Mr. President, I wish to state here that the very Senators on the other side of the Chamber who were candidates for reelection and who were most active in trying to get this bill reported out of the committee and placed upon the calendar in order to hold the negro votes in their States have, every one of them, gone down to defeat. I tell my colleagues on the other side that whenever they endeavor to secure the passage of a sectional bill of this character, in order to degrade certain people in this country, they will always suffer for it afterwards. It is always a curse to them. The people of the United States will never stand for such legislation, as our history has heretofore shown, and as I expect to demonstrate has, previously happened in this country when similar legislation has been pressed. Now we are confronted with this question. Here is a sectional measure. On its face it seems to be general, but it was practically admitted here the other day by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] that it would not affect members of mobs and those who participated in riots in certain States of the North, such as Illinois, and in other sections of the country. That is admitted. Why is this bill brought here? Senators on the other side can not corral the negro vote by passing such a measure as this. The negro vote is just as apt to vote the Republican ticket as rain is to roll off a duck's back. I remember when I was a young man running for the first time for the legislature a friend of mine went to a grand old colored man who was as devoted to me as anyone could be in this world—I believe he would have died for me—and asked him to vote for me. The contest was close, but he said, "I can not vote for Marse Lee." He was asked why, and replied, "Because they would put me back in slavery."

The question was not argued with him, because he firmly believed that if he voted the Democratic ticket or if he voted for me he and his brethren would be put back in slavery. So the colored people are going to vote the Republican ticket in any event, and it is not necessary that the majority should pass such legislation as this in order to make them support Republican candidates.

This bill is brought forth for partisan purposes in the North. I repeat, however, that every one of the men who was a candidate for reelection and who advocated this bill went down to defeat in the recent election. I do not know whether or not their advocacy of such a measure as this had anything to do with the result, but I do know that all those who insisted on this partisan legislation and who were candidates for reelection went down to defeat. It is a measure designed to bring trouble to one of the fairest sections of our country.

Mr. President, there is no demand on the part of the negroes of the South for this proposed legislation. I have never heard of such a demand coming from them. The negroes in the South are happy and contented; they own property; they are educating their children; they are protected by the law as much as any other man is protected by the law in the States; and they are satisfied and want to be let alone, but those who seek to press the pending bill will not let them alone. They want to stir up strife again. This bill will merely put evil notions into the heads of some poor devils down there who will feel that they will have a license guaranteed by the Federal Government to commit awful crimes. The old white man will get out his Winchester rifle, which has been laid aside for so many years that it has become rusty, and be ready for any emergency, and where we have had quiet and peace there will be strife stirred up again.

Mr. President, whenever the Republican Party has undertaken to pass a measure such as this it has proved a curse to them. We have not had any such legislation proposed for thirty-odd years. This is the first occasion in all those years when a sectional bill has come before this body for consideration. Why is it desired to stir up sectional feeling again? Why are we not to be allowed to rest in quiet and peace and prosperity?

It is said that the negroes are deprived of their property and of their liberty; but that is not the fact, for in the South they have the same rights as and are protected equally with the white man. I remember 40 years ago, when I was little more than a boy, as a member of the legislature I aided materially, I am proud to say, in defeating a bill that proposed to take the money derived from the revenue collected in the shape of taxes on the white man and devoting it to the education of white children and taking the taxes derived from the property of the negroes to educate the negroes. That might have been against the Constitution; in any event, it was unfair and unjust to the colored man, and I succeeded in defeating it. Since that time in North Carolina there has been no legislation seeking to discriminate in favor of the white man and against the colored man, but every time a dollar is appropriated for education or for any other purpose for white men the negro gets his share.

Mr. President, is this bill constitutional? That is the great issue here. I wish to go back to the fountainhead; I wish now to go back to the days which marked the inception of this great question. At that time when this question was brought forward it was marked by hatred and malice on the part of the party in power—I am not criticizing them—against that section where the people had suffered and were sorely stricken. During that era there were passed twenty-odd so-called reconstruction bills. Thanks, however, to the present majority party, every vestige of the reconstruction acts has been removed from the statute books since I have been a Member of this body. Why was that action taken? It was due to the better feeling which it was realized existed throughout the country and because the Republican Party, on account of those reconstruction acts 10 years after the war, saw itself go down in defeat. A great President from Ohio, Mr. Hayes, reflecting the public sentiment of this country, restored to the South their integrity; a Republican President put a Southern man in his Cabinet, and from that time until the force bill was introduced we had quiet and peace. When the force bill was passed by the House of Representatives, brave, patriotic, able Republican Senators from the West, sympathizing with the South and our condition, rose against their party and joined with us in a filibuster to defeat that iniquitous measure. The man who introduced it and those who supported it to-day in their hearts are sorry for their act and are ashamed of such attempted legislation. The men who helped us to defeat it are proud of their act, and their people are proud of their conduct in working for the defeat of that bill. So it will be in the case of the pending measure, which is a sectional bill. If the Republican majority shall succeed in passing it, they will live to see the day when they will be ashamed of their conduct, and their people will leave them at home, just as in the recent election they left at home those who had been here advocating that the Judiciary Committee report this bill to the Senate in order to hold the negro vote.

Mr. President, at that time, when there was so much hatred and bitter feeling in this country, Congress was led and controlled by a man whom we hated as cordially as any man in the world—old Thad. Stevens. He was the leader; he was the controlling man in all of the Congress. He was the author, it is said, of the fourteenth amendment. He was the author of these reconstruction acts; and yet I am going to show you by Thaddeus Stevens himself that he did not construe the fourteenth amendment as the Senator from California construed it. I am going to show you that when an amendment to the proposed constitutional amendment was introduced on the floor of the Senate to carry out just what the Senator from California and other Senators are contending for, the Senate voted it down because it was interfering with the integrity of the States. Men in the North, men in the East and the West, loved their States. They believed in preserving the integrity of the States, and that the police power that was in the States, guaranteed by the Constitution, should stay there.

I want to say this, Mr. President: I differ with the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS]. I gathered—I may be mistaken—I love him, and I do not want to misinterpret anything that he says—but I gathered from him the other day that if he thinks the Supreme Court has decided a question wrongly he will not be bound by the decision.

Mr. CUMMINS. No, Mr. President; I did not intend to say anything of that kind. I think every good citizen must be bound by the interpretation of the Constitution as given by the Supreme Court.

Mr. OVERMAN. The Senator said he did not agree with the child labor law decision; and I suppose if the child labor law should come up here now, notwithstanding the decision of the Supreme Court, he would vote for it.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, the two questions are wholly different. Every good citizen must yield to the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States in interpreting the Constitution; but if I think, myself, that an act is constitutional, I do not believe that it is the part of a bad citizen to present the question again to the Supreme Court of the United States, hoping that the conviction that I myself hold may finally receive the approval of that high tribunal.

Mr. OVERMAN. Where will that principle lead us? Every bootlegger, every man who commits lynching, and who thinks that the law is unwise or that the Supreme Court is wrong, will violate the Constitution because he thinks the Supreme Court is wrong; and when a man really wants to rape the Constitution in that manner he literally becomes a member of a mob.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I do not justify on the part of a citizen any conduct in violation of the Constitution as interpreted by the Supreme Court. When we come to consider the duty of a legislator, if he believes that a proposed act is unconstitutional he ought not to vote for it, of course; but if he believes that upon rehearing the Supreme Court may change its view respecting the matter he is not guilty of bad morals or unethical conduct if he votes for the passage of a measure in order that it may be submitted to the Supreme Court.

Mr. OVERMAN. Therefore anybody who wants to pass a law will say "The Supreme Court is wrong; we will put it up to the Supreme Court again," just as it is said in this case "Let them pass on it again." A man who does that is a lawbreaker.

Mr. CUMMINS. That is just as I did in the case of the income tax law and just as the Senator from North Carolina did at the same time.

Mr. OVERMAN. I do not recollect my record on that law, but—

Mr. CUMMINS. I am only speaking generally. I do not remember specifically about the vote of the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. OVERMAN. I do.

Mr. FLETCHER. May I suggest that the position of the Senator from Iowa is that a question is never settled by the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States? We never can know the proper construction of the Constitution, because we may hereafter have a chance to bring up the question, and a change of personnel on the Supreme Court may change its decision. That, of course, leaves the whole question always open, and it is never settled.

Mr. CUMMINS. No, Mr. President; that is not quite accurate, either. This matter came up the other day when we were discussing the kind of doubt that a legislator should feel in order to compel him to vote against a proposed law on the ground that it was unconstitutional. I said that there were many doubts with regard to the ultimate decision of the Supreme Court upon a given question; that I would never vote for a proposed law if I believed it to be unconstitutional, but that if I had some doubt with regard to the outcome of litigation that might arise upon the statute when it reached the Supreme Court that was not the kind of doubt that would lead me to vote against a proposed law which I believe to be constitutional.

Mr. OVERMAN. Therefore the Senator believes that there are degrees of doubt. If he has some doubts, he will vote for the measure. If he has other doubts, he will not vote for it. He is put in that position; and when I referred to the fact that a man who votes for a bill that he has doubt about, instead of resolving it in favor of the Constitution and against the law, is a criminal, he said he had heard such things, but he did not believe in them. I am going to cite from one of the greatest law writers that ever wrote, and he is borne out by the other great law writers of this country on this subject. I am going to read something that I believe ought to be read at the desk when every Senator takes an oath and subscribes to it to support the Constitution of the United States and the laws of his country.

One of the great law writers of this country—and I think the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] will agree with me—is Mr. Cooley, a great western lawyer. What does he say on this subject?

Legislators have their authority measured by the Constitution; they are chosen to do what it permits, and nothing more, and they take solemn oath to obey and support it. When they disregard its provisions they usurp authority, abuse their trust, and violate the promise they have confirmed by an oath. To pass an act when they are in doubt whether it does not violate the Constitution—

I call the Senator's attention to this—

To pass an act when they are in doubt whether it does not violate the Constitution is to treat as of no force the most imperative obligations any person can assume. A business agent who would deal in that manner with his principal's business would be treated as untrustworthy; a witness in court who would treat his oath thus lightly, and affirm things concerning which he was in doubt, would be held a criminal. Indeed, it is because the legislature has applied the judgment of its members to the question of its authority to pass the proposed law, and has only passed it after being satisfied of the authority, that the judiciary waive their own doubts and give it their support.

That is a treatise in regard to the Supreme Court and what they ought to do; and, incidentally, Judge Cooley says that any Senator who has a doubt about the constitutionality of this measure, and who votes for it, is a criminal. I say there is no Senator, layman or lawyer, who will go down to the bottom of this matter and investigate it but who will have doubts about it, as every member of the Judiciary Committee had. It is your duty to investigate it; and, having that doubt, a vote for it makes you a criminal in morals, and it is with you and your conscience what you will do.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. OVERMAN. I yield.

Mr. HEFLIN. The great Lincoln, at Cooper Union in 1860, said:

No man who has sworn to defend the Constitution can conscientiously vote for what he understands to be an unconstitutional measure, however expedient he may think it.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, you can not control the passions of men by law. There are lynchings in the South, deplorable as it is, and we all deplore it. There are lynchings in the North, in Ohio, in Indiana, in Illinois, in California. There are lynchings everywhere in the world. How are you going to control this condition? If a State can not control it, how can the Federal Government control it?

I noticed in the papers some time ago that they said of me that I was once present at a lynching. It is not true. I was not present; but I went to the jail doors, stood upon the jail steps, and pleaded as I never pleaded before for a howling mob to desist from the lynching. The men were lynched in the suburbs of the town. I was not present. All I did was to try to keep them from performing that horrible act.

A very prominent farmer had been beaten on the head with the butt end of an ax. His little boy, who slept by his side, was killed with the butt end of an ax. His poor wife was sleeping in another bed by his side with a little girl, and both of them were beaten in the head with this ax and killed. Two young girls, daughters, were asleep upstairs. The house was set on fire to burn them up. The people were aroused. They were mad, determined to lynch these men. The court was in session. I went to the judge as they gathered around the jail doors and asked the judge to go with me and stop the mob. He did, and they drove him away. The district attorney came and made them a speech. They threatened his life and ran him off. A Member of Congress was there, and they tried to kill him, and came very near killing him, but for some strange reason they heard me.

Did you ever stand before a mob, my countrymen, and look into their angry, horrible, crazy faces? If you have, you would understand it. I never want to see another scene of that sort. I pleaded with them for an hour, and they heard me; and finally the leader said, "Men, come on; let us go home and come back here to-morrow. If the court does not hang these men, we will."

I got down off the jail steps and led him away. The crowd followed. I went over to the judge and told him the lynching was over, and told a newspaper man who is here now that there would be no lynching; but in the meantime the military had been ordered out, after these men had left the jail, and it inflamed these men again. They did not fear the military. They did not fear anything. They were armed with dynamite, with axes, and with guns. They feared nobody, and this inflamed them; and they went back, tore down the jail, took these men out in the street, tried them in the street, acquitted three of them, and hung three.

Mr. President, I did not recognize one of these men, although I told them that I knew every one of them. I told the grand jury the next day that I did not recognize a man in the crowd. They were evidently from another county; and yet one section of this bill, which no man will contend is constitutional here on this floor, provides that when a lynching occurs in a county that county shall be assessed $10,000 in favor of the family of the deceased, and allows the Federal court to levy taxes upon the people to pay the amount. Does anybody say that section of the bill is constitutional? What would have been the result in my county? The innocent county that had nothing to do with the lynching would have had its taxpayers mulcted in the sum of $10,000.

Mr. President, in the Frank case Frank was taken from the penitentiary and carried through some 10 counties to the place where they lynched him. Under this bill, if the officers had failed to do their duty in the counties, you could have mulcted every county along the line, the county in which he was taken, the one in which he was hung, and the others, and assessed the people, and made them pay $10,000. Will anybody stand for such legislation as that? Have not Senators doubts in their minds as to the constitutionality of that? If they have doubts, what is their duty, as stated by every text writer upon the subject?

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question there?

Mr. OVERMAN. Certainly.

Mr. POMERENE. A moment ago the Senator made the statement that a law was clearly unconstitutional which sought to hold the county responsible in damages for a lynching.

Mr. OVERMAN. And giving the right to the Federal Court to levy the taxes.

Mr. POMERENE. That is what I wanted the Senator to make clear. Would the Senator contend that a State legislature did not have that power?

Mr. OVERMAN. I would contend that under the Constitution the legislature would have the right to levy whatever taxes they wished to levy within the Constitution's limitation, and whatever taxes they levied under the Constitution can be collected by the sheriff. But a Federal court has no right to levy taxes or to issue execution. They can issue a mandamus, but for what?

Mr. POMERENE. What I am seeking to get at is this: Does the Senator hold that a State legislature could not pass a law making the county responsible in damages?

Mr. OVERMAN. No; I take no such position as that, because my State did that very thing.

Mr. POMERENE. My State has done the same thing, and I wanted to have clearly in my own mind what the Senator's position was. Is he simply discussing this now from the standpoint of the Federal Constitution or from the standpoint of a State constitution or both?

Mr. OVERMAN. I am discussing it from the standpoint of the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. If the Senator will allow me a moment to make a suggestion, I have no doubt the position of the Senator from North Carolina is that, so far as taxes levied by the State are concerned, they must be levied by State authority.

Mr. OVERMAN. Under the Constitution of the United States?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Taxes levied by the Federal Government can only be levied by the Congress of the United States, and by no other authority.

Mr. OVERMAN. Under the Constitution; and I am discussing it from the constitutional standpoint.

Mr. CUMMINS. May I ask the Senator a question at that point?

Mr. OVERMAN. Certainly.

Mr. CUMMINS. Suppose a county maintains an unsafe bridge, and a traveler in passing over it meets his death under such circumstances as indicate want of care on the part of the county authorities. Does the Senator mean to say that the county can not be made liable for that injury?

Mr. OVERMAN. I maintain that the legislature gives to the county the right to levy such taxes as are necessary to pay the debts of the county; and the county having been sued, and a judgment having been gotten for the negligence of the county commissioners in not keeping up that bridge, of course the county can levy the taxes.

Mr. CUMMINS. Let me ask a further question, that having been answered very satisfactorily. Suppose a county issues bonds and does not pay them when they mature and a judgment is recovered against the county on account of the default of the county authorities?

Mr. OVERMAN. A mandamus can be gotten out.

Mr. CUMMINS. Can not a court compel the county to levy the taxes necessary to pay them?

Mr. OVERMAN. Yes; under the State constitution that can be done.

Mr. CUMMINS. Therefore, if one, under this act, shall recover a judgment against a county, is there any difficulty in securing the proper process to compel the county to levy taxes that will pay the judgment?

Mr. OVERMAN. Does the Senator from Iowa claim that a Federal court can levy taxes on the people?

Mr. CUMMINS. No. The court can compel the county authorities to levy the taxes, and that has been done many, many times in the case of county authorities, township authorities, and other governmental instrumentalities of lesser size than States. I do not think it has ever been determined that a Federal court can compel a State to levy taxes.

Mr. OVERMAN. I thought the Senator would agree to that. Now, I want to ask the Senator a broad, plain question. Does the Senator think this section of the bill is constitutional?

Mr. CUMMINS. I think it is constitutional. I said the other day, and I repeat now, that I am not so certain of the constitutionality of these two sections of the bill as I am of other sections; but I believe they are constitutional, because it has been the habit among civilized countries for a very, very long time to impose a liability of this character upon municipalities which fail to enforce the law.

Mr. OVERMAN. The Senator's position is very different from that which he took before the committee. Of course, he has a right to change his mind. He is a great lawyer and a good man, and I have no criticism to make of him.

Now, I want to get to the fountainhead, to go back and see where this legislation began, who fathered it, what his view of it was, and what the intention of Congress was at that time, in those distressing hours, hours of bitterness and trouble and spite and hatred.

Mr. Stevens was the author of this amendment, as well as of most of the acts intended to humiliate, to oppress, and to degrade the South. Here is what Mr. Stevens said in arguing for the fourteenth amendment:

The Constitution limits only the action of Congress and is not a limitation on the States. This amendment supplies that defect and allows Congress to correct the unjust legislation of the States so far that the law which operates upon one man shall operate equally upon all. Whatever law punishes a white man for a crime shall punish the black man precisely in the same way and to the same degree.

The law books are to the same effect, that this amendment does not enlarge the Constitution. It only tends to fetter and to hinder the States from making laws to discriminate against the colored man in favor of the white man in his property rights and in his personal rights.

Mr. CUMMINS. May I ask the Senator a question at that point, because it is very desirable to get his full understanding: Does he assert that Mr. Stevens claimed that this amendment applied only to legislation?

Mr. OVERMAN. I gather from that language he did.

Mr. CUMMINS. If he did so claim, the Supreme Court has overruled him many times.

Mr. OVERMAN. We will see about that.

Mr. CUMMINS. So far as the application of the amendment is concerned, it is conceded now, I think, by all lawyers that the amendment can be violated by executive and administrative officers as well as by the legislature of a State.

Mr. OVERMAN. The argument made by the able Senator from California, an argument as good as anybody can make, and the same argument now made by the Senator from Iowa, was made in Congress at that time, and Congress tried to do what these Senators say they can do now under the fourteenth amendment. They tried to amend the fourteenth amendment and put the language right in the amendment itself so that Congress should have this power given to it, as proposed by this bill. This was the language of the amendment introduced:

Congress shall have power to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper to secure to the citizens of each State all privileges and immunities of citizens of the several States, and to all persons in the several States equal protection of the right of life, liberty, and property.

Does the Senator catch that? Is not that what he contends in the argument he makes? I am sure he does, and he has made an able argument. But I say to the Senator from California, the Senate voted that down and declined to put any such language in the Constitution, because they did not want that power given to Congress. Then Congress passed the words which are now found in the amendment in lieu of that proposed amendment.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. OVERMAN. I yield.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I am listening with great respect and great interest to the argument of the Senator from North Carolina, and I hope he will not assume, as he goes on, that I yield assent to his position because I do not immediately interrupt him. I think it much better to remain silent until the Senator finishes; but I hope to have an opportunity to take up and respectfully make answer to some propositions which he is now stating.

Mr. OVERMAN. I understand that, Mr. President; it is always understood among Senators that that is so.

Before I get to the constitutional question again I want to state this fact: Only a few weeks ago a gentleman from Connecticut, a Northern State, and his sweet little wife and baby were traveling from Florida with a camping outfit and stopped at a little neighborhood place, and while sleeping there two brutes, negroes, went into the camp, shot the poor man, and both of them raped the woman.

Of course, the citizens were aroused that a stranger should come into their State and be treated so outrageously by these colored brutes, and more than a hundred men, prominent citizens, rose up, determined to lynch those negroes. They were aroused by the same passion I was talking about awhile ago. If a southern man, if a man from North Carolina, had gone with his dear wife and little baby and camped out in a little Connecticut town, and two brutes had come out from the bushes and shot the man down, and both of them raped the woman, I was wondering what the people of Connecticut would have done. Would they not have done just as the people of North Carolina did? Inflamed and aroused by such a horrible thing, they would have risen up, in California, in Iowa, or anywhere else where there is a red-blooded Anglo-Saxon white man living, and there would have been that same feeling of indignation and madness.

The sheriff got hold of the men before the crowd did; he jumped in a high-powered Packard machine and beat the mob to the penitentiary, some 75 miles away. Those men were not lynched but were afterwards hanged. I am just showing what men's passions are, and what will arouse them anywhere in the United States.

I saw in the papers that a little girl 13 years old, a beautiful child, was going along a country road, and a brute jerked her into the bushes, ravished her, cut her throat, and left her for dead. If a brown man in California had taken one of the little girls of that State out in the bushes and cut her throat and ravished her, I wonder what the red-blooded citizens, the brave people of California, would have done. They would have done just as the people did in the case I have cited.

So, Mr. President, I say you can not correct these things by legislation. It is in the man; it is in the human mind. The passions are such that you can not stop it. You can not stop it by a Federal court, you can not stop it by bayonets, you can not stop it in any way. What good will this bill do if it shall become a law? Let us look at that before I go on to the other question.

What is proposed to be accomplished by the measure? I asked the Senator from California [Mr. SHORTRIDGE] the other day if he could cite me to a single State in the Union that had not passed laws against lynching. He could not. Every State has done it. Why, Mr. President, in my State whenever a lynching occurs the judge and the district attorney go to the spot, and they investigate it. The judge issues bench warrants immediately and tries to find the guilty men. Could the Federal court do any more? Suppose the Federal court is given jurisdiction; the Federal court meets only once every six months. A juror is a juror whether he is in the State court or in the Federal court. The grand jury in the Federal court will have the matter under consideration some five or six months after it happens, and what will they do? They will do just like a grand jury in a State court. What would the petit jury do in the Federal court? It would do just like the petit jury in the State court.

What are you going to accomplish by this measure? Do you want to frighten our people and make them hate the Federal court? Do you want to let the colored man know that he has a license to commit these crimes? What is the purpose of it? What is your purpose? Certainly nothing can be accomplished by the Federal court that can not be accomplished by the State court. No man dares say the States have not done all in their power to stop it. No man dares say there is not as much indignation among the southern people as among the northern people. No man will state we have not done everything in every way possible to correct it. It is madness, it is lunacy, it is crazy men who do it, and it can not be corrected by giving the Federal court jurisdiction.

I want some one to tell me what the purpose of the bill is, what good it will do, what it can accomplish, what can be accomplished through the Federal court if the State court can not accomplish anything? In the lynching case about which I have spoken one of the lynchers was killed at the jail door by the sheriff and one was arrested and put in the penitentiary. What could the Federal court do more than the State court did? What can be accomplished by the bill?

We have one remarkable case that comes from Alabama, the lynching case known as the Riggins case, about which we have heard so much. I shall read from the text in that case, so we can know exactly the facts in the case. In its various branches the case has gone to the Supreme Court several times. I read:

Each of the counts alleges, in substance, that Maples, a citizen of the United States, was, at the time of his murder, lawfully confined by the sheriff of Madison County, State of Alabama, in the jail thereof, to answer the charge of murder under the laws of the State of Alabama; and that the sheriff and a detachment of the Alabama

National Guard, which he had summoned to his assistance, were endeavoring to safely keep Maples. To prevent the conspirators from hanging him, that he might have a trial according to law; and that the conspirators, in the city of Huntsville, within the jurisdiction of the court, went upon the highways and streets of the city of Huntsville on September 7, 1904, and murdered Maples by hanging him by the neck until he was dead, in order to prevent his enjoyment of the rights and privileges named in the several counts. Some of the counts allege that Maples was a negro citizen, and the conspirators who formed the conspiracy and committed the murder were white men, and that they were moved to the conspiracy and acts done in pursuance thereof, because Maples was a negro, with the intention, on that account, to deprive him of the rights, privileges, and immunities specified in the counts. All the counts allege that the conspiracy and acts done in furtherance of it were "to injure, oppress, threaten, and intimidate" Maples in the enjoyment of a right, privilege, or immunity "secured to him by the Constitution and laws of the United States," specified, respectively, in the counts as follows: (1) The right, privilege, and immunity secured to him under the Constitution and laws of the State of Alabama to be tried by due process of law, and acquitted, if innocent, and punished, if found guilty, in the courts of the State of Alabama. (2) The right, privilege, and immunity to have the State of Alabama, acting by and through its officers, to afford him a trial by due process of law, and to be held harmless if innocent, and to be punished if guilty, only after trial in the courts, upon accusation of crime preferred against him, when he was in the custody of the officers of the law of the State of Alabama (134 Federal Reporter, 404, 405).

Without reading further, I want to say that before the bill is enacted into law I shall be prepared to read a good deal from the law books. I may not have the vigor and the intellect of my friend from Utah [Mr. Smoot]. I do not think I shall try to speak all night as he did in as remarkable a performance as I ever saw in this Chamber. He did not read a word, and the most remarkable thing about it was that he stuck to his subject. It was the most remarkable performance I ever knew of, a man speaking from sundown until dawn without reading from a book or anything else, and all the time sticking to his subject. It was the greatest performance I ever saw in my life. He was filibustering. He admits it. He was speaking against time. He admits it. He will not criticize us for this filibuster, I know. He has not done it and he will not do it.

But I want good men like the Senator from Utah, in the face of what Judge Cooley and other writers say, to remember the time when he took his oath here in the Senate. He believed in the sacredness of that oath, and I know it. I shall be very much surprised if the Senator from Utah votes for the bill. I do not believe he will do it. Other Senators will not do it when they learn what the Supreme Court has said upon this great question.

In the case to which I have referred not only the sheriff but the military was called. The military could not stop it. The sheriff could not stop it. Neither could they have stopped it if the Federal court had had jurisdiction and been there. That brings me back to my question. What will the Federal court do about it? Does anyone suppose, if they go on lynching where the district attorney is present, that our people will stop because the Federal court may have jurisdiction in the matter? The Federal court can call out the military, and an army may be sent down there as was done in 1868 and 1869. But who was sent down there? Most of them were western soldiers, kindly, patriotic men, who carried the bayonet down there, but they sympathized with our people, and those laws could not be enforced with the army that was sent down there, because the army sympathized with us. That is one reason why we repealed all such provisions of the law.

There was another branch of this very remarkable lynching case brought before the Supreme Court in which the question of the fourteenth amendment arose, and the Supreme Court discharged the men because they had no jurisdiction. Then came another one of the lynchings whose name was Powers. Judge Jones, of Alabama, a very great judge and a very great lawyer, concluded that the men were within both the amendments. He made the same argument that is made here by the Senator from California, and the very same argument that will be made here by other Senators, because he laid down their side of the case. He did not decide the case against the State. However, he gave his views, and he made the argument hoping that he would get the Supreme Court to reverse his decision. He said in his opinion that he was bound by the question decided in the Hodges case, and therefore he decided against the Government, but at the same time argued the question very ably, as ably as anybody could do, on the side proposed by the Senator from California and others. But what did the Supreme Court do? The district attorney appealed the case from the Federal court in the State of Alabama to the Supreme Court of the United States. In making up the appeal the district attorney included in the papers sent to the Supreme Court the argument made by Judge Jones. He set out in full the great argument made by Judge Jones on this question. The case came to the Supreme Court, and what did the Supreme Court do? Why, Mr. President, they treated it absolutely with contempt, as I shall show. When the case came up on appeal from Judge Jones's decision, the defendant did not have a representative in court; nobody representing him at all. The Attorney General appeared for the Government and Assistant Attorney General Fowler also appeared for the Government. There were no briefs filed for the defendant at all.

What did the Supreme Court do? Strange to say, after hearing the Attorney General, after hearing Assistant Attorney General Fowler, after reading Judge Jones's decision in the case, they merely said:

Judgment is affirmed on the authority of Hodges v. United States (203 U. S.).

The Supreme Court did not even consider the matter because they had already decided the question in the Hodges case.

Now, the Attorney General and the Assistant Attorney General came up with this great opinion rendered in the case by the trial judge, the defendants were not even represented, and yet the Supreme Court per curiam gave the decision instead of writing an opinion. Then came the Hodges case, in which the opinion was delivered by Mr. Justice Brewer, one of the greatest judges that ever sat on that bench. It would take some time to read the entire opinion, but Justice Brewer went into the question fully as to both the thirteenth and fourteenth amendments. Justice Brewer said:

That prior to the three post bellum amendments to the Constitution the National Government had no jurisdiction over a wrong like that charged in this indictment is conceded; that the fourteenth and fifteenth amendments do not justify the legislation is also beyond dispute, for they, as repeatedly held, are restrictions upon State action, and no action on the part of the State is complained of. Unless, therefore, the thirteenth amendment vests in the Nation the jurisdiction claimed the remedy must be sought through State action and in State tribunals subject to the supervision of this court by writ of error in proper cases.

In the Slaughterhouse cases (16 Wall. 36, 76), in defining the privileges and immunities of citizens of the several States, this is quoted from the opinion of Mr. Justice Washington in Corfield v. Coryell (4 Wash. Cir. Ct. 371, 380):

"The inquiry," he says, "is what are the privileges and immunities of citizens of the several States? We feel no hesitation in confining these expressions to those privileges and immunities which are, in their nature, fundamental; which belong, of right, to the citizens of all free governments; and which have at all times been enjoyed by citizens of the several States which compose this Union from the time of their becoming free, independent, and sovereign. What these fundamental principles are it would be more tedious than difficult to enumerate. They may, however, be all comprehended under the following general heads: Protection by the Government, the enjoyment of life and liberty, with the right to acquire and possess property of every kind, and to pursue and obtain happiness and safety; subject, nevertheless, to such restraints as the Government may prescribe for the general good of the whole."

And after referring to other cases this court added (p. 77): "It would be the vainest show of learning to attempt to prove by citations of authority that up to the adoption of the recent amendments no claim or pretense was set up that those rights depended on the Federal Government for their existence or protection beyond the very few express limitations which the Federal Constitution imposed upon the States, such, for instance, as the prohibition against ex post facto laws, bills of attainder, and laws impairing the obligation of contracts. But with the exception of these and a few other restrictions the entire domain of the privileges and immunities of citizens of the States as above defined lay within the constitutional and legislative power of the States and without that of the Federal Government."

Notwithstanding the adoption of these three amendments, the National Government still remains one of enumerated powers, and the tenth amendment, which reads, "The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States, respectively, or to the people," is not shorn of its vitality. (203 U. S. Repts. 1-14.)

In passing, I desire here to say that I am proud of my State of North Carolina. That State did not go into the Union at the same time that the other States did. George Washington was elected President, but North Carolina was not in the Union. Why? Because the people of North Carolina were jealous of their rights—local self-government—and of the rights of her people. They did not go into the Union until the 10 amendments had been adopted to the Federal Constitution. It was not until November 21, 1789, that North Carolina ratified the Constitution. The tenth amendment to the Constitution provides:

The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States, respectively, or to the people.

Our claim is that there has been no delegation of power in the Constitution to the General Government to justify the passage of such a bill as this. No such power has been given to the General Government. My argument has been made to prove that. At the time of the adoption of the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution, when an amendment was offered to it in this body proposing to grant to the General Government the power contemplated by the pending bill, it was opposed even by Thad Stevens, and Congress voted it down; Congress would not even consider it. That action ought to be conclusive so far as the pending bill is concerned.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. STERLING in the chair). Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. OVERMAN. I yield.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I am assuming that the Senator from North Carolina has not forgotten that his State—in which State, by the by, my grandfather was born—

Mr. OVERMAN. That is why the Senator from California has such good blood in his veins.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. That North Carolina, which now, speaking through its great Senator, takes its stand behind the fourteenth amendment, rejected the fourteenth amendment with scorn and defiance when it was first proposed, and that it cast in its legislature but 11 votes in favor of the ratification of the amendment.

Mr. OVERMAN. I recollect that Indiana and New York and Ohio all rejected that amendment. The fact is that Francis P. Blair stood upon the floor of the Senate and stated that the fourteenth amendment was adopted by fraud and by force; by force used on the Southern States, because those States were then in the hands of the Union Army; and by fraud, because as to other States, after the amendment had been adopted by the legislatures which were then in existence, legislatures which met shortly afterwards repudiated what the previous legislatures had done and took contrary action; but the Supreme Court held that the amendment having already been adopted by those States such action could not be rescinded.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. If the Senator will pardon me, the point I am making—if it be a point—is that the State of North Carolina, which has been very jealous of the liberties of its people, and rightly so, in point of historic truth, at first refused to ratify the fourteenth amendment, though that State later ratified the amendment and by means that I purpose to explain.

Mr. OVERMAN. The Senator from California states the history of the matter correctly; but I wish to say to him that other States of the North and of the West took the same action as did North Carolina but tried subsequently to repudiate it. Indiana, for example, did so. The Senator from California knows the history of those times. Subsequent legislatures passed acts stating that the action by preceding legislatures was not expressive of the wishes of the States, and that they would rescind such action; but the Supreme Court decided that such action once taken and the amendment once adopted could not be repudiated.

So far as this matter is concerned, I repeat, North Carolina was the last State to go into the Union.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. If the Senator will pardon me, I did not wish to single out North Carolina and to put any stigma on her; I did not mean it in that sense; but it might be well here for the record to cite the action of certain Southern States, because it has a bearing, I think, ultimately upon the fourteenth amendment, what the fourteenth amendment was, what it attempted to accomplish, and what it did accomplish; namely, the fourteenth amendment historically and legally made citizens out of the negroes of America. In the legislatures of Louisiana, Mississippi, and Florida the fourteenth amendment did not receive a single vote; in South Carolina it received only 1 vote; in Virginia only 1 vote; in Texas it received only 5 votes; in Arkansas it received but 2 votes; in Alabama it received 10 votes; in North Carolina it received 11 votes; and in Georgia it received only 2 votes. That is the record.

Mr. OVERMAN. The Senator from California reads the record, and I have no doubt about it; I do not dispute the record. I am glad the Senator has quoted it. The Senator is familiar with the conditions prevailing in those days; but I am here to say to the Senator—and he knows it—that many people believe that the fourteenth amendment was never legally adopted by anything like three-fourths of the States.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. But, of course, the true theory was, as held, that the Southern States had never succeeded in getting out of the Union, and, therefore, it was necessary to count them in getting three-fourths of the States in order to ratify the amendment.

Mr. OVERMAN. The Supreme Court held that those States were always in the Union.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Certainly, and therefore that they had to be consulted in the matter of ratifying the fourteenth amendment.

Mr. OVERMAN. Yes.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. But when that amendment was first proposed, what I have read was the record of the then existing legislatures of those several States.

Mr. OVERMAN. I again state that Francis P. Blair, of Missouri, standing right where I am now standing, charged upon the floor of this body that the fourteenth amendment was adopted by fraud and force; force which was exercised by the General Government against the Southern States, because those States had just emerged from the war and were under the control of the Union Army; fraud, because such States as Indiana, and, I think, also Ohio and New York, had rushed the adoption of the fourteenth amendment through the then existing legislatures, although the people had held an election and elected new legislatures upon that question, and notwithstanding the amendment had been adopted by the preceding legislatures, the new legislatures when they met repudiated the action of their predecessors and refused to adopt the amendment. As I stated a moment ago, however, the Supreme Court set aside the action of the subsequent legislatures and stated that they could not repudiate an amendment after it had once been ratified. That is the history of the ratification of that amendment. But, Mr. President, this is far afield from the line of discussion I intended to pursue. I merely mention it in passing to show what North Carolina did when the Constitution was adopted and the attitude she took as to the reserved powers of the States.

I wish also in passing to refer to the fact that North Carolina was the last State to go out of the Union. When the question of secession was first submitted to her legislature in February she voted against it, and it was not until Abraham Lincoln, who put in his Cabinet a North Carolinian, John A. Gilmer, called for 75,000 troops to fight her southern neighbors that North Carolina went out of the Union; but after she had seceded in the war which followed she lost 40 per cent of her population. At that time there were in the State only 112,000 voters, but North Carolina furnished 126,000 brave soldiers to fight for southern rights.

Mr. President, I am reminded here of what the late Senator Foraker, of Ohio, told me sitting in this Chamber. He said while he was coming through North Carolina with Sherman's army, which had been burning the houses of citizens in South Carolina, a great many men came out from time to time, claimed that they were Union men, and asked protection. Mr. Foraker went on to say that he saw standing in front of his country home an old man who looked to be about 80 years old. General Slocum, on whose staff Mr. Foraker was serving, said "Foraker, yonder is another one of those 'Union' men. I will ride up and see." He rode up and said, "My friend, you were a secessionist, were you not?" The old man replied, "No; I was not a secessionist; I thought our troubles ought to have been settled without war, and I voted against secession." Then he was asked, "You are a Union man?" Mr. Foraker said the old man seemed to rise up 2 feet; fire came into his eyes, and he said, "Union man; no, sir; when my State went out of the Union I went with her; two of my boys to-day are fighting in her behalf, and I honor them and stand by them. I am a damned rebel; that is what I am—a damned rebel."

Slocum said, "Foraker, put a guard over that man's property; protect it; he is a brave man and he is telling the truth." That old man, who was of Scotch descent, told the truth about his position. He was against the war, but when his State went out of the Union he believed his first duty was to his State, as did other citizens of the South and as they were taught under the Constitution, and so he went with her.

That is also very far afield from the question which the Senator from California and I were discussing, but I am proud of my State and I thought I would relate here upon the floor a little history that is not known.

Mr. President, I desire to refer again to the Hodges case. I have not much time and I do not wish to interfere with the ceremonies which are to take place a little later.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. From what volume is the Senator reading?

Mr. OVERMAN. I am reading from the Hodges case.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I am familiar with the case, but from what volume is the Senator reading?

Mr. OVERMAN. The case is found in 203 Supreme Court Reports, and I have been reading from pages 16, 17, and so forth. I read further from that case:

One thing more: At the close of the Civil War, when the problem of the emancipated slaves was before the Nation, it might have left them in a condition of alienage, or established them as wards of the Government like the Indian tribes, and thus retained for the Nation jurisdiction over them, or it might, as it did, give them citizenship. It chose the latter. By the fourteenth amendment it made citizens of all born within the limits of the United States and subject to its jurisdiction. By the fifteenth it prohibited any State from denying the right of suffrage on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude, and by the thirteenth it forbade slavery or involuntary servitude anywhere within the limits of the land. Whether this was or was not the wiser way to deal with the great problem is not a matter for the courts to consider.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, did the Senator say that he was reading from the case reported in Two hundred and third United States, at page 1?

Mr. OVERMAN. I am reading from page 20.

Mr. FLETCHER. The decision begins on page 1, I think.

Mr. OVERMAN. Yes. I continue the quotation:

It is for us to accept the decision, which declined to constitute them wards of the Nation or leave them in a condition of alienage where they would be subject to the jurisdiction of Congress, but gave them citizenship, doubtless believing that thereby in the long run their best interests would be subserved, they taking their chances with other citizens in the States where they should make their homes.

That, Mr. President, was not the point which I wish to bring out. However, the court in this case stated that the fourteenth amendment did not fetter or hinder in any way the States or deprive them of their police powers; that it did not enlarge the Constitution but was a prohibition upon the States passing discriminatory laws in favor of the white man and against the black man. That is what Mr. Stevens said. That is what Congress said at the time—that they had no intention of depriving the State of any of its rights or police powers or of giving Congress the right to legislate in favor of one class and against another.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator to inquire whether he has referred to the case of United States v. Harris (106 U. S. 629)? That seems to be directly in point on this question.

Mr. OVERMAN. Yes; I have that case before me now. That was another lynching case, as I recollect. It came up from Tennessee. That was a case in which the court especially referred to the fourteenth amendment in this language:

The purpose and effect of the two sections of the fourteenth amendment above quoted were clearly defined by Mr. Justice Bradley in the case of United States v. Cruikshank (1 Woods, 308), as follows: "It is a guaranty of protection against the acts of the State government itself. It is a guaranty against the exertion of arbitrary and tyrannical power on the part of the government and legislature of the State, not a guaranty against the commission of individual offenses."

The court decides that the fourteenth amendment does not have anything to do with individuals; it deals only with the State itself and is a prohibition against the State exercising its discriminatory powers against the colored man in favor of the white man—

"and the power of Congress, whether express or implied, to legislate for the enforcement of such a guaranty does not extend"—

Listen—

"does not extend to the passage of laws for the suppression of crime within the States."

I will say to the Senator from California that the Supreme Court in this case exactly carries out what appears in the record of Congress, that this does not extend in any way to the right to give Congress the power to legislate against individuals.

"And the power of Congress, whether express or implied, to legislate for the enforcement of such a guaranty does not extend to the passage of laws for the suppression of crime within the States. The enforcement of the guaranty does not require or authorize Congress to perform the duty that the guaranty itself supposes it to be the duty of the State to perform and which it requires the State to perform."

Every State thinks it is its duty to protect the individual citizen, whether he be white or black, brown or yellow. It gives them all the same protection.

The Senator from California answered this question to me the other day. He said his argument is all based upon the fact that the States have not done their duty in protecting the colored race. It is all based upon that. Therefore he is assuming a fact. It is not right to assume a fact.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. No, Mr. President, with the Senator's permission; that is not my position. I forget color entirely in this argument. My position was and is that it is where and only where the State either affirmatively or negatively by non-action has deprived any man, white or black, native or naturalized, of his rights to life or to liberty or to property, or has affirmatively or negatively by indifference, neglect, or failure to enforce law denied to him the equal protection of the laws, then it is that the Nation may step in, and should step in, and protect him by punishing those who have violated his constitutional rights. That is my position.

Mr. OVERMAN. I am glad the Senator has made that statement, because I did not make it as clearly as he has.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. That is, and always has been, my position.

Mr. OVERMAN. Therefore, in making that argument the Senator is bound to assume that some State, by action or non-action, has failed in its duty to protect one citizen against another.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. It is conceivable that the State might enact laws as against certain offenses, calling them crimes, and then fail to execute the laws; or, as in the case of California, where the municipality of San Francisco passed a certain laundry ordinance, upon the face of that ordinance it was equal and fair and applicable to all, but, as the Supreme Court of the United States said, looking through form to substance, it was seen that the ordinance was designed to operate against one class only, and was not made applicable to all, wherefore the Supreme Court of the United States held the ordinance void.

Mr. OVERMAN. Can the Senator show me or point me to a single act of a single Southern State or any other State that has passed or failed to pass any act whereby its citizens, white or black, brown or yellow, were deprived of protection by action or nonaction? Can he show me anything of that sort? If so, then his argument is good, though not from a constitutional standpoint; it is bad so far as the Constitution is concerned; but the Senator's argument must be based upon an admitted fact or a proved fact.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Certainly.

Mr. OVERMAN. Now, the Senator admitting that, I want him to show me and to tell me, if he can, where any State, by action or nonaction, has deprived any citizen of his right to life, liberty, or property?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I will endeavor to do so; but may I throw out this idea right here: I do not look upon the Federal Government as an alien thing, as a foreign force. I look upon the Federal Government as being as friendly toward me, as friendly toward my State and yours, as the State government. I do not regard legislation of this kind as hostile, or in design hostile, to a given State or to the people of a given State. I have said, and have repeated, that so far as I am concerned I look upon legislation of this character as in aid of, in cooperation with, the good people of each and every State; and I personally feel in a sense grieved that Senators appear to look upon legislation of this kind as hostile to a given State; wherefore they invoke the powers of the States, and discuss the police power and the reserved rights of the States and the limited delegated powers of the Federal Government.

I grant that the Constitution of the United States is a delegation of power; I grant that the State constitutions are reservations of power; but what I think, and what I trust some day we will all agree upon, is this: That we have one country, made up of 48 States, and that whether Congress, here sitting, is speaking for the Nation, or a legislature in North Carolina is speaking, both are speaking for the benefit not of the State as such, as an entity, but for all the people of Nation and State.

When the Senator argues that this proposed legislation would be abortive, that it would accomplish no good, that it could not be enforced, and that, if enforced, it would cause more harm than good, I listen with the utmost attention.

Mr. OVERMAN. I am satisfied the Senator would.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I would, because my purpose, speaking for myself, is to help not only the individual who might be assailed or deprived of life or liberty without due process of law, but to help the people of the States; for I can not believe that any State or the representative of any State approves of lynching. We must stand as adamant against that monstrous proposition, or else we have reverted to barbarism, and we invite the overturning of our courts and our laws, our very civilization. We must all stand up for the law and the institutions of our country.

Mr. OVERMAN. We all agree with the Senator in that respect; but the trouble about the Senator is that he does not understand this question, probably, and he knows, if he has heard what is going on in these corridors, that this legislation was really promoted by and the propaganda was for the Negro race in the South. That is understood. It was to hold the negro vote in the next election.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. That does not operate with me.

Mr. OVERMAN. I know it does not.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. It does not.

Mr. OVERMAN. I know. I say I do not agree with the Senator's position, but the Senator knows that, too.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. No; I do not.

Mr. OVERMAN. At least, the Senator has heard that.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I do not admit that to be true. If an evil exists in my State, I would have it cured.

Mr. OVERMAN. North Carolinians and Californians all love their Government, and want to stand by the Government, and want to treat everybody alike, and that is all we are asking—that California stand by us. Why, I remember that the California Senators, when they had their great social question to deal with in their own State, stood by the South, if you may call it such, in their great problem, and helped us out; and although I admit that the Senator is a patriotic, brave man, a great speaker, eloquent and able, I was a little bit surprised when the Senator from California did not follow the lead of his great predecessors here when they sympathized with us and took part with us. They would have been here aiding in defeating the force bill, aiding in defeating this bill, because they believed, as the Senator does, that we are all one great people, loving the Union and wanting to do right by every man and every citizen, white and black, and to see that they all have the same rights and privileges in their person, in their property, and in their liberty.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, may I suggest to the Senator from California this thought further than what the Senator from North Carolina has said: The Senator from California bases the theory of this bill upon the proposition that the States have failed or neglected to enforce their laws, and therefore the Federal Government must come in to help them out in that situation. Now, for what purpose? What is the ultimate aim and object of the bill? It is to prevent the commission of certain crimes within the States; namely, the crime of lynching. That is the purpose of the bill, and that is the object of it. In the decision which the Senator from North Carolina has just read—United States against Harris—the Supreme Court lays down the proposition broadly, and holds clearly and expressly that the fourteenth amendment does not give to Congress the authority or the power or the right to legislate with respect to the commission of crimes in the States. That is the ultimate principle we reach; and the Supreme Court has decided definitely and clearly in that case that Congress has no power to pass legislation for the purpose of suppressing crime within the States. That is a State function, and that is one of the reserved rights of the States.

Mr. OVERMAN. Before the Senator from California begins his answer, may I say—

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Yes; it would take me too long to answer that question in a word. I hope to analyze the Harris case later on.

Mr. OVERMAN. Let me say that I asked the Senator a question, and he has not answered it. He spoke for 10 minutes and very ably, but he did not answer it.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I did not? I beg the Senator's pardon. What was the question?

Mr. OVERMAN. I want to know if any State in the South, in the North, in the East, or in the West has failed in any of its duties to its citizens by action or by nonaction?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I think I can answer that, and I shall answer it, though I shall be very sorry to lay upon the record here the facts in respect to the enforcement of the laws against lynching in the several States. I will be sorry to do it.

Mr. OVERMAN. I do not blame the Senator. Let him do it.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Because I am a friend of the States.

Mr. OVERMAN. The Senator does not understand my question. Suppose there have been many lynchings, as there have been, as we all know, thousands of them—

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. There have been.

Mr. OVERMAN. I want to know, notwithstanding that fact, if it is a fact, if any State in this Union, South, North, East, or West, has ever by nonaction or by action deprived any man, black or white, of his rights as a citizen, in his person, his property, or his liberty?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I think so, in hundreds and thousands of cases; and when I say that, I wish to be understood as saying and meaning, I think there have been monstrous crimes committed, which we will call lynchings, and that there has been no punishment of those guilty of those crimes. Answering the Senator's question directly, I have said, and I repeat, that even though the laws of a given State may denounce lynching, the State laws have not been enforced, and the men guilty have not been punished, and there have not been that diligence, that apprehension, that pursuit, that prosecution, that conviction, that punishment which ought to have occurred.

Mr. OVERMAN. I do not think the Senator can show that.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I think I can show it.

Mr. OVERMAN. The Senator can show in his own State and every State of this Union, in Illinois, in Indiana—

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Truly, it is not confined to one State.

Mr. OVERMAN. In fact, speaking of some of these States, Indiana and Illinois, when a mad mob is aroused—and they do get mad and you can not control them—there is this difference between the man of the North and the man of the South—

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. We are of one blood, cavalier and Puritan. We are not so different.

Mr. OVERMAN. We in the South like the colored man. When a brutal crime is committed by a colored man, we try him, or may lynch him. In some Northern States they do not lynch the man who commits the crime; they kill every man they see who has a black skin.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President—
The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. New in the chair). Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. OVERMAN. I yield.

ORDER FOR RECESS.

Mr. CURTIS. If the Senator will yield, I would like to submit a unanimous-consent agreement before I ask for a quorum in order that we may attend the funeral services in the House. I ask unanimous consent that when the Senate adjourns today it adjourn to meet at 10 o'clock Monday morning next.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. With the understanding that when we return from the funeral services the Senator will ask for a recess immediately, I do not object.

Mr. CURTIS. I said an adjournment, but we could take a recess and probably save time.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. With the Journal of yesterday's proceedings pending, I have no objection to taking a recess when we come back from the Hall of the House.

Mr. CURTIS. Then, when we return from the House, it is understood that there will be a recess taken until 10 o'clock Monday morning. I ask that by unanimous consent that order be made.

Mr. OVERMAN. I would like to finish my argument, because I have a great many authorities here to show that the Dyer bill is unconstitutional and is a flagrant invasion of the Constitution; but, of course, I yield for the unanimous-consent agreement and the further proceedings, hoping that at some future time I may have an opportunity to conclude my argument.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kansas asks unanimous consent that when the Senate concludes its business today, it take a recess until 10 o'clock Monday morning. In the absence of objection, it is so ordered.

CALL OF THE ROLL.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The reading clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

FUNERAL OF REPRESENTATIVE JAMES R. MANN.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I move that the Senate take a recess to fulfill its acceptance of the invitation of the House to be present at the funeral of Representative MANN.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate stands in recess, in accordance with the motion just carried, to attend the funeral of the late Representative MANN.

The Senate, preceded by the Sergeant at Arms, the Vice President, and the Secretary, proceeded to the Hall of the House of Representatives.

The Senate returned to its Chamber at 2 o'clock and 45 minutes p. m., and the Vice President resumed the chair.

RECESS.

Mr. LODGE. I move that the Senate take a recess, as heretofore ordered, until 10 o'clock on Monday next.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate (at 2 o'clock and 45 minutes p. m.) took a recess, the recess being, under the order previously made, until Monday, December 4, 1922, at 10 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, December 2, 1922.

The House met at 1 o'clock and 30 minutes p. m.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Blessed Lord, Thou art infinite in wisdom and in love and far too wonderful for human understanding; yet there are none so wounded but can be cured by Thy touch. Thou dost heal the broken heart and bind up with many balm the toiling hands of mortals. In our disappointments, in our sorrows, and through our tears may we behold the cross on which is the heart-break of the world's Savior and the Father's message to the children of men. O be with all weary feet and with the travelers of the night and keep them until they reach the hilltop of eternity's morning. Through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Craven, its Chief Clerk, announced that the Senate had passed the following resolution:

RECESS.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the House stand in recess subject to the call of the Chair.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wyoming asks unanimous consent that the House stand in recess subject to the call of the Chair. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Accordingly (at 1 o'clock and 34 minutes p. m.) the House stood in recess.

FUNERAL OF THE LATE REPRESENTATIVE JAMES R. MANN.

At 2 o'clock p. m. the Vice President and Members of the Senate entered the Chamber and occupied the seats assigned to them, the Vice President occupying a seat at the Speaker's desk.

Then came members of the diplomatic corps, the Chief Justice and Justices of the Supreme Court, representatives from the Army and the Navy, and the President of the United States with members of his Cabinet.

The body of the late Mr. MANN lay in state in the space in front of the Clerk's desk.

Rev. James E. Freeman, D. D., rector of the Church of the Epiphany, Washington, D. C., read the burial office, also from the First Epistle of Paul to the Corinthians, beginning with the twentieth verse.

The male quartet of the Church of the Epiphany sang the hymn, "Hark, Hark My Soul."

Rev. James E. Freeman, D. D., then delivered the following address:

"Seest thou a man diligent in business? He shall stand before kings."

Thus spake the maker of proverbs in a time remote. To-day we find striking application of it in the life service of JAMES R. MANN. In the large concerns of the State it may be said of him that he was diligent in business. It was this sterling quality that rendered him a kingly man and fit to stand unabashed and unashamed before rulers. Of him it may be truly said:

His life was gentle, and the elements
So mixed in him that Nature might stand up
And say to all the world: This was a man.

It is not our part to deliver in this solemn hour any extended or adequate tribute to this great citizen. Other and worthier lips will express in this place the love and esteem in which our honored friend was held. Ours is the humbler but no less grateful task of speaking here a word that shall express the love and affection in which our friend was held by a grateful Republic. We will not let him, silent though he be at death, depart from these halls in which he was wont to play his large and important rôle without a word of high and deserved praise. For over a quarter of a century, covering the most intense and critical period in human history, JAMES R. MANN has occupied a place of useful and commanding influence in the Congress of the United States. No man will gainsay the statement that his career has been characterized by fidelity and devotion to the high aims and purposes of the country he loved, that entitle him to the favor and praise of all honest and fair-minded men. In the loftiest sense in which we may use the words, he was a true-hearted, untiring, sensitively conscientious public servant. Too frequently in the life of such men do we fail to recognize their sterling worth until death robs us of their helpful and inspiring leadership. Fitting indeed is it that in this House that witnessed to the best service of his life we should gather to-day as his friends and loyal countrymen to lay upon his casket the well-earned laurel that rightfully belongs to men of his excellent qualities. Critical as the Republic may sometimes be of those in places of public trust, we have not lost out of our national consciousness the sense of chivalry and the affectionate esteem which rightfully belong to those who give the best they have for the public good. In a time that is characterized by a too extreme and all too frequently a too ungenerous estimate of those who serve in public places, it seems proper and fitting that here in this presence to-day we should take note of those outstanding qualities and characteristics that lent to the career of this man peculiar distinction and power. I asked one of his intimate friends and colleagues yesterday what in his judgment were the supreme gifts that marked the public service of JAMES R. MANN. With serious and due reflection he answered, "Thoroughness, courage, honesty."

To our mind he named the three most essential qualities of true greatness. Men may and will differ in the heat of debate concerning policies and their interpretation, but wherever men come together, the world over, they honor those who from deep conviction play the great game of life with thoroughness, courage, and fidelity. Recognize as we will our party shibboleths and loyalties, we are compelled to pay homage to those whose lives are marked by these unchallenged gifts and graces. The world has not changed its standard of judging the worth of high-minded men, and we still hold to the old, if homely, dictum—

An honest man's the noblest work of God.

There is no place in which men may so highly exemplify their selfless devotion to great ideals as in the public service. Here, indeed, is a forum that tests the best and ultimately discloses the true and enduring qualities of character. Ours is not an age that weighs lightly the finer and nobler virtues of men. Indeed, it may with truth be said that to-day, as never before, character is the foundation of all that makes for efficient and acceptable service, and the inspiration of all that contributes to enduring greatness. Thoroughness is indispensable to any form of human service, but where that service has to do with the large concerns of the State it takes on a finer significance and importance. Here our friend excelled; here he disclosed a devotion that is rare in a world of swiftly moving currents. Punctilious and faithful in small details, he was a worthy master in the field of action where opinions are fashioned into laws.

To thoroughness he added courage—a courage that was unafraid when once the testing time came. For him there was but one open way, cost what it might to follow it; it was the open way of fidelity to a trust that he held as the representative of the people. Loyally following the dictates of his conscience, he stood before men as a chivalrous knight, fearless in attack and bold in defense. Courage with him was born of conviction. The weapons he used were employed not to gain selfish advantage but to maintain what he conceived to be a just and worthy cause. "His strength was as the strength of ten, because his heart was pure." The world loves to pay its meed of praise to the man who dares to stand firm and inflexible for what he believes is the right. It gives scant praise to him whose boisterous ways veil motives that will not bear the light of open day.

Courage that rises above self-interest and that reckons not of sacrifice is as a diadem upon the brow of him who worthily wears it. But to courage he added honesty. Thoroughness and courage acquire greater force and power when consecrated to honesty of purpose. JAMES R. MANN sought to stand before his fellows with a character unimpeached and unimpeachable. He would not, even for political advantage, shadow a record by word or act that was questionable or unworthy of the dignity of his esteemed office.

Thus it is we stand to-day with reverence and affection to pay our poor and imperfect tribute to a noble son of the Republic. Fitly we apply to him the ancient words of the proverb writer:

Seest thou a man diligent in business? He shall stand before kings.

Worthily he lived, worthily he served; we honor him for what he was and for what he did. Shall we not believe that to him, as to the great laureate of England, these lines summed up his triumphant hope and unfailing faith:

Sunset and evening star,
And one clear call for me!
And may there be no moaning of the bar
When I put out to sea,
But such a tide as moving seems asleep,
Too full for sound and foam,
When that which drew from out the boundless deep
Turns again home.
Twilight and evening bell,
And after that the dark!
And may there be no sadness of farewell,
When I embark;
For tho' from out our bourne of Time and Place
The flood may bear me far,
I hope to see my Pilot face to face
When I have crossed the bar.

Faithful and chivalrous servant of the Republic, hail and farewell!

The quartet then sang the hymn "Jerusalem the Golden," and the Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., pronounced the following benediction:

Almighty God, our heavenly Father, we lift our eyes unto the hills from whence cometh our strength; our help cometh from the Lord. As Thy children regard us with divine mercy, Thou wilt surely hear us when we call and answer us when we pray. Look with great favor upon our Republic and more and more bring up citizens such as he to stabilize the great fundamentals of our Nation upon which it rests for its glory and for its perpetuity. Regard our citizenship with great favor.

We pray for the stricken fireside. O angel of peace, angel of love, dwell there in the measure of a rich blessing. Again we tarry here to pay our tributes of love and respect to him who has left us. Make his memory to remain as a great and beautiful affection in all our breasts. Everything passes!

At the last, O Lord, when earth's door closes, may heaven's door open and bear us up the stairway to our Father's house, and we shall go out no more forever. Through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The President of the United States with members of his Cabinet, the Chief Justice and the Justices of the Supreme Court, the representatives of the Army and the Navy, members of the diplomatic corps, and the Vice President and Members of the Senate retired from the Chamber.

MANN, of Illinois.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Fifty-eight Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE.

Mr. LODGE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Pending the motion, will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I understand from what I have seen in the newspapers that the majority party in this Chamber have concluded to let the so-called Dyer bill go over, and if that is the understanding of the action intended by the majority party, I do not desire to make any further motion that will interfere with business. I ask the Senator from Massachusetts if that is the case?

Mr. LODGE. I stated to the newspapers that the Republican conference instructed me to say that they would not press the bill further at the coming session or at the session which is just expiring.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. That is, between now and the 4th of March?

Mr. LODGE. Between now and the 4th of March. Those were the instructions given to me and which I gave to the press.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I wish to say that I am very glad indeed we have reached that understanding. There was no desire on my part, or on the part of those of my colleagues with whom I was acting, that we should delay the public business, but the bill is so clearly in contravention of what we regarded as a great constitutional right that we felt we were justified in going to extremes in trying to prevent its passage.

We have no apologies to offer for our fight, and we have nothing to take back in reference to what we have done. On the other hand, should the bill again appear with an effort to take it up in the Senate, we would renew the fight we have made before. Of course I do not think a fight of this kind could be justified except as a very extreme measure against a matter which we consider an invasion of a public right. I am only too glad to know that we can come to an understanding and that it will not interfere with the transaction of the public business.

Mr. LODGE. In common with the great body of my colleagues on this side of the Chamber, I believe the bill is right in principle and ought to pass; but the question before the conference was simply whether we should allow the filibuster to go on until the 4th of March with no result. The bill could not pass, as it would be impossible to change the rules now; and the conference decided that they would not press the bill further, as I stated in the public press, at the session which is now expiring or the next session.

Now, Mr. President, I submit the motion that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, before the motion is put will the Senator permit me to suggest that the shipping bill has not been referred to the Committee on Commerce, and it can not be printed until that is done? Would there be objection to having the bill referred now, so that it may be printed?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do not think there would be any objection on our part, but if we are going to transact any legislative business by unanimous consent we had better approve the Journal.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I hope we may have the bill referred before the executive session.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I have no objection to the approval of the Journal. That can be done by unanimous consent.

Mr. LODGE. I have made the motion to proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Suppose we go into executive session and continue there until 12 o'clock, the shipping bill would not be referred to the committee. I merely ask unanimous consent that it may be referred to the Commerce Committee.

Mr. FLETCHER. The only purpose is to get the bill printed, so that we may know what it is.

THE JOURNAL.

Mr. LODGE. I ask unanimous consent that the Journal of the proceedings of Tuesday last and the subsequent days be approved.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection the Journal of the several days will be approved. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

THE MERCHANT MARINE.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Now let the shipping bill be referred.

Mr. LODGE. I ask unanimous consent that the ship subsidy bill be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The bill (H. R. 12817) to amend and supplement the merchant marine act, 1920, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. LODGE. I renew my motion that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After 25 minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

MAIL CONTRACTS IN ALASKA.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Postmaster General, transmitting, pursuant to law, copies of special contracts entered into by the Post Office Department with the Copper River & Northwestern Railway Co. for carrying the mails between Cordova and Kennekott, Alaska; with the Alaskan Engineering Commission for carrying the mails on the Government railroad in Alaska; and with the Pacific & Arctic Railway & Navigation Co. for carrying the mails between Skagway and White Pass, Alaska, which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the chairman of the United States Shipping Board, transmitting, pursuant to law, statement of travel performed by the officers and employees of the board during the fiscal year 1922, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, with reference to the communication from the Shipping Board, I should like to inquire of the Chair whether, under the rule, it will be printed?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It can be ordered printed. The Chair thinks it would not be printed unless so ordered.

Mr. NORRIS. Does it come in response to a resolution of the Senate?

Mr. FLETCHER. I think it ought to be printed, Mr. President.

Mr. NORRIS. If it comes in response to a resolution of the Senate, I think it would be printed under the rule.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is a very short communication.

Mr. NORRIS. What is the subject matter?

The VICE PRESIDENT. A communication from the chairman of the United States Shipping Board, transmitting, pursuant to law, a statement of travel performed by the officers and employees of the board during the fiscal year ended June 30, 1922.

Mr. NORRIS. I ask that it be printed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it will be printed.

Mr. NORRIS. I do not want to interfere with the reference of the report to the Committee on Appropriations, but it ought to be printed as well.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It has been so referred.

FUNERAL EXPENSES OF THE LATE SENATOR WATSON OF GEORGIA.

Mr. CALDER. From the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, I report back favorably without amendment Senate Resolution 365, and ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to pay, out of the contingent fund of the Senate, to Mary M. Brewer, widow of Hiram H. Brewer, late foreman in the Senate folding room, a sum equal to one year's compensation at the rate he was receiving by law at the time of his death; said sum to be considered as including funeral expenses and all other allowances.

The Senate, by unanimous consent, proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, the resolution provides for the payment of one year's salary to the widow of this former employee of the Senate. He was with the Senate for over 30 years. This employee served for more than 30 years.

Mr. OVERMAN. Who was he?

Mr. CALDER. Mr. Brewer, who was in the folding room for 30 years, a Civil War veteran.

Mr. LODGE. He was in the service of the Senate for 39 years.

Mr. OVERMAN. The precedent is for the payment of six months' salary.

Mr. CALDER. No; that is in case where the service was less than 25 years.

Mr. LODGE. Where the service was over 25 years we have given a year's salary.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, December 4, 1922.

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m., and was called to order by the Speaker.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

In Thee, O Lord, we have our rest and our peace and our safety. By all that is tenderest in Thy promises and wisest in Thy teaching always encourage us to come to Thee. As Thy pardon is like the fullness of the sea, do Thou forgive us. For the blessings of the past we thank Thee, and continue, O Lord, to reveal Thyself unto us in wisdom and in truth. Grant us large conceptions of duty and a deep sense of responsibility. O ever let our ambitions reach toward Thee and always respond with Thy blessings and give us good cheer by the way. Through Christ. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday, December 2, 1922, was read and approved.

JAMES R. MANN.

Mr. APPLEBY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the following letter be extended in the RECORD relative to the death of Mr. MANN.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New Jersey asks unanimous consent to extend in the RECORD a letter concerning the death of Mr. MANN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Following is the letter referred to:

THE ROBERTS SAFETY WATER TUBE BOILER CO.,
Red Bank, N. J., December 1, 1922.

Hon. T. FRANK APPLEBY,
Representing the Third Congressional District of New Jersey,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN: I am sending under separate cover by same mail a copy of to-day's issue of the Red Bank Standard to you.

I thought possibly you might be interested in reading the notice in respect to the memory of the late Hon. JAMES R. MANN, which we had inserted in this paper.

It is suggested that possibly you might deem it well and advisable to read this tribute to the memory of your late colleague to the House.

Some of the opponents to the administration measure might then realize how some of us in your district feel on this subject.

With kind regards, I remain

Very sincerely,

E. GERRY ROBERTS.

Roberts Boiler Works closed till Monday out of respect to the memory of Hon. JAMES R. MANN, who served with honorable credit for many years in the United States House of Representatives, and whose last act in such capacity was to offer to Representative MONDELL, majority floor leader, to be taken to the House if his vote was needed to pass the administration merchant marine bill, but who arranged a pair for him instead.

Mr. MANN passed away last evening.

Requiescat in pace.

ROBERTS SAFETY WATER TUBE BOILER CO.

RESOLUTION FOR ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I present the following resolution and ask its speedy consideration.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wyoming presents a resolution, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Concurrent Resolution 73.

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House be authorized to close the present session by adjourning their respective Houses on the 4th day of December, 1922, at 11 o'clock and 50 minutes a. m.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry. May I ask a question? If this resolution is not passed, would not the House and Senate adjourn automatically by operation of law at 12 o'clock noon to-day?

The SPEAKER. They would.

Mr. BLANTON. Well, then, is not this an unnecessary action?

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, it seems proper that we should close the session in the usual and ordinary way, including the reading of the Journal. I believe the Senate will also consider that that is the correct and orderly procedure rather than simply to have the extra session expire by the arrival of the hour when the regular session comes into being.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, may I ask the gentleman from Wyoming a question?

Mr. MONDELL. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, that the House now stand in recess, subject to the call of the Chair.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, may I ask the gentleman from Wyoming a question with respect to the business to be taken up to-morrow and next day? We have not had any announcement.

Mr. MONDELL. I am not sure about to-morrow. On Calendar Wednesday we expect to take up the first appropriation bill if that is agreeable to the House. That is the Treasury appropriation bill.

THE COLORADO RIVER.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. Speaker, I desire to submit a unanimous-consent request. I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing the compact as agreed upon by the commissioners of the seven States of the Colorado River Basin with respect to the disposition of the waters of that stream, with comments thereon by the Secretary of Commerce and the Director of the United States Reclamation Service.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Arizona asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks by printing the document indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Following is the compact referred to:

COLORADO RIVER COMPACT.

The States of Arizona, California, Colorado, Nevada, New Mexico, Utah, and Wyoming having resolved to enter into a compact under the act of the Congress of the United States of America approved August 19, 1921 (42 Stat. L., p. 171), and the acts of the legislatures of the said States, have through their governors appointed as their commissioners W. S. Norviel, for the State of Arizona; W. F. McClure, for the State of California; Deiph E. Carpenter, for the State of Colorado; J. G. Scruggs, for the State of Nevada; Stephen D. Davis, Jr., for the State of New Mexico; R. E. Caldwell, for the State of Utah; Frank C. Emerson, for the State of Wyoming, who after negotiations participated in by Herbert Hoover, appointed by the President as the representative of the United States of America, have agreed upon the following articles:

"ARTICLE I. The major purposes of this compact are to provide for equitable division and apportionment of the use of the waters of the Colorado River system, to establish the relative importance of different beneficial uses of water, to promote interstate comity, to remove causes of present and future controversies, and to secure the expeditious agricultural and industrial development of the Colorado River Basin, the storage of its waters, and the protection of life and property from floods. To these ends the Colorado River Basin is divided into two basins, and an apportionment of the use of part of the water of the Colorado River system is made to each of them with the provision that further equitable apportionments may be made.

"ART. II. As used in this compact: (A) The term 'Colorado River system' means that portion of the Colorado River and its tributaries within the United States of America. (B) The term 'Colorado River Basin' means all of the drainage area of the Colorado River system and all other territory within the United States of America to which the waters of the Colorado River system shall be beneficially applied. (C) The term 'States of the upper division' means the States of Colorado, New Mexico, Utah, and Wyoming. (D) The term 'States of the lower division' means the States of Arizona, California, and Nevada. (E) The term 'Lee Ferry' means a point in the main stream of the Colorado River 1 mile below the mouth of the Paris River. (F) The term 'upper basin' means those parts of the States of Arizona, Colorado, New Mexico, Utah, and Wyoming within and from which waters naturally drain into the Colorado River system above Lee Ferry, and also all parts of said States located without the drainage area of the Colorado River system which are now or shall hereafter be beneficially served by waters diverted from the system above Lee Ferry. (G) The term 'lower basin' means those parts of the States of Arizona, California, Nevada, New Mexico, and Utah within and from which waters naturally drain into the Colorado River system below Lee Ferry, and also all parts of said States located without the drainage area of the Colorado River system, which are now or shall hereafter be beneficially served by waters diverted from the system below Lee Ferry. (H) The term 'domestic use' shall include the use of water for household, stock, municipal, mining, milling, industrial, and other like purposes, but shall exclude the generation of electrical power.

"ART. III. (A) There is hereby apportioned from the Colorado River system in perpetuity to the upper basin and to the lower basin, respectively, the exclusive beneficial consumptive use of 7,700,000 acre-feet of water per annum, which shall include all water necessary for the supply for any rights which may now exist. (B) In addition to the apportionment in paragraph (A) the lower basin is hereby given the right to increase its beneficial consumptive use of such waters by 1,000,000 acre-feet per annum. (C) If, as a matter of international comity, the United States of America shall hereafter recognize in the United States or Mexico any right to use of any waters of the Colorado River system, such waters shall be supplied first from the waters which are surplus over and above the aggregate of the quantities specified in paragraphs (A) and (B), and if such surplus shall prove insufficient for this purpose, then the burden of such deficiency shall be equally borne by the upper basin and the lower basin, and whenever necessary the States of the upper division shall deliver at Lee Ferry water to supply one-half of the deficiency so recognized in addition to that provided in paragraph (D). (D) The States of the upper division will not cause the flow of the river at Lee Ferry to be depleted below an aggregate of 75,000,000 acre-feet for any period of 10 consecutive years reckoned in continuing progressive series beginning with the 1st day of October next succeeding the ratification of this compact. (E) The States of the upper division shall not withhold water, and the States of the lower division shall not require the delivery of water which can not reasonably be applied to domestic and agricultural uses. (F) Further equitable apportionment of the beneficial uses of the waters of the Colorado River system unapportioned by paragraphs (A), (B), and (C) may be made in the manner provided in paragraph (G) at any time after October 1, 1963, if and when either basin shall have reached its total beneficial consumptive use as set out in paragraphs (A) and (B). (G) In the event of a desire for a further apportionment as provided in paragraph (F) any two signatory States, acting through their governors, may give joint notice of such desire to the governors of the other signatory States and to the President of the United States of America, and it shall be the duty of the governors of the signatory States and of the President of the United States of America forthwith to appoint representatives whose duty it shall be to divide and apportion equitably between the upper basin and lower basin the beneficial use of the unapportioned water of the Colorado River system as mentioned in paragraph (F), subject to the legislative ratification of the signatory States and the Congress of the United States of America.

"ART. IV. (A) Inasmuch as the Colorado River has ceased to be navigable for commerce and reservation of its waters for navigation would seriously limit the developments of its basin, the use of its waters for purposes of navigation shall be subservient to the uses of such waters for domestic, agricultural, and power purposes. If the Congress shall not consent to this paragraph, the other provisions of this compact shall nevertheless remain binding. (B) Subject to the provisions of this compact, water of the Colorado River system may be impounded and used for the generation of electrical power, but such impounding and use shall be subservient to the use and consumption of such water for agricultural and domestic purposes and shall not interfere with or prevent use for such dominant purposes. (C) The provisions of this article shall not apply to or interfere with the regulation and control by any State within its boundaries of the appropriation, use, and distribution of water.

"ART. V. The chief official of each signatory State charged with the administration of water rights, together with the Director of the United States Reclamation Service and the Director of the United States Geological Survey, shall cooperate, ex officio: (A) To promote the systematic determination and coordination of the facts as to flow, appropriation, consumption, and use of water in the Colorado River Basin and the interchange of available information in such matters. (B) To secure the ascertainment and publication of the annual flow of the Colorado River at Lee Ferry. (C) To perform such other duties as may be assigned by mutual consent of the signatories from time to time.

"ART. VI. Should any claim or controversy arise between any two or more of the signatory States: (A) with respect to the waters of the Colorado River system not covered by the terms of this compact. (B) Over the meaning or performance of any of the terms of this compact. (C) As to the allocation of the burdens incident to the performance of any article of this compact or delivery of waters as herein provided. (D) As to the construction or operation of works within the Colorado River Basin to be situated in two or more States or to be constructed in one State for the benefit of another State; or (E) as to the diversion of water in one State for the benefit of another State. The governors of the States affected, upon the request of one of them, shall forthwith appoint commissioners with power to consider and adjust such claim or controversy, subject to ratification by the legislatures of the States so affected.

"Nothing herein contained shall prevent the adjustment of any such claim or controversy by any present method or direct future legislative action of the interested States.

"ART. VII. Nothing in this compact shall be construed as affecting the obligations of the United States of America to Indian tribes.

"ART. VIII. Present perfected rights to the beneficial use of waters of the Colorado River system are unimpaired by this compact. Whenever storage capacity of 5,000,000 acre-feet shall have been provided on the main Colorado River within or for the benefit of the lower basin then claims of such rights, if any, by appropriators or users of water in the lower basin against appropriators or users of water in the upper basin shall attach to and be satisfied from water that may be stored not in conflict with Article III. All other rights to beneficial use of waters of the Colorado River system shall be satisfied solely from the water apportioned to that basin in which they are situated.

"ART. IX. Nothing in this compact shall be construed to limit or prevent any State from instituting or maintaining any action or proceeding, legal or equitable, for the protection of any right under this compact or the enforcement of any of its provisions.

"ART. X. This compact may be terminated at any time by the unanimous agreement of the signatory States. In the event of such termination all rights established under it shall continue unimpaired.

"ART. XI. The compact shall become binding and obligatory when it shall have been approved by the legislature of each of the signatory States and by the Congress of the United States. Notice of approval by the legislatures shall be given by the governor of such signatory State to the governors of the other signatory States and to the President of the United States, and the President of the United States is requested to give notice to the governors of the signatory States of approval by the Congress of the United States."

In witness whereof, the commissioners have signed this compact in a single original, which shall be deposited in the archives of the Department of State of the United States of America, and of which a duly certified copy shall be forwarded to the governor of each of the signatory States.

STATEMENTS BY THE SECRETARY OF COMMERCE.

Secretary Hoover's statement is as follows:

"The big thing about the Colorado River compact is that it breaks the blockade on development of the whole river. It allows us all to go ahead with river development and with flood protection to the Imperial and Yuma Valleys.

"The worst thing about the compact is that it will destroy much oratory. It makes for growing spuds and not for glowing speech.

"One can get great emotion over conflict and quarrel, but there is no great oratory about the fact that the northern basin is separated from the southern basin by a thousand miles of barren canyon; that the agriculture and economic life of the two basins are wholly different, and that the logical thing is to divide the water between them so they can make homes instead of defending injunctions.

"Nor can one make great oratory out of the fact that there is ample water and to spare the apportionment of enough water to each basin to cover all of the present users plus all of the known feasible projects, plus 30 per cent for good measure, then holding in reserve 30 per cent for 40 years to see where it is most needed. There is nothing sensational about a compact that leaves all question of Mexican rights to water to the State Department, which is the only organ of the American people which has any right to deal with it. There is nothing especially romantic about the provisions in the compact for complete priority of agriculture over power forever in the use of water of this river.

"Yet, behind all the precise and commonplace language of this compact lies the greatness and romance of the West, the building of a million more homes out under the blue sky in security and good will.

"The compact has a side interest, for with the exception of two other cases, and these only between two States, this compact marks the first time that a considerable number of States have settled fundamental interstate rights by process of treaty instead of resort to the Supreme Court."

HOOVER URGES QUICK ACTION ON RIVER PACT.

LOS ANGELES, November 26.—The ratification of the Colorado River pact, signed at the conclusion of a hearing before the Colorado River Commission at Santa Fe, N. Mex., last Friday, was urged by Herbert Hoover, Secretary of Commerce and chairman of the commission, in an address broadcast here to-night over the Los Angeles Times' radio.

"The foundation has been laid for a great American conquest," declared Mr. Hoover. "The harnessing of the giant Colorado River will follow the ratification of the pact by the seven States of the Colorado River Basin. With such ratification, the next step will be the construction, without delay, of a control dam, under authorization of Congress.

"Then the Southwest will come into its magnificent heritage of power and life-giving water, and all the Nation will be vastly benefited.

"The first step is to settle the controversy between the upper and lower districts of the Colorado Basin. There can be no development until that is settled. Ratification by the States of the pact agreed upon by the Colorado River Commission will speedily accomplish this. If the matter is forced into the Supreme Court it may require years.

"The next step will be the construction of a control dam in the lower reaches of the river. The commission adopted a resolution urging Congress to proceed toward the immediate construction of control works."

While the commission made no recommendation concerning the site of the dam, Mr. Hoover said he favored its construction at or near Boulder Canyon. He said he believed the people of California and of all States affected should make a concerted effort to obtain a control dam in that vicinity, so the Imperial Valley of California may be protected against flood menace.

He was emphatic in stating there was no need to quarrel over the division of the water, declaring there is more of that than all the lands of the basin in both the United States and Mexico can use.

DIRECTOR OF RECLAMATION SERVICE SAYS RIVER COMPACT STEP FORWARD; WILL HASTEN CONSTRUCTION.

SANTA FE, N. MEX., November 27.—The Colorado River Commission before adjournment here adopted a resolution strongly recommending immediate action toward flood control in the Imperial Valley. The resolution follows:

"The members of the Colorado River Commission have had constantly before them the great menace of annual floods to the lives and property of the people of the Imperial and Palo Verde Valleys in California and the Yuma Valley in Arizona and the anxiety of their thousands of citizens. Therefore they earnestly recommend and urge the early construction of works in the Colorado River to control the floods and permanently avoid the menace."

"The unanimous agreement by the Colorado River Commission upon the details of a compact for the division of the uses and protection of rights to the use of the waters of the Colorado River and its tributaries is a signal victory for those qualities and impulses which distinguish the civilized from the savage," declared Arthur P. Davis, Director of the United States Reclamation Service, commenting upon the interstate pact regarding the use of the Colorado Basin waters signed at Santa Fe, November 24. His statement continues:

"It will obviate the delay and the acrimonious litigations which a year ago seemed imminent and has cleared the way for the provision of flood control and irrigation storage, urgently needed and indispensable to further development in the Colorado River Basin.

"The original contentions of the seven States were so far apart that an agreement seemed hopeless. But a discussion of the various needs led to a closer acquaintance with the facts and the various points of view, and the conclusions may be said to award each claimant more than he expected in view of the original contentions.

"The satisfactory settlement of all these disputes at small expense within a year after the organization of the commission is in strong contrast to the alternative of litigation. The recent decision of the Supreme Court of Wyoming in the Colorado case was rendered about 11 years after its inception, and dealt only with a single controversy in a small stream basin. The Colorado Basin lies in seven States, in which thousands of users are diverting its waters. Its development involved some of the largest and most difficult engineering problems ever attempted and a multitude of complicated interests and possible disputes, which have been settled within 11 months instead of 11 years.

"All good citizens should rejoice in this substitution of reason and progress for conflict and stagnation.

"This happy result is due largely to the broad-minded attitude of the members of the commission, and especially to the patience, tact, and diplomatic ability of the chairman of the commission, Hon. Herbert Hoover.

"The natural flow of the Colorado River averages nearly 20,000,000 acre-feet per annum. Of this about one-third now is used, and this includes the low-water flow in the lower basin, which can not further develop safely without storage. The present users in the lower basin take about 3,700,000 acre-feet. The compact awards this portion of the basin a total annual flow of 8,500,000 acre-feet, or more than double its present needs, and sufficient to develop all feasible projects and some of doubtful feasibility. The upper basin is awarded 7,500,000 acre-feet, which also is more than double its present needs and sufficient to serve nearly 3,000,000 acres additional, which will be sufficient for all feasible projects and some of doubtful feasibility.

"If this water is not consumed in irrigation, it will run down through the canyons for use below. There remains an unapportioned quantity of over 4,000,000 acre-feet for future division as unforeseen needs may appear. Such a further division is provided for in the compact. Thus both basins are provided for fully, their present development protected, and their future development unhampered by water disputes."

RECESS.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the House now stand in recess, subject to the call of the Chair.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wyoming asks unanimous consent that the House stand in recess, subject to the call of the Chair. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Accordingly (at 11 o'clock and 5 minutes a. m.) the House stood in recess.

AFTER RECESS.

The House was called to order by the Speaker at 11 o'clock and 50 minutes a. m.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Craven, its Chief Clerk, announced that the Senate had passed the following resolution:

House Concurrent Resolution 73.

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives be authorized to close the present session by adjourning their respective Houses on the 4th day of December, 1922, at 11 o'clock and 50 minutes a. m.

ADJOURNMENT SINE DIE.

The SPEAKER. According to the power vested in the Speaker by the resolution, the Chair declares the House adjourned sine die.
